Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Quidquid autem industria sua vel intuitu religionis acquirit, religioni acquirit.

§ 3. Cessionem vel dispositionem de qua in can. 569, § 2, professus mutare potest non quidem proprio arbitrio, nisi constitutiones id sinant, sed de supremi Moderatoris licentia, aut, si de monialibus agatur, de licentia Ordinarii loci et, si monasterium regularibus obnoxium sit, Superioris regularis, dummodo mutatio, saltem de notabili bonorum parte, non fiat in favorem religionis; per discessum autem a religione eiusmodi cessio ac dispositio habere vim desinit.

§ 1 states that those who have made profession of simple vows, temporary or perpetual, retain the proprietorship of their property and the capacity to acquire other property, unless the constitutions declare otherwise; with due regard to can. 569.

In order to fully understand this paragraph we must examine what dominium or ownership involves.[89] It is generally defined as the right to have, hold, and dispose freely of a corporeal thing, unless it be prohibited by law. Thus one possesses a house or a farm. This right is clearly distinguished from the so-called usufruct or useful dominion. Thus a renter has the usufruct of a house or farm, but he cannot be styled the owner.

A radical dominion must necessarily retain the essential elements of the definition of ownership or dominion, but it has a somewhat restricted meaning. And this we find in the limitation appended by law. Wherefore one may have and hold and even dispose of corporeal things, but the disposal is limited by law, or, let us say, suspended, whilst having and holding are not limited. A similar way of limiting the disposal of property is found in minors, in whose name their guardians and tutors act, because the law, out of due consideration for younger people who sometimes act rashly, has restricted their freedom of action. How far the Code wishes to apply this restriction will be seen in § 3.

89 Cfr. Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, s. v. "Dominum," "Proprietas" (p. 188, p. 287); also the commentaries on the Decretals, bk. II, tit. 12; Hill, Ethics, ed. 8, p. 229; Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, 1 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text of § 1 says that they retain "the capacity to acquire other property" (alia bona). This text is taken from "Perpensis," 1902, where we read: "If during the period of simple vows other property accrues to them by any lawful means, they retain the radical dominion thereof, etc." The meaning evidently is, if a fortune comes to them which they did not acquire by financial operations, or by increasing the capital through interest, but as it were unexpectedly (obvenire) or at least without coöperation. Because "ordaining that their revenues must go to increase their capital,"[40] is an act of administration, which is only allowed with the permission of the superior, as the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars, Nov. 21, 1902, in accordance with "Perpensis," decided.[41] What has been stated under can. 569 need not be repeated here; we will only say that for such an acquisition no permission of the superior is mentioned, hence not required.

§ 2. Whatever a simple professed religious acquires by personal labor or in respect of his institute, belongs to the institute. An ancient principle is here renewed with the addition: "in respect of the institute." The reason for this clause is the dualistic status of a religious who may act as such and as an official person. Thus a reli-

40 Thus Papi, l. c., p. 51, who thinks that for such an act no permission of the superiors is required; but he seems to be wrong.

41 Analecta Eccl. 1904, XII, p. 248.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gious may be pastor of a parish, a Sister may be employed as nurse in a railroad or State hospital, or as a school teacher. Here a distinction must be made according to can. 533, § 1, 4. What he acquires for his mission or parish or school does not belong to the religious house, but mass stipends, fees or offerings for special lectures, if they are not intended to benefit his church, the salary — subtracting, of course, necessary household expenses — the profit from selling books, literary or art products — all this belongs to the institute of which he is a member. Thus also the earnings of a religious who practices a profession or performs manual labor belong to the order. A Sister acting as nurse or as teacher must surrender her salary to the religious community to which she belongs. If she receives donations, she must ascertain the intentions of the donors. A donation given to her personally, for instance, for good nursing or teaching, belongs to the religious house of which she is a member; if the present is made for the hospital or school, it belongs to the latter.[42]

§ 3 refers to can. 569, which governs the cession or disposition of property to a trustworthy person. Now both these acts, the appointment of an administrator and the disposal of the revenues, should not be arbitrarily modified during the period of simple profession, but only with the permission of the superior general, unless the constitutions permit a free change. Nuns may make a change with the permission of their Ordinary and their regular prelate, if they are subject to one; however, such change, even with proper permission, may never be made in favor of the religious institute, at least no notable part of the property; and all provisions made for the appointment of an administrator and the disposal of property become null and void after one has left the religious institute.

42 Clement VIII, May 20, 1601 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 521).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) The permission required is not qualified, but it would seem that an express or explicit permission is meant, since a habitual one might involve arbitrary changes. A case in point was decided June 2, 1905. A Sister had made a disposal of her fortune or property, half of which she willed to her institute, and the other half to her brother. In course of time her brother needed a larger subsidy. Was the sister allowed to change her will? The S. Congregation answered: Yes, with the permission of the superioress.[43] From this we may also deduce what a notable part of a property would be, viz., a little over half of the total income or revenues.

b) Nuns must have the permission of the Ordinary, and in case of their being subject to a regular prelate, also that of the latter.

c) After one has left a religious institute, all provisions as to cession of administration and disposal of revenues cease automatically. The reason for this enactment is evident. Retaining the proprietorship during the period of simple profession after leaving the institute — we suppose legitimately — the religious becomes a lay person with all personal rights restored. The canon, however, does not state whether the institute would have to reimburse only the capital made over to the institute, or also the interest. Here again constitutions and by-laws ought to safeguard the rights of both, individual religious and institute. The intention of the lawgiver may be guessed from can. 531, § 1, where the dowry is mentioned. This, said canon says, must, when a religious leaves the institute, be restored to her entirely, but without the interest due. Hence an enactment might be made in the by-laws to the effect that the entire capital deeded over to the institute must be restored without the interest accruing thereto in the course of time.

43 S. C. EE. et RR. (Anal. Eccl., 1906, XIV, p. 250).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RENUNCIATION OF PROPERTY BEFORE SOLEMN PROFESSION

CAN. 581

§ 1. Professus a votis simplicibus antea nequit valide, sed intra sexaginta dies ante professionem sollemnem, salvis peculiaribus indultis a Sancta Sede concessis, debet omnibus bonis quae actu habet, cui maluerit, sub conditione secuturae professionis, renuntiare.

§ 2. Secuta professione, ea omnia statim fiant, quae necessaria sunt ut renuntiatio etiam iure civili effectum consequatur.

Aside from special indults granted by the Holy See, a professed religious of simple vows cannot validly renounce his property except within sixty days preceding solemn profession, but within this time he must renounce in favor of whomsoever he pleases, all the property which he actually possesses, on condition of his profession subsequently taking place.

This renunciation should, after profession has been made, be followed by the necessary civil formalities to make it effective also according to the civil law.

The Code applies the rule laid down by the Tridentine Council [44] concerning renunciation of all property which a religious actually, hic et nunc, possesses. This rule concerns only orders in which solemn vows are taken, and only such property as the members actually possess before solemn profession.

44 Sess. 25, c. 16, de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Hence any property they may receive after solemn profession must be disposed of according to can. 582. Renunciation means abdicating ownership as well as disposal. Of course a last will, being made mortis causa, is not a renunciation proper, because revocable. Donations or bequests would seem to be the proper way of renouncing property. The time runs sixty days, counting forward to the prospective day of solemn profession. Hence, if for one reason or another, solemn profession would have to be postponed, the abdication would still hold good. The beneficiary of a renunciation may be any person capable of possessing, including the religious institute. But the legal form (notary public and witnesses) is to be applied only after profession has taken place, for neither binds by ecclesiastical law before the solemn vows are taken.

PROPERTY RECEIVED AFTER SOLEMN PROFESSION

CAN. 582

Post sollemnem professionem, salvis pariter peculiaribus Apostolicae Sedis indultis, omnia bona quovis modo obveniunt regulari:

1.° In Ordine capaci possidendi, cedunt Odini vel provinciae vel domui secundum constitutiones;

2.° In Ordine incapaci, acquiruntur Sanctae Sedi in proprietatem.

After solemn profession, likewise without prejudice to special indults of the Apostolic See, all the property which comes in whatever way to a solemnly professed religious belongs to the order, or province, or house, according to the constitutions, if the order is capable of ownership; if the order is incapable of ownership, the Holy See becomes the owner of such property.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon distinguishes between mendicant and non-mendicant orders.[45] The former are those whose primitive rule forbids ownership in common, not only in the individual members. Such are the brown Franciscans, the Capuchins, the Carmelites, etc. The Society of Jesus has a peculiar constitution, which forbids professed houses to possess real estate in common, whilst houses of probation and colleges enjoy real ownership.[46] Non-mendicant orders are the shoed Augustinians, the Benedictines, the Cistercians, the Dominicans, the Praemonstratensians, etc. Note that the Code says: "without prejudice to special indults." Such may be granted to single institutes and cannot be discussed here. In the non-mendicant orders, or such as have obtained special indults from the Holy See, the solemnly professed member, after solemn profession, acquires everything for his institute.[47] This may be the order itself, if it be centralized, or the province, if endowed with the qualities of a corporation, or the local house, which is chiefly the case with the Benedictines and similar monastic orders and congregations. It all depends on the respective constitutions. Nothing is exempt from the capability of possessing property enjoyed by such orders, or provinces, or houses. Hence movable and immovable property, revenues and salaries, pensions and bequests, legacies and wills, may be conveyed to such institutes, as well as literary and patent rights, etc., so far as the law does not interfere.

The second clause may cause some little trouble, inasmuch as the Holy See is not recognized by our government as a corporation, except in the Philippines and 45 The Code is absolutely silent about mendicant congregations.

46 Pius V, "Cum indefessae," July 7, 1571; Wernz, Ius Decret., III, n. 592 (1 ed.).

47 Cfr. c. 11, C. 12, q. 1; c. 6, X, III, 35; c. 1; Clem. V, II; cc. 3, 5, Extrav. Ioan. XXII, tit. 14; Bizzarri, l. c., p. 520 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Porto Rico, and the territory included in the treaty of Paris after the Spanish-American War.[48] Therefore houses incapable of owning property, or at least real estate, should obtain from the Holy See a special indult or else incorporate their property as diocesan property, as a corporation sole or aggregate. The civil government, of course, acknowledges no mendicants, and from that point of view there is little difficulty. "As a sovereign power, a political and ecclesiastical State, the Catholic Church can acquire property in the various States only by treaty with the government at Washington."[49] This is simply a logical consequence of the separation of State and Church existing in this country.

SIMPLY PROFESSED MEMBERS OF RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS

CAN. 583

Professis a votis simplicibus in Congregationibus religiosis non licet:

1.° Per actum inter vivos dominium bonorum suorum, titulo gratioso abdicare;

2.° Testamentum conditum ad normam can. 569, § 3, mutare sine licentia Sanctae Sedis, vel, si res urgeat nec tempus suppetat ad eam recurrendi, sine licentia Superioris maioris aut, si nec ille adiri possit, localis.

Those who have made profession of simple vows in any religious congregation:

1.° May not abdicate gratuitously the dominion over their property by a voluntary deed of conveyance;

2.° May not alter a will made according to can. 569,

48 Zollmann, l. c., p. 47 f.

49 K. Zollmann, ibid. This does not, of course, imply that the Catholic Church is incapable of possessing property; as a matter of fact ecclesiastical institutions own property, but as private civil corporations.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3, without the permission of the Holy See, or, if the case be urgent and time does not admit of recourse to the Apostolic See, without the permission of the higher superior, or, if recourse cannot be had to him either, without the permission of the local superior.

The first number treats of donations. A donation is a free gift of something not due to the receiver, or, as our text says, titulo gratuito. A donation made to show gratitude or to recompense merits is not a donation in the proper sense.[50] Nor is a bilateral contract, e. g., a loan or sale, a donation. For the text itself requires that an abdication of ownership must follow the act made in favor of another. But ownership is not lost by contract, loan or sale, which involve only a change. Furthermore, notice the phrase, bonorum suorum,— of their property. This would imply one's whole fortune or property, or at least the bulk thereof. Hence small donations which would not entail a great loss, and donations made out of gratitude or in acknowledgment of services rendered are not forbidden.

No. 2 speaks of a last will, which takes effect only after the death of the testator, and must, of course, be vested with the necessary formalities. In can. 569, § 3, the novice is admonished — it cannot be called a strict law, as is apparent from the milder form of the subjunctive (condat) — to make a will. After he has made one, it may be changed only with the permission of the Holy See. The reason for this ruling lies in the sacredness of the last will, as well as in the fact of religious being bound to the supreme authority more closely than laymen. Besides, a religious being looked upon as a minor needs to be protected in his freedom.

This permission may in urgent cases, which do not admit of the delay involved in recourse to the Apostolic See, be given by the superior general, or by the provincial, or the local superior, if the higher superior cannot be reached. An urgent case would be a sudden departure from the religious congregation caused by an unforeseen call to arms, sickness, etc. The canon affects all religious with simple vows, whether temporary or perpetual, even of exempt congregations. For the Code makes no distinction. On the other hand it does not affect the professed members with simple vows of religious orders, and hence lay brothers and clerics with simple vows belonging to such orders are not included.

50 Reiffenstuel, III, 24, n. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VACANCY OF BENEFICES

CAN. 584

Post annum ab emissa qualibet professione religiosa, vacant beneficia paroecialia; post triennium cetera.

Parochial benefices become vacant after one year from the date of any religious profession; other benefices three years after profession.

We suppose that the term benefice must not be pressed too rigorously, so as to exclude parochial offices. The canon would seem to include our country, where benefices in the strict sense (as understood before the Code) do not exist. A pastor who wishes to enter a religious order cannot resign his office during the period of his novitiate, according to can. 568. Under the Decretals [51] a vacancy was created ipso iure by any valid profession made after the novitiate. However, since the triennial profession came into vogue, the vacancy was held to take place only after solemn profession.[52] This was inconvenient, since 51 C. 4, 6°, III, 14.

52 Bened. XIV, "Ex quo," Jan. 14, 1747. The S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 25, 1903, ruled (for the mis-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a parish would then be vacant at least four years, which is against the spirit of the Church. Hence the aspirant was allowed to anticipate his solemn profession. Now the Code rules that the vacancy is to be reckoned one year after profession, no matter whether the latter be temporary or perpetual, simple or solemn. Hence, counting the year's novitiate and one year after the profession, the vacancy of a parish may at most last two years. During that time the bishop has to provide the parish with a vicar, to be paid out of the benefice, if there be such, or out of the usual revenues which furnish the pastor's salary. The pastor, however, may retain or receive what is left over and above the decent support paid to the vicar or substitute. Of course, in special cases, which demand the appointment of a regular pastor, the bishop may have recourse to the Holy See (S. C. Concilii or S. C. Rel.). A canon who is bound to attend choir service in his church loses his share of the daily distributions during his stay in the novitiate and for the three years of profession, but he would not be deprived of the benefice until three years after profession, because a canonicate is not a parochial benefice.[53] Neither are chaplaincies or the offices of assistants and rectors parochial benefices. Hence such would not become vacant until four years had elapsed.

sionaries of the S. Heart of Mary) that all residential, hence all parochial, benefices became vacant at the moment of perpetual profession (Anal. Eccl., 1903, XI, p. 448).

53 Bened. XIV, l. c.; Suarez, De Rel., tr. VII, l. V, c. 16, n. 12 (t. 15, p. 375, ed. Paris). The Jesuits are bound to resign after two years' probation. However our canon does not refer to any special constitution or indults or provisions — hence videant ipsi.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LOSS OF INCARDINATION

CAN. 585

Professus a votis perpetuis sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus amittit ipso iure propriam quam in saeculo habebat dioecesim.

By perpetual profession, whether solemn or simple, a person ceases to belong to the diocese which he had as a secular.

This canon, as also can. 115, only mentions excardination, and, judging from the lack of any quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition, is entirely new. It refers to the diocese to which one belonged before entering religion. Hence the bishop no longer has a claim on a layman or clergyman who has made his profession as a religious, and the latter's connection with the diocese is severed. This is true even if the institute entered by a cleric is situated within the diocese to which he belonged. The reason is because, as can. 111 says, by embracing the religious life, one ceases to be a vagabond cleric, and his service is transferred to the institute he embraces by perpetual profession.

INVALID PROFESSION

CAN. 586

§ 1. Professio religiosa irrita ob impedimentum externum non convalescit per subsequentes actus, sed opus est ut a Sede Apostolica sanetur, vel denuo, cognita nullitate et impedimento sublato, legitime emittatur.

§ 2. Si autem irrita fuerit ob consensus defectum mere internum, hoc praestito, convalescit, dummodo ex parte religionis consensus non fuerit revocatus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Si contra validitatem professionis religiosae gravia sint argumenta et religiosus renuat ad cautelam sive professionem renovare sive eiusdem sanationem petere, res ad Sedem Apostolicam deferatur.

§ 1. The religious profession which is invalid by reason of an external impediment, is not convalidated by subsequent acts, but must either be healed by the Apostolic See, or a new profession made after the nullity has been discovered and the impediment removed.

This paragraph supposes that the profession, whether temporary or perpetual, simple or solemn, was null and void on account of an external impediment, such as one of the conditions mentioned in can. 572, § 1, which are all more or less external, with the exception perhaps of grave fear. What is to be done if an invalid profession must be convalidated? Here is an actual case. A pseudo-provincial admitted several novices to profession. As he had been illegally elected, all his acts were invalid, therefore also the professions. The religious thus invalidly professed renewed their profession annually with the usual words: "If we had not yet obliged ourselves to your Majesty, we would now bind ourselves, and therefore renew our vows." The S. C. of Bishops and Regulars decided (Dec. 10, 1841) that these professions required to be "healed in the root," and the Holy See did so, convalidating them all.[54] Hence the quoted formula of renewal in case of an external impediment is juridically valueless.

Another mode of convalidation is that mentioned in the second clause, i. e., renewal of consent. This requires 54 Bizzarri, l. c., p. 476 f.; notice the date 1841, that is to say, before tacit profession had been declared invalid by the "Neminem latet," and declarations of the same Congregation 1858 and ff. years, and by the "Perpensis," 1902.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

two conditions: knowledge of the impediment and removal of the same. Hence if the profession was invalid because of lack of age, the professed person must know the fact and wait until the required age is reached. In case the superior holds his office unlawfully, the profession must be renewed in the presence of the lawful superior after the mistake is discovered. The renewal would be more difficult if the time or place of the novitiate affected the validity. For in that case the novitiate would have to be repeated, unless the Holy See granted a dispensation. The similarity between marriage and religious profession in this point is obvious.

§ 2. If the profession be invalid on account of a purely internal defect of consent, it suffices for convalidation that the consent be given, provided that consent on the part of the institute has not been revoked. The difference between § 1 and § 2 consists in the fact that the latter concerns the private, not the public welfare, because the formalities were observed, and the vow is a personal one, while the contractual or external matter was supposedly complied with. Here grave fear or momentary mental aberration [55] might enter. Therefore, if one, after the fear has subsided and the mind has returned to its normal condition, would renew his profession, for instance, together with others at the annual renewal, it would be valid, because this is a mere matter of conscience; always provided that the institute has not in some palpable way withdrawn its consent.

§ 3. If there be serious arguments against the validity of a religious profession, and the religious refuses, as a measure of precaution (ad cautelam), either to renew the profession or to ask for its convalidation, the matter shall be referred to the Holy See.

[55] Cfr. c. 1, X, I, 40; c. 15, X, III, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code says "serious arguments," because futile and imaginary reasons [56] should not be proposed, especially after the time for putting in the claim has elapsed. The S. Congregation to which matters of this kind must be referred, is, of course, that of Religious.

[56] Such arise sometimes from scrupulosity, which must be treated according to the rules given by moralists on scrupulous conscience; sometimes they arise from subsequent dissatisfaction or a critical trend of mind, which must be disposed of, if possible, by resistance to unreasonable claims or pretensions. A weighty reason would be deceit on the part of the institute, or physical weakness on the side of the religious, or a serious doubt as to the correct observance of the required formalities.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XII

THE STUDIES IN CLERICAL INSTITUTES

CAN. 587

§ 1. Quaelibet clericalis religio habeat studiorum sedes a Capitulo generali vel a Superioribus approbatas, firmo praescripto can. 554, § 3.

§ 2. In studiorum domo vigeat perfecta vita communis; secus studentes ad ordines promoveri nequeunt.

§ 3. Si religio aut provincia studiorum domos rite instructas habere nequeat, aut si quas habet, adire, Superiorum iudicio, difficile sit, religiosi alumni mittantur vel ad recte ordinatam studiorum sedem alius provinciae aut religionis, vel ad scholas Seminarii episcopalis, vel ad publicum catholicum athenaeum.

§ 4. Religiosis, qui studiorum causa longe a propria domo mittuntur, non licet in privatis domibus habitare, sed opus est ut in aliquam suae religionis domum se recipiant, vel, si id fieri non possit, apud religiosum aliquod institutum virorum, vel Seminarium aliamve piam domum, cui sacri ordinis viri praesint, quaeque ab ecclesiastica auctoritate approbata sit.

We need not enlarge upon the text of this title, which forms a glorious page of our Code. Every clerical institute must have a house of studies. None is exempt from this rule, except those that are unable to have their own building, and these should send their students either to the study house of another province, or of another institute, or to the diocesan seminary, or to a Catholic university. It is known that Pius X, f. m., endeavored to abolish the small seminaries in Italy because of incompetency of the professors and lack of good example to the students. Of course, if a monastery maintains a theological seminary, this is sufficient. Can. 554, § 3, requires that only religious who lead an exemplary life should be placed in the houses of study, which does not, however, imply that they must be religious "cranks."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 588

§ 1. Toto studiorum curriculo religiosi committantur speciali curae Praefecti seu Magistri spiritus qui eorum animos ad vitam religiosam informet opportunis monitis, instructionibus atque exhortationibus.

§ 2. Praefectus vel Magister spiritus iis qualitatibus praeditus sit oportet, quae in Magistro novitiorum requiruntur ad normam can. 559, §§ 2, 3.

§ 3. Superiores vero sedulo invigilent ut ea quae can. 595 pro omnibus religiosis praescribuntur, in studiorum domo perfectissime observentur.

The Prefect of Studies must be endowed with the same qualities as the master of novices; if no such person is available, the age limit of thirty-five need not be strictly enforced; but lack of age may be supplied by learning, piety, and prudence.

Can. 589

§ 1. Religiosi in inferioribus disciplinis rite instructi, in philosophiae studia saltem per biennium et sacrae theologiae saltem per quadriennium, doctrinae D. Thomae inhaerentes ad normam can. 1366, § 2, dili-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

genter incumbant, secundum instructiones Apostolicae Sedis.

§ 2. Studiorum tempore magistris et alumnis officia ne imponantur quae a studio eos avocent vel scholam quoquo modo impediant; supremus autem Moderator et in casibus particularibus alii quoque Superiores possunt pro sua prudentia eos a nonnullis communitatis actibus, etiam a choro, praesertim nocturnis horis, eximere, quoties id studiis excolendis necessarium videatur.

§ 1 requires that religious, before taking up philosophical studies, should be duly instructed in the lower branches. This enactment is less severe than the decree of the S. C. of Religious, of Sept. 7, 1909.[1] Our Code does not determine how many years the academic and how many the collegiate course must comprise. It merely requires (can. 1364, 3.°) that in the smaller seminaries (colleges) the course of studies pursued must be adapted to the general education and the clerical state of the province or region in which the students are to exercise the sacred ministry. Neither does the Code exclude private study of the humaniora, because only the theological course must be made in a school properly so-called (can. 976, § 3). Therefore, based upon the rules of sound interpretation, we believe that the necessary knowledge may be supplied by private study, as far as the college training is concerned. The philosophical course must last at least two years. The method, doctrine and principles should be taken from St. Thomas Aquinas. But as the Angelic Doctor has not left us a manual of philosophy proper, other manuals may be used that are based on the "principia Divi Thomae," no mat-

1 A. Ap. S., I, 701 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ter whether they be Molinistic or Thomistic in tendency.

The theological course must comprise four years, that is, strictly four years, not three with shortened vacations. Each of these four study years should last nine months, neither more nor less.[2]

In theology, too, the "ratio, doctrina et principia" of St. Thomas must be followed, and it is the intention of the Holy See that the "Summa Theologica" should, if possible, be used as text-book. However, speaking from passive and active experience, we humbly submit that it is almost impossible to comply with this praiseworthy intention. The bulky commentaries needed to elucidate the "Summa" would require ten years of study, not to mention other branches which are equally necessary now-a-days. We may also be permitted to say, as a canonist, that the study of Canon Law, now that the new Code is in force, requires more time than was formerly given to it. If the moralists will strictly stick to their subject and abstain from grappling with topics properly belonging to Canon Law, we believe the Code could be mastered in a three years' course, with four hours a week. Moral Theology, if limited to its proper sphere — i. e., the fundamental principles, the Commandments, including the treatise de iustitia et iure, and the virtues, could be taught in a three years' course, with three hours a week. This is our opinion, for which we claim no authority, but which the legislator, we believe, would not reprimand.

The next paragraph (§ 2) of can. 589 is to be recommended to religious superiors for their pious and efficacious consideration. Overburdening professors and students is somewhat similar to overtaxing the stomach.

2 S. C. Rel., Sept. 7, 1909, III (A. Ap. S., I, 702); this rule still holds, May 31, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 449 f.) and is referred to by Cardinal Gasparri.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Proficiency and progress can result only from quietly conducted and duly limited courses of study. Non multa, sed multum!

YEARLY EXAMINATIONS

CAN. 590

Religiosi sacerdotes, iis tantum exceptis qui a Superioribus maioribus gravem ob causam fuerint exempti, aut qui vel sacram theologiam, vel ius canonicum vel philosophiam scholasticam doceant, post absolutum studiorum curriculum, quotannis, saltem per quinquennium, a doctis gravibusque patribus examinentur in variis doctrinae sacrae disciplinis antea opportune designatis.

This canon provides that all religious who are priests must pass an annual examination for a period of five years after completing their theological course. This examination is to cover all the various branches of sacred theology,— the specific matter to be pointed out beforehand — and must be held in the presence of learned and grave fathers. The law exempts from these examinations those who are engaged in teaching dogmatic or moral theology, canon law, and Scholastic philosophy. The higher superiors may exempt others for weighty reasons. This latter clause practically upsets the intention of the legislator. For weighty reasons may always be found, especially in a busy country like ours.

MONTHLY CONFERENCES

CAN. 591

In qualibet saltem formata domo, minimum semel in mense, habeatur solutio casus moralis et liturgici, cui, si Superior opportunum existimaverit, addi potest

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sermo de re dogmatica coniunctisve doctrinis; et omnes clerici professi qui studio sacrae theologiae operam navant aut illud expleverunt et in domo degunt, assistere tenentur, nisi aliud in constitutionibus caveatur.

In every house in which there are at least six members, theological conferences must be held regularly once a month. We reasonably suppose that the legislator does not object to omitting these conferences in the summer vacation time, when many are usually absent, while others are ailing or exhausted, and still others suffering from the heat. At these conferences moral or liturgical cases are to be solved and a discourse delivered on dogmatical or kindred subjects. These meetings must be attended by all the professed clerical students of theology and by those clerics present in the house who have already finished their course,[3] unless the constitutions prescribe otherwise. The holding of conferences is a strict duty and has always been inculcated. Attention must be paid also to can. 131.

3 This rule includes those who have been ordained. We believe that the conferences prescribed in can. 131 may licitly and reasonably be combined with these. Therefore all priests who have obtained faculties for hearing confessions must be present. Besides, if we interpret the term clerici professi strictly, all priests or professed clerical members (not lay-brothers) must attend these conferences.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XIII

THE OBLIGATIONS AND PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS

CHAPTER I

THE OBLIGATIONS

CAN. 592

Obligationibus communibus clericorum, de quibus in can. 124–142, etiam religiosi omnes tenentur, nisi ex contextu sermonis vel ex rei natura aliud constet.

The common obligations of clerics, as laid down in can. 124–142, also bind all religious, unless it appears otherwise from the context of the law or from the nature of the case.

These obligations have, we trust, been sufficiently explained in Vol. II. Note that some of them bind only the clergy, for instance, can. 126 concerning retreats, 120 concerning promptness in accepting the sacred ministry, can. 129–131 regarding study, annual examinations, and conferences, can. 135 respecting the recitation of the Breviary, 143 f. governing residence and incardination. These do not apply to female religious. Some of them do not even concern male religious as such, e. g., can. 128, which is not intended for clerical religious who have made perpetual vows, because can. 585 excardinates them, and unless in case of strict necessity the bishop is not entitled to compel exempt religious to assume the ministry. Other obligations, for instance, as to wearing the clerical dress (can. 126), if this is not distinct from the religious habit, abstaining from worldly and prohibited occupations and amusements (can. 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142) oblige all religious of both sexes.[1] Can. 133, concerning housekeepers, obliges religious who are parish priests or act as such.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 593

Omnes et singuli religiosi, Superiores aeque ac subditi, debent, non solum quae nuncuparunt vota fideliter integreque servare, sed etiam secundum regulas et constitutiones propriae religionis vitam componere atque ita ad perfectionem sui status contendere.

All religious, superiors as well as subjects, are bound not only to observe faithfully and entirely the vows they have taken, but also to order their lives according to the rules and constitutions of the institute to which they belong, and thus tend to the perfection of their state.

The legislator exhorts all religious to live the life required by their state. Superiors are not exempt from the observance of the vows, although with them the vow of obedience is seemingly in abeyance. Yet they too are bound by the rule and the constitutions, from which they are not allowed to deviate except in so far as their office or dignity requires, and in so far as they could exempt their own subjects. Besides the lower superiors owe obedience to the higher, and the higher to the Pope and his lawful representatives. The Code binds them all to the fullest extent, unless privileges, sound interpretation, or approved constitutions grant them the right of dispensing or changing in certain cases.

1 Benedict XIV, Apostolicum ministerium, May 30, 1753, § 18 (applying chiefly to England).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) As to the power of dispensation, a distinction must be made between exempt and non-exempt institutes. The superiors of an exempt religious institute enjoy this power to the same extent as diocesan Ordinaries and, like these, are bound by the regulations laid down in can. 81. Can. 1245 also has a place here because it refers directly to exempt clerical religious. Hence regular superiors of exempt institutes may dispense not only single members but the whole community from the law of fast and abstinence. Over non-exempt religious, the Ordinary or bishop in whose diocese the house is located, exercises this power. As to the dispensations required for ordination, religious superiors have no power, because whatever touches that subject belongs to the bishop.[2]

Religious superiors, whether exempt or not, may dispense single members, but not the whole community as such, at least as a rule, from the observance of the precepts contained in the rule or constitutions. However, they may, at times, because the constitutions themselves grant them that right, dispense the whole community from silence, or from a fast prescribed by the constitutions only and not by common law, and from similar obligations.

As to dispensation from penalties inflicted by the law (see Book V) and from irregularities, the superiors of exempt religious enjoy no more power than diocesan Ordinaries, apart from certain privileges granted to regulars concerning irregularities. With regard to penalties inflicted by the rule and constitutions, the superior general,[3] but not the inferior prelate, may relax them, without prejudice to the constitutions.

2 This is evident from the canons on ordination; whether the religious superior may declare one free from irregularity matters little if the Ordinary is not satisfied with his statement.

3 Or the abbot of every autonomous monastery.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning the dispensation from vows, note that the religious vows cannot, per se, be dispensed from by any superior. But the superior of a clerical exempt institute may dispense from vows that go beyond the three substantial vows, whilst the Ordinary has the same power with regard to non-exempt religious and vows not reserved.[4]

b) As to the changing or commutation of vows, or promises made in the form of vows, the Code says that a change into a lesser or less perfect work may be made by the one who has the power of dispensing, provided, of course, the vow be not one of those reserved.[5]

In cases in which the superiors are entitled to dispense their subjects, they may also dispense themselves,[6] although it is wisely added by canonists that they should not do so except through their confessors.[7]

Finally, the superiors of a religious institute may not change the rule or constitutions which are approved by the Holy See. Hence any substantial change of the same must be submitted to the supreme authority. However, this does not exclude the admission of usages which do not affect the substance of the rule and the constitutions. On the other hand it is also certain that a mitigation introduced by custom and approved by the Holy See cannot be abolished except by the Holy See, although a general chapter could adopt a stricter reformation. Should the Holy See formally impose the abolition of such a mitigation, the religious would be obliged to obey, though in that case members who made profession under the mitigated rule or constitutions could scarcely be obliged to accept the reformation, at least if new austerities were

4 Cfr. can. 1313.
5 Can. 1314.
6 Can. 201, § 3.
7 Cfr. Piatus M., I, p. 571 (ed. 2). Concerning the power of absolution we refer to Book III (Confession) and Book V (Censures).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

imposed,[8] for they had no intention to take upon themselves such "extras."

This leads to the consideration of the question what the vow of obedience means for all religious.

(1) The vow of obedience is a promise made to God, by which one obliges himself to obey the religious institute one enters and its lawful superiors.

(2) The extent of this vow is commensurate with the rule and the constitutions, but goes no further. However, not only what is explicitly stated in the rule and constitutions falls under the vow of obedience, but also all acts which are necessary for the preservation of the institute itself and for the observance of the rule or constitutions. Thus mutual charity and fraternal obligations, charges and offices of the institute, just penalties and appropriate and moderate exercises, though not expressly stated, oblige by reason of obedience. To read more into the rules and constitutions is absurd, because the religious must have an objective norm. Besides no religious is bound to obey, by reason of the vow, if his superior commands something foolish, indifferent or impossible, or something which would cause serious damage or danger to the religious. On the other hand religious should obey their superior when he commands a reasonable internal act, for instance, the application of a Holy Mass[9] for a certain purpose.

There is a limit to religious obedience set by the common law of the Church. As those inferior to the Ro-

8 V. Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Regul., p. 129 f.; p. 224.

9 Piatus M., I, p. 288. However it is evident that the internal act must in some way be connected either with the vows or the regular discipline and the rule or constitutions, which all tend to external observance; thus a superior might prohibit saying the office privately during a conventual missa cantata, if the singing in common or ceremonies would suffer thereby; otherwise there would be neither a moral nor a juridical reason for such a prohibition.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

man Pontiff have no power, in general at least, against the common law, so neither is a religious bound to obey a superior commanding anything opposed to that law. Neither is a religious obliged to obey a superior who is notoriously deprived of his office,[10] excommunicated or suspended.[11]

LIFE IN COMMON AND POVERTY

CAN. 594

§ 1. In quavis religione vita communis accurate ab omnibus servetur etiam in iis quae ad victum, ad vestitum et ad supellectilem pertinent.

§ 2. Quidquid a religiosis, etiam a Superioribus, acquiritur ad normam can. 580, § 2, et can. 582, n. 1, bonis domus, provinciae vel religionis admisceatur, et pecunia quaelibet omnesque tituli in capsa communi deponantur.

§ 3. Religiosorum supellex paupertati conveniat quam professi sunt.

§ 1. In every religious institute all must carefully observe the common life even in matters of food, clothing, and furniture.

§ 2. Whatever is acquired by the religious, including the superiors, according to can. 580, § 2, and can. 582, n. 1, must be incorporated in the goods of the house, or of the province, or of the institute; and all money and titles shall be deposited in the common safe.

§ 3. The furniture of the religious must be in accordance with the poverty of which they make profession.

St. Benedict in his Rule (c. 1) mentions four kinds of monks, two of whom were a pretty bad lot, sarabites and the gyrovagi, loafers or ramblers going about 10 Piatus M., II, 639. 11 Cfr. can. 2264, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the garb of religious. In the twelfth century Innocent II tried to do away with all kinds of religious who would not lead a common life. What he meant by that phrase is explained by the words: "in the church, in the refectory, and in the dormitory."[12] These three localities indicate almost perfectly the conditions of community life, and no doubt the Code has these three places in view. The church or chapel unites the religious in the praise of God, the dining-room in fraternal charity, and the dormitory in peaceful rest. Of course, recreation, which is but another sort of rest, is also included. Hence an ostentatious avoidance of the recreation-room would show a lack of community spirit.

The Code mentions three things in particular which pertain to a life in common: food, dress, and furniture. Of course this is intended only for healthy members of the community, because reason dictates that the sick and delicate require special care, and the Decretals provided for emergencies.[13] A decree of the S. C. EE. et RR. also mentions uniformity in the employment of medicine and in traveling.[14] However, as to medicine we must reckon with modern methods and leave particulars to the physicians. Only extravagance must be avoided. Travelling, too, is to be judged in the light of modern conveniences (automobiles, etc.), and according to the custom of the country, which, with us, permits the use of a sleeping car for a night's rest.

§ 2 says that whatever is acquired by the religious, including the superiors, either by personal effort or in the form of presents given for the benefit of the house, or of 12 C. 25, C. 18, q. 2. The S. C. EE. et RR., April 22, 1851, forbade superiors, who had not professed a life in common, to reside in a house where the common life is observed (Bizzari, l. c., p. 852).

13 C. 6, X, III, 35; cfr. Reg. S. Bened., c. 37.

14 Cfr. Bizzarri, l. c., p. 44.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the province, or of the institute (can. 580) belongs to the community. Money or property may also come by inheritance or donations inter vivos (can. 580, 1°). All such acquisitions go into the common treasury.

Is a religious entitled to refuse a donation? A free donation to which the religious is in nowise entitled, he may refuse, because it depends on mere acceptance, which is not an act of dominion. He would, however, offend against charity by refusing a donation if the house or institute to which he belongs were needy. A religious would commit a sin against the vow of poverty if he would refuse a bequest or legacy coming to him by inheritance, or to which he was otherwise entitled, because he would refuse what belonged by right to his institute,[15] supposing the institute to be capable of possessing property.

Another question arises, on account of a decision of the S. C. Rel., July 13, 1913. It was asked, whether a religious of either solemn or simple vows, who had written a book during the time of his profession, was allowed to donate or alienate the manuscript quocumque titulo? The answer was "Negative." [16] In order to understand this decision,— which caused some surprise,— it must be remembered that an author, whether he be professed with simple or solemn vows, has full proprietorship over his manuscripts as long as they remain in his hands, so that no superior can compel him to have them published or otherwise make use of them. A manuscript is intellectual property to which the author has a natural right. This right is not denied by that decision. But if the author would donate said manuscript to another, an outsider not a member of his institute, or sell it for any consideration, his ownership would cease, because donation

15 Piatus M., I, p. 244.

16 A. Ap. S., V, 366.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or alienation are acts of dominion. However, this decision is not in keeping with some papal constitutions, especially that of Clement VIII, "Religiosae congregationes," which permits religious to donate manuscripts one to another, and that of Benedict XIII ("Postulat") which allows religious who are promoted to the episcopate to take their manuscripts with them.[17] These constitutions are certainly as weighty as any particular decision of a Roman Congregation. We believe the reason for that decision was to ward off the danger of avoiding the necessary imprimatur, which is required especially for religious.

No doubt may be raised as to the right of a religious community to the royalties and copyrights belonging to its members under the laws of the country.

With regard to paintings and sculptures, canonists[18] draw a distinction: if the material was furnished by the community, the product belongs to the latter, not to the individual artist; but if an outsider has furnished the materials (paint, canvas, brushes, marble, stone, silver, gold, etc.), the work belongs to him.

The next clause touches the common treasury, and indirectly the peculium. Where the common life is observed as it should be, this rule is safe. But niggardly and miserly treatment of religious is the quickest road to private property (peculium). There is no one thing for which the founders of the early religious orders and the laws of the Church had greater horror than this.[19] And,

17 Piatus M., I, p. 243. As long as no other decisions are forthcoming, we cling to the old sententia communissima, based as it is on papal constitutions, which allowed full possession of manuscripts to the author; the natural law cannot be overthrown by one particular decision.

18 Piatus M., I, p. 243; what we say in the text is to be taken in the sense that the material would be of considerable value.

19 Reg. S. Bened., c. 55; cfr. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google indeed, a peculium of which the superior knows nothing and over which he has no control, is incompatible with the vow of poverty, supposing, of course, that the religious are treated fairly. On the other hand, the practice of having a peculium in common, with the permission of the superior, such as exists here and there in Europe, where it was brought about by the civil government, cannot be rejected as unlawful or against the Code, though, strictly speaking, it is not in conformity with the spirit of poverty.

CAN. 595

§ 1. Curent Superiores ut omnes religiosi:

1.° Quotannis spiritualibus exercitiis vacent;

2.° Legitime non impediti quotidie Sacro intersint, orationi mentali vacent, et in alia pietatis officia, quae a regulis et constitutionibus praescripta sint, sedulo incumbant;

3.° Ad poenitentiae sacramentum semel saltem in hebdomada accedant.

§ 2. Superiores suos inter subditos promoveant frequentem, etiam quotidianam, sanctissimi Corporis Christi receptionem; frequens autem, imo etiam quotidianus accessus ad sanctissimam Eucharistiam religiosis rite dispositis libere pateat.

§ 3. Si autem post ultimam sacramentalem confessionem religiosus communitati gravi scandalo fuerit aut gravem et externam culpam patraverit, donec ad poenitentiae sacramentum denuo accesserit, Superior potest eum, ne ad sacram communionem accedat, prohibere.

§ 4. Si quae sint religiones votorum sive sollemnium

11, C. 12, q. 1 (St. Aug.); c. 25, C. 18, q. 2; cc. 2, 4, 6, X, III, 35. The religious who after death was found to have had property, was to be buried in non-consecrated ground, or his body, if possible, to be exhumed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sive simplicium, quarum in regulis aut constitutionibus vel etiam calendariis communiones aliquibus diebus affixae aut iussae reperiantur, hae normae vim dumtaxat directivam habent.

This canon draws the attention of superiors to some special obligations of piety. They should take care:

§ 1. That all the religious make an annual spiritual retreat; that those not lawfully excused daily assist at Mass and faithfully perform the other exercises prescribed by the rule and constitutions; and that they go to confession at least once a week.[20]

§ 2. Superiors should promote amongst their subjects frequent, even daily reception of Holy Communion; and liberty must be given to every properly disposed religious to approach frequently, even daily, the Most Holy Eucharist. Of this exhortation enough was said and written — though not always with due regard to historical facts — when the decree of Pius X, "Sacra Tridentina Synodus," was promulgated, Dec. 20, 1905. We may note that this decree need no longer be read at table, as its substance is embodied in the Code.[21]

§ 3. If a religious has, since his last confession, given grave scandal to the community, or committed a serious external fault, the superior can forbid him to receive Holy Communion until he shall have again approached the Sacrament of Penance. Note the two different clauses: grave scandal and serious external fault. The two are not necessarily connected. To stay away from the common exercises without excuse or reason may give scandal and yet not involve a serious fault. To strike a superior or co-religious might be grievously sinful and 20 We believe that the custom of going to confession every other week in large communities may be tolerated, if the members are allowed to go oftener.

21 Cfr. can. 509, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

yet, if done quietly, not cause grave scandal. Still, in both cases the superior would be entitled to forbid the religious to approach the Sacred Table. This is a ruling taken from the decree "Quemadmodem," Dec. 17, 1890, which, by the way, has now lost its penal sanction.

§ 4. If in any institute, whether of solemn or simple vows, the rules or the constitutions or even the calendars assign or prescribe certain fixed days for the reception of Holy Communion, such regulations are to be regarded as merely directive.

This paragraph is taken from the decree on frequent communion, "Sacra Tridentina," and means that no real obligation can be derived from said regulations, and hence the superiors must not urge their observance in virtue of the vow of obedience.

THE RELIGIOUS HABIT

CAN. 596

Religiosi omnes proprium suae religionis habitum deferant tum intra tum extra domum, nisi gravis causa excuset, iudicio Superioris maioris aut, urgente necessitate, etiam localis.

All religious should wear the habit of their institute both inside and outside the house, unless a weighty reason excuses them, according to the judgment of the higher, or, in urgent cases, of the local superior. This rule is taken from the Decretals and the Council of Trent.[22] It has, as is well known, been modified for our country,[23] and missionary countries generally. On days when the mercury occasionally shows more than 100 degrees, the contrary custom may be adopted without misgiving.

22 C. 2; 6°, III, 24; c. 2, Clem. III, 1; Trid., sess. 25, c. 19, de reg.

23 Conc. Balt. III., n. 17; cfr. can. 136.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ENCLOSURE

The nature of coenobitism requires a solitary or retired mode of life. Hence the saying, "As a fish cannot live outside the water, so neither can a monk live outside the monastery." [24] St. Benedict wished to see the monasteries built in such a way that the monks would have no excuse to go outside.[25] St. Gregory the Great expressed to a certain Abbot (Valentine) his surprise that women entered his monastery indiscriminately and called upon the monks to be god-fathers of their children. He forbids the continuation of this lax practice absolutely.[26] The decree of Gratian as well as the well known chapter "Periculoso" of Boniface VIII insist upon enclosure, especially of convents of nuns, and the Tridentine Council enforced these laws vigorously.[27] Later papal constitutions insisted upon them and admitted a mitigation only in favor of founders and ruling princes and princesses.[28] (Cfr. Pius IX, "Apostolicae Sedis," Oct. 12, 1869.) Yet in spite of the endeavor of Pius V to put all female congregations under the same strict laws, practice and theory soon began to distinguish between papal and episcopal enclosure. The former, or strict, enclosure is imposed only on regulars, or, more precisely, those institutes whose members take solemn vows, especially the female orders. The episcopal enclosure is less strict and open to a wider interpretation. The penalties inflicted by law for a violation of the papal may not be applied to the episcopal enclosure. This premised, the Code first treats of 24 C. 8, C. 16, q. 1, which must, however, be taken with a grain of salt.

25 Reg., c. 66.

26 Regist. Greg. M., I, 40 (ed. Hartmann-Ewald).

27 Cfr. c. 1, C. 16, q. 1; c. un. 6°, III, 16; Trid., sess. 25, c. 5, de reg.

28 See the quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition of the Code.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAPAL ENCLOSURE

CAN. 597

§ 1. In domibus regularium sive virorum sive mulierum canonice constitutis, etiam non formatis, servetur clausura papalis.

§ 2. Lege clausurae papalis afficitur tota domus quam communitas regularis inhabitat, cum hortis et viridariis accessui religiosorum reservatis; excluso, praeter publicum templum cum continente sacrario, etiam hospitio pro advenis, si adsit, et collocutorio, quod, quantum fieri potest, prope ianuam domus constitui debet.

§ 3. Partes clausurae legi obnoxiae patenter indicentur; Superioris vero maioris vel Capituli generalis secundum constitutiones, aut, si agatur de monasterio monialium, Episcopi erit clausurae fines accurate praescribere aut legitimis de causis mutare.

§ 1. In canonically erected houses of regulars, even though they are not formatae, of men as well as women, the papal enclosure must be observed. When a house is canonically erected, must be deduced from the approval or permission of the Holy See and of the Ordinary. It is evident that before the regulars move in, there is no enclosure. The text says that even in houses which are not formatae, i. e., have less than six members, the enclosure must be observed. This must, of course, be understood only of a canonically erected house. A so-called priory or expositura or grangia (farm house or summer resort, villa, villeggiatura) is not a canonically erected house, even though inhabited by more than six members at a time.

§ 2. The law of papal enclosure affects the whole house

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

inhabited by the regular community, including the orchards and gardens reserved to the religious, but not the public church with its sacristy, the guest-house, if there be one, and the parlor, which latter should, where possible, be placed near the entrance to the house. Note carefully the wording of the text, because it mitigates the opinion of some authors.[29] The sacristy is exempt from enclosure, even if it has two doors, of which one leads to the enclosure, provided it immediately adjoins the church. Should another room separate it from the church, the enclosure would have to be applied. As to the gardens and viridaria, the text does not require that a wall or hedge should separate them from the enclosure proper; it suffices that they be so reserved to the regulars that no one else is allowed access. Viridaria, properly speaking, are places set with trees and plants, hence orchards, parks, etc., also places for games. Whether these fall under the law of enclosure must be determined by § 3.

§ 3. The parts of the house subject to the law of enclosure must be clearly indicated; it pertains to the higher superior or to the general chapter according to the constitutions, or, in the case of a monastery of nuns, to the Bishop, to determine exactly the limits of the enclosure or to modify them for lawful reasons. This paragraph gives a wide scope to the superiors. However, it is evident that no superior may change the boundaries of the enclosure ad hoc, i. e., for a case of emergency, for instance, to introduce a party into certain rooms, in order to evade the canonical penalty.

Once fixed, the boundaries must remain, unless cogent reasons make a change lawful. Besides, the boundaries [29] Cfr. Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. Conventus, art. III, n. 9 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

must be clearly indicated, not only to the regulars themselves, but also to outsiders, for instance, by a sign inscribed, "Private Entrance" or "Positively No Admittance." The superiors and officials should carefully see to it that no freedom of way or servitude arises from allowing strangers to walk over the private property of the community. This might cause trouble and unnecessary lawsuits.

ENCLOSURE OF MALE RELIGIOUS

CAN. 598

§ 1. Intra regularium virorum clausuram ne admittantur mulieres cuiusvis aetatis, generis aut conditionis sub quovis praetextu.

§ 2. Eximuntur ab hac lege uxores eorum qui supremum actu tenent populorum principatum, cum comitatu.

§ 1. Into the enclosure of male regulars women of whatever age, class, or condition may not under any pretext be admitted.

§ 2. From this law are exempt the wives of actual rulers of states with their retinue.

The text excludes all members of the female sex, including children, which latter it had been customary to admit. What genus, which the authorized translation renders by "class," means, is not so easy to determine. It may signify birth, family, but also kin, and thus have the meaning of descent or blood relationship. Thus interpreted, even the female relatives of regulars are excluded. If it is taken to mean birth it would refer to nobility; but this seems to be included in conditio. Conditio may signify social status or position, rank, profession, office. No matter how "blue-blooded" a person may be, if a woman,[30] she is excluded.[31]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 makes one exception, viz., in favor of the wives of actual rulers. There is little danger that any community of regulars in this country will receive such a visit. The President's wife, and the governor's wife, we are sorry to say, are not included in this privilege, because their husbands are not actual rulers in the commonly accepted sense of the word. If the wife of a European monarch should visit a monastery in our country, the law would admit her, because the text does not limit the privilege to their own country.

COLLEGE OR SCHOOL ENCLOSURE

CAN. 599

§ 1. Si domus regularium virorum adnexum habeat convictum pro alumnis internis vel alia opera religionis propria, separata saltem aedis pars, si fieri possit, religiosorum habitationi reservetur, clausurae legi subiecta.

§ 2. Etiam in loca extra clausuram alumnis externis aut internis vel operibus religionis propriis reservata, personae alterius sexus, nisi aequa de causa et de Superioris licentia, ne admittantur.

§ 1. When a house of male regulars has annexed to it a college for boarding pupils, or for other works proper to the institute, a separate part at least of the house should, if possible, be reserved for the habitation of the religious, and subject to the law of enclosure.

§ 2. Even to places outside the enclosure reserved for extern or intern pupils or for works proper to the insti-

30 Hermaphrodites of the male sex prevailingly, might be admitted, 31 Pius V, Regularium, Oct. 24, 1566; Benedict XIV, Regularis disciplinae, Jan. 3, 1742.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tute, persons of the other sex should not be admitted except for a just reason and with the permission of the superior.

This enactment sounds more like a guiding norm —" if possible "— than a strict law, and hence it would be uncanonical to apply the full vigor of papal enclosure to these institutes.

PAPAL ENCLOSURE OF NUNS; ADMISSION OF OUTSIDERS

CAN. 600

Intra monialium clausuram nemo, cuiusvis generis, conditionis, sexus, aetatis admittatur sine Sanctae Sedis licentia, exceptis personis quae sequuntur:

1.° Ordinario loci aut Superiori regulari, monasterium monialium visitantibus vel aliis Visitatoribus ab ipsis delegatis licet clausuram ingredi dumtaxat inspectionis causa, cautoque ut unus saltem clericus vel religiosus vir maturae aetatis eos comitetur;

2.° Confessarius vel qui eius vices gerit potest, cum debitis cautelis, ingredi clausuram ad ministranda Sacramenta infirmis aut ad assistendum morientibus;

3.° Possunt clausuram ingredi qui supremum actu tenent populorum principatum eorumque uxores cum comitatu; itemque S. R. E. Cardinales;

4.° Antistitae est, adhibitis debitis cautelis, ingressum permittere medicis, chirurgis, aliisque quorum opera sit necessaria, impetrata prius saltem habituali approbatione ab Ordinario loci; si vero necessitas urgeat nec tempus suppetat approbationem petendi, haec iure praesumitur.

No one, of whatever class, condition, sex or age, may, without papal permission, be permitted within the enclosure of nuns, except the following persons:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° The canonical visitator or his delegate, who must be accompanied by a clergyman or religious;

2.° The confessor or his substitute, to administer the sacraments to the sick or to assist the dying;

3.° Rulers of states with their wives and suite, and also cardinals;

4.° After taking due precautions, the superioress may permit the physician, the surgeon, and others whose work is necessary, to enter the enclosure, having previously obtained at least the habitual approval of the local Ordinary, which permission may be presumed in cases which suffer no delay.

Note the difference between the papal enclosure of regulars and that of nuns. The latter admits not even women. The so-called educande (pupils) were admitted under a papal permission granted to that effect.

The "debitae cautelae" or precautions concerning confessors provide that a religious must be accompanied by another religious, whereas a secular priest needs no companion, but must wear stole and surplice. As to laymen, they must be of good moral character, and should not tarry within the enclosure before sunrise or after sunset.[82] This rule, of course, is not always applicable to physicians and surgeons.

DUTY OF NUNS TO KEEP WITHIN THEIR ENCLOSURE

CAN. 601

§ 1. Nemini monialium liceat post professionem exire e monasterio, etiam ad breve tempus, quovis praetextu, sine speciali Sanctae Sedis indulto, excepto

82 Cfr. Greg. XIII, "Deo Sacris," Dec. 30, 1572; Alexander VII, "Felici," Oct. 20, 1664; Bachofen, Compendium Iuris Reg., p. 163 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

casu imminentis periculi mortis vel alius gravissimi mali.

§ 2. Hoc periculum, si tempus suppetat, scripto recognoscendum est loci Ordinario.

No nun, after profession, may, under whatever pretext, leave the monastery even for a short time, without a special papal indult, except in the case of imminent danger of death or other very serious evil; and this danger, if time permits, must be recognized as such by the local Ordinary in writing.

The Code almost verbally rehearses former laws,[33] which seem somewhat rigorous to modern students, but were most reasonable. Danger of death would be a fire or threatening collapse of the building, a flood, devastation brought about by war, danger of defloration, etc. A Sister suffering from a contagious disease may leave the convent; and, we believe, also one compelled to undergo an operation which could not be safely performed in the convent. The judgment of the sufficiency of the reason lies with the Ordinary, and in urgent cases with the superioress.[34]

CAN. 602

Clausura monasterii monialium ita circumsepta esse debet ut, quoad fieri potest, nullus sit in eam vel ab ea prospectus externarum personarum.

The enclosure of every monastery of nuns should be protected on every side in such a manner as to prevent, as 33 Cfr. Pius V, "Decori," Feb. 1, 1570.

34 The Regesta S. C. EE. et RR. contain a great number of permissions granted to nuns, especially of Portugal, who wished to go to health resorts; they were to travel in a closed carriage with the curtains down, accompanied by two other Sisters, and without a prolonged stop.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

far as possible, those within from being seen by, or seeing, persons outside. Of course, if the ecclesiastical authorities could always enforce their laws,— as they formerly did in the Papal States,[35]— this canon might also be insisted upon. But a little more light and air would not hurt the nuns.

Can. 603

§ 1. Clausura monialium, etsi regularibus subiectarum, sub vigilantia est Ordinarii loci, qui potest delinquentes, regularibus viris non exceptis, poenis quoque ac censuris corrigere et coercere.

§ 2. Etiam Superiori regulari custodia clausurae monialium sibi subiectarum commissa est, qui moniales aut alios suos subditos, si quid hac in re deliquerint, poenis quoque punire potest.

The Ordinary of the diocese must diligently watch over the observance of the enclosure of nuns, even those subject to regulars; he must also punish offenders, not excepting male regulars, even with penalties and censures. The regular superiors must do the same and duly punish nuns or other subjects who violate the enclosure.

Enclosure of Religious Congregations

Can. 604

§ 1. In domibus etiam Congregationum religiosarum sive pontificii sive dioecesani iuris clausura servetur, in quam nemo alterius sexus admittatur, nisi ii de quibus in can. 598, § 2 et can. 600, aliique quos ex iustis ac rationabilibus causis Superiores admitti posse censuerint.

35 A proprietor who had raised his house too high and built too many windows, which permitted a view into a convent, had to change it. (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 81.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Praescriptum can. 599 etiam domibus Congregationum religiosarum sive virorum sive mulierum applicetur.

§ 3. Episcopus in adiunctis peculiaribus, gravibusque intercedentibus causis, potest hanc clausuram, nisi agatur de religione clericali exempta, censuris munire; semper autem curet ut eadem rite servetur et quidquid in eam irrepat vitii corrigatur.

Here we meet the so-called episcopal enclosure, which must be observed in the houses of religious congregations, whether approved by the Holy See or the diocesan Ordinary. Into their enclosure, says § 1, no one of the other sex is to be admitted, except actual rulers and the persons mentioned in can. 600; but the superiors (both higher and local, because the Code does not determine which), may admit other persons of either sex for just and reasonable motives. Such a motive would be, e. g., a visit of relatives, good friends or benefactors, parents of pupils, etc.

§ 2 applies can. 599 to these congregations, whether of men or women.

§ 3 says that the bishop may, in particular circumstances and for grave reasons, safeguard the enclosure by censures, except in the case of an exempt clerical institute. Always, however, he should see to it that the episcopal enclosure is duly observed, and correct any abuses that may arise. Such an abuse would be a case of episcopal reservation, reserved to the bishop himself, but not by law. However, as censures in general, and especially reserved ones, should be few and inflicted only for grave reasons, it is evident that these reasons would have to be very particular; for instance, if scandal should have occurred, or if the community would do only housework which would exclude communication with the outer world. Yet, at any rate, the enclosure would always be episcopal, not papal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VISITS

CAN. 605

Omnes quibus est clausurae custodia, sedulo advigilent ne, alienis invisentibus, inutili collocutione disciplina perturbetur et spiritus religiosus detrimentum patiatur.

All those who have the custody of the enclosure shall carefully see lest, from intercourse with outsiders, the discipline be relaxed and the religious spirit weakened by useless conversation. This rule is intended not only for the superiors, but for the master or mistress of guests as well as for the doorkeeper and those who receive visitors.

As Cardinal Gasparri's edition draws our attention to the point, a word may here be added concerning the access of regulars and laymen to convents of nuns. A strict prohibition was always maintained concerning regulars,[36] and the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars added very severe regulations with regard to their visits. Lay persons were more easily admitted, but not during Lent, Advent, on vigils or feast-days. Our Code mentions nothing respecting these visits. Hence the former strict regulations, unless they are inculcated in the respective constitutions, may be considered as abrogated.

[36] C. un. 6°, III, 16; S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 6, 1838 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 437 f.). Such visits were, of course, allowed only at the grates.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXIT FROM ENCLOSURE

CAN. 606

§ 1. Curent Superiores religiosi ut accurate observentur quae sive circa egressum subditorum e claustris, sive circa excipiendos vel adeundos extraneos, in propriis constitutionibus praescripta sunt.

§ 2. Superioribus fas non est, salvis praescriptis in can. 621–624, permittere ut subditi extra domum propriae religionis degant, nisi gravi et iusta de causa atque ad tempus quo fieri potest brevius secundum constitutiones; pro absentia vero quae sex menses excedat, nisi causa studiorum intercedat, semper Apostolicae Sedis venia requiritur.

§ 1. Religious superiors must take care that the rules laid down in their constitutions be faithfully observed regarding the egress of subjects from the cloister, or their receiving visits from, or paying visits to, outsiders.

§ 2. Religious superiors may not allow their subjects to stay outside the house of their own institute except for a just and grave cause and for as short a time as possible. But for an absence of more than six months, unless for study, the permission of the Holy See is always required.

To keep religious from wandering about, Ordinaries were formerly commissioned to send them back each to his own house.[37] Alexander III (A. D. 1180) forbade religious to leave their monasteries in order to frequent lectures on civil law and physical science.[38] We have read many grants of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars touching upon the study of civil law. Now our Code grants them that permission in general, saving the disposition of can. 587, § 4. The lawgiver makes no distinc-

[37] C. 7, X, I, 31.

[38] C. 3, X, III, 50.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion as to branches of study or private studies, in a library, for instance, or archives.

CAN. 607

Antistitae et Ordinarii locorum serio advigilent ne religiosae, citra casum necessitatis, singulae extra domum pergant.

The superioresses and local Ordinaries shall carefully watch that Sisters do not leave the house singly, without a companion, except in case of necessity.

ASSISTANCE IN THE SACRED MINISTRY

CAN. 608

§ 1. Curent Superiores ut religiosi subditi, a se designati, praesertim in dioecesi in qua degunt, cum a locorum Ordinariis vel parochis eorum ministerium requiritur ad consulendum populi necessitati, tum intra tum extra proprias ecclesias aut oratoria publica, illud, salva religiosa disciplina, libenter praestent.

§ 2. Vicissim locorum Ordinarii ac parochi libenter utantur opera religiosorum, praesertim in dioecesi degentium, in sacro ministerio et maxime in administrando sacramento poenitentiae.

The religious superiors should always be ready to lend a helping hand, especially if their own Ordinary or a pastor of their diocese calls for assistance in attending to the needs of the people; and this help should be granted willingly not only to the churches and public oratories subject to religious, but also to others, as far as compatible with religious discipline. On the other hand it is but meet that the local Ordinary and parish priests should employ religious, especially those living in the diocese,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for the sacred ministry, and particularly for the administration of the Sacrament of Penance. The text is sufficiently clear. But a question connected with the subject may be mooted: Are religious obliged to go on such errands in virtue of obedience? We answer, if the religious character of the community excludes outside work in the sacred ministry, in other words, if the order is exclusively monastic, the members are not obliged to obey. If, however, the order or community is of a clerical nature and aims at procuring the spiritual welfare of others, the religious are not at liberty to refuse the command of the superior.[39] In our country, as far as we are aware, the first-mentioned hypothesis would be verified only in the case of the Trappists, to some extent at least. Benedictines, Cistercians, and the congregations affiliated with them are no longer merely monastic. We may extend the case of obedience to the circumstances of an epidemic or contagious disease; because in that case obedience would demand that religious assist the secular clergy, provided the latter were doing their full duty.

PARISH CHURCHES IN CHARGE OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 609

§ 1. Si ecclesia, apud quam residet communitas religiosa, sit simul paroecialis, servetur, congrua congruis referendo, praescriptum can. 415.

§ 2. In ecclesia religiosarum a votis sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus paroecia erigi nequit.

§ 3. Advigilent Superiores ne divinorum officiorum in propriis ecclesiis celebratio catecheticae instructioni aut Evangelii explanationi in ecclesia paroeciali tra-

[39] Suarez, De Rel., tr. VIII, l. II, c. 8, n. 19 (ed. Paris., t. 16, 144); Piatus M., I, p. 288.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dendae nocumentum afferat; iudicium autem utrum nocumentum afferat, necne, ad loci Ordinarium pertinet.

§ 1. If the church attached to the residence of a religious community is at the same time a parish church, the prescriptions of can. 415 are, in due proportion, to be observed. These regulations should be carried out faithfully, because the government of the parish is in the hands of the religious who acts as pastor. To him, therefore, belong the duties of preaching, teaching catechism, applying the missa pro populo, etc. Not the religious superior but the pastor is entitled to assist at marriages or to perform funeral services or to baptize children. But, as he enjoys the rights, so he also has the obligations, as the natural law dictates.

§ 2. The churches of nuns or Sisters, whether with solemn or simple vows, cannot be parochial.

§ 3. This last paragraph, taken from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, shows the care which the Church wishes to see bestowed on parochial work. The religious superiors are commanded to see that the divine office in their own churches does not interfere with the catechetical instruction or the explanation of the Gospel given in the parochial church; it pertains to the local Ordinary to judge whether or not this hindrance exists. Benedict XIV says that the Pontiff would assist the bishop in carrying out his regulations. The welfare of souls is the first and supreme law.

CHOIR SERVICE AND MASS

CAN. 610

§ 1. In religionibus sive virorum sive mulierum, quibus est chori obligatio, in singulis domibus ubi qua-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tuor saltem sint religiosi choro obligati et actu legitime non impediti, et etiam pauciores, si ita ferant constitutiones, debet ad normam constitutionum quotidie divinum officium communiter persolvi.

§ 2. Missa quoque officio diei respondens secundum rubricas quotidie celebrari debet in religionibus virorum et etiam, quoad fieri possit, in religionibus mulierum.

§ 3. In eisdem religionibus sive virorum sive mulierum, sollemniter professi qui a choro abfuerunt, debent, exceptis conversis, horas canonicas privatim recitare.

It is a custom, nay, we might say, a customary law, that religious should chant or recite the divine office. Clement V insisted upon this service, not only in cathedral churches, but in all churches of religious, and exhorted them to recite the office with proper attention and devotion.[40] That St. Benedict devoted eleven chapters of his rule to this matter shows his intention of keeping the sacred fire burning. Hence it is not surprising that the Church imposed this duty on all religious whose constitutions prescribe the recitation of the divine office. Therefore, says § 1, all religious, whether male or female, who are obliged to choir service, are bound to perform it daily in every house in which there are at least four members who are not lawfully prevented, and even fewer if the constitutions so prescribe.

This obligation is a grievous one for all institutes whose constitutions prescribe choir service, and the superior is not allowed to dispense from it, except in case there be not sufficient members present to perform it. The Code rules that at least four members obliged to 40 C. 1, Clem. III, 14. Sometimes birds and dogs were brought into church!

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

choir service must be present in a house for which the choral obligation exists.[41] If the constitutions oblige the members to choir service even when less than four are present, they must be obeyed, even if four, or three, or two novices only were present who could perform the duty.[42] The community, as such, is under strict obligation to chant or recite the divine office, and a superior who would neglect his duty in this respect would be guilty of mortal sin.

On the other hand, single members, as such, are not obliged to choir service, at least not sub gravi, unless the rule or constitutions or the laws of foundation oblige them, or if the office could not be performed for lack of a sufficient number, or one would by his absence cause scandal to others.[43] Clement VIII, although very severe in inculcating the obligation, allowed superiors to grant a dispensation to choir members who are too much occupied with some special charge or office, e. g., procurators, oeconomi, prefects; also teachers and preachers on the days on which they preach and teach; finally those who are sickly or engaged in studies.[44]

Of nuns with solemn vows, only those are obliged to choir service whose rule or constitutions, approved by the Holy See, impose this obligation. This was decided by the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars, April 19, 1844.[45] The decision added that if a legitimate custom involved this obligation, the nuns would be bound to follow it. As to Sisters with simple vows, the same decision says that they are, as a rule, not obliged to choir service. Now the Code must be consulted, and therefore, should the 41 Innocent X, "Ut in parvis," Feb. 10, 1654, § 2.

42 Piatus M., I, 313.

43 Piatus M., I, 311 f.

44 "Nullus ommino," July 25, 1599, § 1. The latter class embraces those who publish and print books for the good of the Church; Piatus M., l. c., I, 314.

45 Cfr. Bizzarri, l. c., p. 495 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

constitutions approved by the Holy See oblige a community to choir service, the obligation must be complied with. Hence Dominican, Franciscan and Capuchin Tertiaries, regardless of the primitive rule of these orders, are obliged to choir service only if their constitutions expressly prescribe it. The same applies to Benedictine Sisters with simple vows; unless their approved constitutions oblige them to choir service they are not bound to render it, for the above-quoted decision clearly states: "ubi vero vota simplicia sint, non teneri."

As to the Breviary, the Constitution of Pius V, "Quod a nobis," July 9, 1568, says that those orders which have had their own Breviary for two hundred years prior to the date of said constitution, may retain it, whereas all others must adopt the Roman Breviary. The orders which had their own Breviary were allowed to adopt the Roman if the superior general and the chapter general favored the change.[46] The modern congregations must all follow the Roman Breviary.

With regard to nuns with solemn vows, what has just been said about regulars applies also to them, especially to those who are subject to regulars. Sisters with simple vows, if obliged for one reason or another to choir service, generally recite the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin, unless, by a strange mixture of ancient custom and modern legislation, they follow the rule of an order in reciting the full office.[47]

Concerning the calendar, this depends upon special indults granted by the Holy See (S. Rit. C.). Those religious who have the privilege of using their own calen-

46 Hence the Benedictines would be allowed, even now, to adopt the Breviary prescribed by Pius X's Constitution "Divino afflatu," Nov. 1, 1911; nor would St. Benedict's Rule (c. 18) be opposed to the change.

47 This is the case with some Benedictine Sisters of our country.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dar must follow it or adopt the diocesan calendar. Nuns subject to regular orders follow the calendar of these orders; others must follow the diocesan calendar, unless special indults grant them the use of their own calendar. Sisters with simple vows, with the sole exception of the Franciscans, must adopt the diocesan calendar, to which also their chaplain, even if he has his own ordo, must conform.[48] The Franciscan Sisters aggregated to any of the three branches (Brown Franciscans, Conventuals, Capuchins), although they recite only the Little Office of the B. M. V., are entitled to follow the calendar, Missal and Martyrology of their respective order.[49] Furthermore all regulars who govern a parish not incorporated, or entrusted to them only for a time, must use the diocesan calendar to which the people are accustomed.[50]

§ 2 of can. 610 says: the Mass corresponding to the office of the day according to the rubrics must be celebrated daily in the institutes of men and even, where possible, in the institutes of women. Regulars who are bound to choir service are certainly obliged to have one conventual Mass sung or read.[51] The same obligation is imposed on nuns who are obliged to choir service.[52] (The Code is not opposed to that statement, because the Mass is the principal part of the divine office.) But those who are not obliged to choir service are not bound by a strict obligation to have a conventual Mass, except "where possible." The possibility depends on many circumstances, for instance, whether they have a chaplain, or the means of supporting one, the locality, occupation, 48 S. Rit. C., July 17, 1896; July 9, 1895 (Decreta Auth., n. 3927, n. 3862).

49 S. Rit. C., Jan. 22, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., t. XIV, p. 106).

50 S. Rit. C., Feb. 4, 1908 (Decreta Auth., n. 3779).

51 But they are not obliged to two conventual masses; S. Rit. C., Dec. 2, 1891 (Decreta Auth., n. 3757).

52 Piatus M., I, p. 327.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and so forth. The same is true, a fortiori, of Sisters with simple vows. As to the locality, can. 1192 must be consulted with regard to semi-public oratories, which may only be erected with the permission of the Ordinary, who must inform himself as to proper construction.[53] In these semi-public oratories the number of masses is not limited (can. 1193).

As to rubrics, the mass must correspond to the office of the day. Where the office of the day is not recited, the calendar or ordo must be followed. The chaplain is supposed to know the rubrics. We will only add that Mass is generally said after the Tierce (or Sext, or None, as the rubrics prescribe) and the color of the feast must be used, unless a votive Mass or missa de requie is permitted.

§ 3 says that religious men or women with solemn vows are obliged to the private recitation of the divine office if they have been absent from choir. Lay brothers are excepted. This rule, of course, applies only to such religious as are obliged to choir service. Can. 135 obliges all clergymen in sacris to the recitation of the divine office, from which they are excused only by physical or moral impossibility. If some particular constitutions oblige lay brothers to the recitation of the Little Office of the B. M. V. this obligation does not entail a strict duty,[54] though the prayers prescribed must, of course, be said.

53 The chapel must not be a mere hallway, nor may a bedroom be placed immediately above the sanctuary, it must be decently furnished and neatly kept.

54 S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 29, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., XIV, p. 209 f.; Congreg. Bavarica O. S. B.); April 19, 1844 (Bizzarri, p. 495 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

. LETTERS NOT SUBJECT TO INSPECTION

CAN. 611

Omnes religiosi sive viri sive mulieres, libere possunt mittere litteras, nulli obnoxias inspectioni, ad Sanctam Sedem eiusque in natione Legatum, ad Cardinalem Protectorem, ad proprios Superiores maiores, ad Superiorem domus forte absentem, ad Ordinarium loci cui subiecti sint et, si agatur de monialibus quae sub regularium iurisdictione sunt, etiam ad Superiores maiores Ordinis; et ab istis omnibus praedicti religiosi, viri aut mulieres, litteras item nemini inspiciendas recipere.

All religious, whether men or women, can freely send letters, exempt from all control, to the Holy See and its legate in the country, to their Cardinal Protector, to their own higher superiors, to the superior of their house when absent, to the local Ordinary to whom they are subject, and, in the case of nuns subject to regulars, to the higher superiors of the order; and from all these persons the religious, men or women, can also receive letters which nobody has the right to open.

We add only one thought, which has often struck our inquiring mind. Authors, especially moralists, base the right of inspecting letters sent to religious on the necessity of maintaining the religious discipline. But they never mention the natural right which those outside the house have to privacy and secrecy of correspondence. It is acknowledged by all that letters should never be opened or read by persons not concerned. Is a religious superior by virtue of his office entitled to know the secrets of the family of a religious? Has he any right to make use of that knowledge? This is privileged knowledge, and we fail to see how it can be conducive to the right government of his subjects. Besides the manifestation of conscience not being to be extorted, we fail to see into the claim of knowing the conscience of others.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLIC WORSHIP

CAN. 612

Praeter praescriptum can. 1345, si loci Ordinarius ob causam publicam sonitum campanarum, preces aliquas vel sacra sollemnia indicat, religiosi omnes, etiam exempti, obedire debent, salvis constitutionibus et privilegiis suae cuiusque religionis.

Besides the prescription of can. 1345, if the local Ordinary from a motive of public utility prescribes the ringing of the bells, certain prayers or sacred solemnities, all religious, even those exempt, must obey, without prejudice to the constitutions and privileges of each institute.

Can. 1345 rules that the Ordinary is entitled to command religious, even those exempt, to impart a brief instruction in their own churches on feast-days if the people assist at the service. As to the ringing of bells, the recitation of prayers, and solemn services, the Ordinary may command them only for a public cause. Such a one would be war, a public calamity, the election of a pope or the bishop's taking possession of the diocese. Regulars must also insert the imperata commanded by the Ordinary, and are not allowed to quit saying it at will.[55] From this injunction of the Ordinary no appeal is permissible,[56] although the privileges of the orders are not thereby touched or revoked. Thus, according to Pius V's Constitution, "Etsi mendicantium," May 16, 1567, Ordi-

55 S. Rit. C., April 3, 1821 (Decreta Auth., n. 2613 ad 1 et 2).

56 Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1743.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

naries are not allowed to prohibit regulars from ringing the bells or celebrating the office whenever they please.[57]

[57] S. C. EE. et RR., March 11, 1892 (A. S. S., XXIV, 558).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS

CAN. 613

§ 1. Quaelibet religio iis tantum privilegiis gaudet, quae vel hoc in Codice continentur, vel a Sede Apostolica directe eidem concessa fuerint, exclusa in posterum qualibet communicatione.

§ 2. Privilegia quibus gaudet Ordo regularis, competunt quoque monialibus eiusdem Ordinis, quatenus eorum sint capaces.

§ 1. Each institute enjoys only those privileges which are contained in this Code, or may have been directly granted to it by the Apostolic See; every communication of privileges is henceforth excluded.

§ 2. The privileges which a regular order enjoys belong also to the nuns of the same order, in so far as they are capable of enjoying them.

On privileges in general the reader may consult Vol. I of this Commentary, where mention is also made of the communication of privileges.[1] There are only two sources of privileges: the law and a direct grant by the Holy See. All intercommunication of privileges is forbidden for the future. However, this law, as we stated before, is not retroactive, and hence the orders may retain what they possess, except where the Code rules differently. In order to ascertain what privileges each institute possesses, the superiors of regulars have been called upon, in a circular of the S. C. of Religious, to meet after the war and prepare a list of privileges granted and communicated to their respective orders. Since the different orders enjoy many different privileges, it cannot be our task to collect them. It seems certain that any privilege which concerns the outward activity of the regulars, not merely their internal government and discipline, must now be looked upon as abolished if it contradicts the explicit wording of any part of the Code. Thus, for instance, the hearing of confessions, the celebration of Mass, preaching, and funerals must be judged according to our Code. The privileges concerning ordination extra tempora and without the necessary intervals are no longer in effect. We confess that uniformity of law and discipline seems to us a greater benefit than a shadowy so-called privilege, sometimes ostentatiously vindicated. There can be no greater glory than to belong to the Church universal, as long as religious are left free to pursue their vocation and are not unnecessarily molested.

1 Vol. I, pp. 155 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The second section of our canon states that nuns with solemn vows partake of all the privileges enjoyed by the regular order whose rule they follow. Note that the text does not say that they must be subject to the prelate of the respective order. Hence though, for instance, Dominican nuns be subject to the Ordinary of the diocese, yet they enjoy all the privileges of the male order. "In so far as they are capable of enjoying them" means that female religious cannot partake of the privileges granted to male religious who are employed in the sacred ministry or in the exercise of jurisdiction in foro externo and interno. But they enjoy dispensations, commutations, and spiritual favors. Thus, for instance, a plenary indulgence granted to the Franciscan Order on the feast of St. Francis may be gained by the nuns of the same order (all three branches), and the brethren O. F. M. may gain a similar indulgence granted for the feast of St. Clare of Assisi (Aug. 12). As to Sisters, our Code is silent. Yet it is certain that the Tertiaries of St. Francis who live a common life, though they pronounce only simple vows, if duly aggregated to any of the three branches, partake of all the indulgences granted to the first and second orders, and that their churches and (public or semi-public) oratories are endowed with the same indulgences as those of the first and second orders.[2] Other sisterhoods enjoy only such privileges as are granted by the Code or the Holy See.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CLERICAL PRIVILEGES

CAN. 614

Religiosi, etiam laici ac novitii, fruuntur clericorum privilegiis de quibus in can. 119–123.

Religious, even lay brothers and sisters, and novices, enjoy the privileges of clerics mentioned in can. 119–123. Hence they are inviolable by reason of the privilegium canonis, they are not to be dragged before the civil court, are free from military service and public offices, and cannot be stripped of all their possessions in case of insolvency.[3]

They are not allowed to waive these privileges because they are attached not to the person, but to the religious state.

2 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 18, 1905 (Annal. Eccl., XIV, 20); S. C. Indulg., Aug. 28, 1903 (Annal. Eccl., XI, 489); S. O., June 7, 1916 (A. Ap. S., VIII, 263 ad 1; but V is now to be suppressed); S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 1840 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 450 ff.).

3 Cfr. Vol. II of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PRIVILEGE OF EXEMPTION

CAN. 615

Regulares, novitiis non exclusis, sive viri sive mulieres, cum eorum domibus et ecclesiis, exceptis iis monialibus quae Superioribus regularibus non subsunt, ab Ordinarii loci iurisdictione exempti sunt, praeterquam in casibus a iure expressis.

Regulars, both men and women, including the novices, except those nuns who are not subject to regular superiors, are exempt with their houses and churches from the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary, except in the cases provided for by law.

As to the history of exemption, enough has been said supra.[4] Here the Code determines what exemption implies and what persons are exempt, as well as the exceptions to the rule.

1. Exemption means freedom from the jurisdictional power of the Ordinary in whose diocese a house is located in all matters except ordination. Exemption is called passive in regard to persons, and only by reason of personal exemption do houses and churches share the privilege. Hence, properly speaking, as Benedict XIV says,[5] the houses and churches of regulars are not severed from the diocesan organism; they do not form a separate territory nullius. The Code simply says: "cum eorum domibus," not et eorum domus.

2. Exemption is now granted to all regulars, i. e., to all religious orders with solemn vows, even though the 4 Pages 24 sqq.

5 De Synod. Dioec., II, 11, 2; Id., "Apostolicae servitutis," March 14, 1743. The statement in the text is of practical value in case of hearing confessions of secular priests, because a regular may hear such confessions in the monastery-enclosure, not only in the church, as at least one moralist claims.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

members are not all solemnly professed. Thus also the novices and lay brothers and clerics with simple vows enjoy exemption. But we dare not extend the privilege to the familiares,[6] or dependents, as the text does not mention these, though it expressly includes novices; but the familiares partake of certain other favors granted to regulars. Nuns with solemn vows are withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary only if they are subject to the power of a regular prelate. All these regulars are now no longer obliged to prove that they enjoy exemption, because, being regulars, they are exempt by law. Any religious order which conforms to can. 488 of the Code is entitled to exemption.

Religious congregations, on the other hand, must prove their claim to exemption by a papal brief, because without such an indult no congregation now enjoys the privilege. Thus the Passionists can produce the privilege granted them by Clement XIV, Sept. 21, 1771, and the Redemptorists may point to the Constitution of Pius VI, "Sacrosanctum," of Aug. 21, 1789. Sisterhoods are not easily granted exemption.[7]

3. Exemption, meaning freedom from episcopal jurisdiction, implies that the episcopal court cannot summon religious to appear before it; that the exempt religious need not heed ecclesiastical censures inflicted by the Ordinary; that they may bring their case directly before the S. Congregation of Religious; that diocesan rules or statutes do not touch them, except, of course, as far as the sacred ministry is concerned; that episcopal interference in their domestic affairs and government is entirely excluded; that their property and its administra-

6 Cfr. can. 514.

7 The Sisters of the Holy Cross, of Ingenbohl, Switzerland, among whom the author spent many a happy vacation day and whom he remembers with deep gratitude, enjoy exemption to a certain extent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion are in their own hands. This, in general, is the extent of exemption. Should a doubt arise, the Roman Curia will decide it if the bishop is not satisfied with the interpretation given by the exempt religious.[8] However, there are exceptions, as the Code says: "nisi in casibus a iure expressis," i. e., in cases expressly mentioned in the Code the exemption ceases and the jurisdictional power of the Ordinary is restored. These cases are generally comprised by the phrase: etiam exempti.[9]

REGULARS OUTSIDE THEIR HOUSES

CAN. 616

§ 1. Regulares extra domum illegitime degentes, etiam sub praetextu accedendi ad Superiores, exemptionis privilegio non gaudent.

§ 2. Si extra domum delictum commiserint nec a proprio Superiore praemonito puniantur, a loci Ordinario puniri possunt, etsi e domo legitime exierint et domum reversi fuerint.

§ 1. Regulars unlawfully absent from their houses, even under the pretext of having recourse to their superiors, do not enjoy the privilege of exemption.

§ 2. Regulars who have committed a crime outside their house and are not punished by their superior, though the latter was warned of the fact, can be punished by the local Ordinary, even though they may have lawfully left their house and have returned to it.

§ 1 is taken from the Council of Trent,[10] where the

8 C. 13, X, IV, 17; c. 31, X, III, 39; S. C. C. April 16, 1648; Piatus M., II, p. 7.

9 The most important exceptions are stated in separate canons: 131, 344, 612, 614, 616, 804, 831, 874, 919, 1279, 1293, 1338, 1382, 1385 mostly taken from the Council of Trent.

10 Sess. 6, c. 3 de ref.; sess. 25, c. 4 de reg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

term unlawfully is explained. A religious is unlawfully absent from his house if he leaves it without being sent or called by the superior. Hence a religious who would depart from the monastery without the permission of his superior, in order to go to the higher superior, or to Rome, to seek redress from grievances, would be unlawfully absent. However, it is generally understood that if the superior has been duly asked for leave and denied the same, a religious is allowed to go straightway (recto tramite) to the superior next in rank. In the latter case, therefore, he would not be deprived of the privilege of exemption. This interpretation appears legitimate because the Code says, "under pretext," which indicates a pretended or feigned reason. One who has asked his superior for leave of departure and has been denied permission, cannot be said to act "under pretext." Besides religious are not denied the right of seeking redress and defending themselves against injustice. The Code says "extra domum," which, according to the Council of Trent, means monastery or convent. A monastery or convent is the habitual domicile of a religious, even though he may be absent from it frequently for the purpose of giving missions, lecturing, preaching, etc. Nay even our expositi are not unlawfully absent from the religious house, although they may not be said to have their domicile in the convent. Another case was solved by Benedict XIV concerning missionaries in England.[11] He says that if they had to live in private homes, these would be considered as their religious houses, and if they illegally absented themselves from them, they could be punished. But if religious are cast out of their houses by force — as was lately done in France — and cannot come together elsewhere to lead a common life, their temporary lodgment would not be looked upon as a convent.[12]

11 "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

How long illegitimate absence must last before a religious forfeits the privilege of exemption, is not stated in the Code. A decretal of Martin IV, which is referred to in a note of Cardinal Gasparri's edition, seems to fix fifteen days as the length of a presumed illegitimate absence.[13]

§ 2 mentions another case[14] in which regulars are liable to be punished by the Ordinary, viz., if they commit a crime outside their house. The crime must be a real crime, that is, a public or scandalous transgression of the law made notorious by the fact of being witnessed by others. It is also generally presumed that it must be committed in daylight, and outside the religious house; if committed in church, or anywhere outside the monastic enclosure, the offender is liable to punishment. Note well that in this paragraph the legislator supposes that the absence is legitimate. Hence whether one is an expositus, or absent on a lawful errand, is immaterial in case of crime, as described above.

But the Ordinary may proceed only after the superior of the delinquent religious has been warned and failed to proceed within fifteen days from the date of warning. The superior must notify the Ordinary of the punishment inflicted.[15] All this must be observed, even if the religious has returned to his house or convent.

Can. 617

§ 1. Si in regularium aliorumve religiosorum exemptorum domibus eorumve ecclesiis abusus irrep-

12 S. C. C., Sept. 4, 1875; S. Poenit., Sept. 12, 1872; Piatus M., I, 3091.

13 C. 1, Extrav. Comm., III, 8.

14 Trid., sess. 6, c. 3, de ref.; sess. 7, c. 14 de ref.; sess. 25, c. 14, de reg.

15 Cfr. Piatus M., II, p. 74 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

serint, et Superior monitus prospicere neglexerit, Ordinarius loci obligatione tenetur rem ad Sedem Apostolicam statim deferendi.

§ 2. Domus autem non formata manet sub peculiari vigilantia Ordinarii loci, qui, si abusus irrepserint et fidelibus scandalo fuerint, ipse per se potest interim providere.

1. If abuses have crept into the houses or churches of regulars or of other exempt religious, and the superior, having been warned of the fact, neglects to provide a remedy, the local Ordinary is bound to refer the matter immediately to the Apostolic See.

§ 2. Every house in which there are less than six members, remains under the special vigilance of the local Ordinary, who, if abuses arise and become a source of scandal, can himself provisionally deal with them.

The first paragraph of this canon is entirely new, and we daresay, not exactly in keeping with the privilege of exemption, because the Ordinary is set up as a sort ot policeman over exempt monasteries. The second section recalls the regulations which emanated under Urban VIII, decree June 21, 1625, and Innocent X, "Instaurandae," Oct. 15, 1652, "Ut in parvis," Feb. 10, 1654. But the Code cannot be supposed to wish to contradict the constitution of Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 5, 1881, which grants exemption even to smaller houses of regulars.

RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS

CAN. 618

§ 1. Religiones votorum simplicium exemptionis privilegio non gaudent, nisi specialiter eisdem fuerit concessum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. In religionibus tamen iuris pontificii Ordinario loci non licet:

1.° Constitutiones ullatenus immutare aut de re oeconomica cognoscere, salvo praescripto can. 533–535;

2.° Sese ingerere in regimen internum ac disciplinam, exceptis casibus in iure expressis; nihilominus in religionibus laicalibus ipse potest ac debet inquirere num disciplina ad constitutionum normam vigeat, num quid sana doctrina morumve probitas detrimenti ceperit, num contra clausuram peccatum sit, num Sacramenta aequa stataque frequentia suscipiantur; et, si Superiores de gravibus forte abusibus admoniti opportune non providerint, ipse per se consulat; si qua tamen maioris momenti occurrant, quae moram non patiantur, decernat statim; decretum vero ad Sanctam Sedem deferat.

§ 1. Institutes with simple vows do not enjoy the privilege of exemption, unless it has been specially granted to them, as was done in the case of the Passionists, Redemptorists, and some others.

§ 2. As regards institutes approved by the Holy See, the local Ordinary may not:

1.° Make any change in the constitutions or enquire into the temporal administration, saving the dispositions of canons 533–535;

2.° Interfere in the internal government and discipline, except in the cases expressed by law; nevertheless, in regard to lay religious, he can and must enquire:

a) Whether the discipline is maintained according to the constitutions;

b) Whether sound doctrine and good morals have suffered in any way (through Modernism or other heretical tendencies);

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) Whether there have been breaches of the law of enclosure;

d) Whether the Sacraments are duly and regularly frequented;

e) If superiors having been warned of the existence of grave abuses, have failed duly to remedy them, the Ordinary himself shall provide; if, however, something of greater importance, which will suffer no delay occur, he shall decide at once, and report his decision to the Holy See.

The "Conditae" of Leo XIII, from which these rules are taken, furthermore says that the Ordinary is not allowed to limit or modify the authority granted to religious superiors by their constitutions; that the appointment to offices and charges belongs to the chapter and council of each house, but that the Ordinary himself or his delegate may preside at the chapters which make such appointments. The enclosure, called episcopal, is under the supervision of the bishop. As to the Sacraments, the Ordinary must see to it that they are administered according to the laws of the Church. These congregations are also subject to the Ordinary in whatever regards censures, reserved cases, dispensations from vows not reserved to the Pope, dispensations from general laws, as far as the Ordinary can dispense therefrom, and also with respect to public prayers (cf. can. 612). Abuses may creep into the management of schools, hospitals, asylums, especially concerning debts and buildings, the treatment of inmates, pronounced favoritism, indiscriminate communication with persons of the other sex, etc. If the abuse be a serious one, the Ordinary ought to gather written information, if possible supported by affidavits, and then draw the attention of the superior to the matter and give him time to correct the evil. If after some time no result appears, the Ordinary may summon the superior and threaten ecclesiastical punishment, including censures. All matters of greater importance must subsequently be reported to Rome. This report must embody the testimony of reliable witnesses who are ready to make oath to the facts they assert. Of course, in case of grave scandal, the Ordinary can punish the delinquent immediately, even by removal, if necessary. Note the terms provide and decide; the former is paternal and non-judiciary, whilst the latter spells judicial or at least summary trial and sentence.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUNISHMENTS

CAN. 619

In omnibus in quibus religiosi subsunt Ordinario loci, possunt ab eodem etiam poenis coerceri.

In all cases in which religious are subject to the local Ordinary, he may coerce them even by penalties.

There can no longer [16] be any dispute as to the power of the Ordinary to proceed according to the penal Code against all religious in cases in which they are subject to him. In order to render that power efficacious, various papal [17] constitutions had already decided that it included the infliction of censures. Exemption is not absolute, but relative, i. e., it reaches only so far as the law grants it. The Ordinary's power of correction may be wielded not only at the time of the canonical visitation, but whenever religious make themselves guilty of transgressions which the law has expressly placed under the power of the Ordi-

16 Cfr. Piatus M., II, p. 8 ff.

17 Greg. XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 16, § 4, § 6; Innocent X, "Cum sicut," May 14, 1648, § 4. No privilege can now be claimed against the common law, unless it be granted since the promulgation of the Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nary. The latter, however, is not allowed to stretch the law.

DIOCESAN INDULTS

CAN. 620

Per indultum ab Ordinario loci legitime concessum, obligatio legis communis cessat quoque pro religiosis omnibus in dioecesi commorantibus, salvis votis et constitutionibus propriis cuiusvis religionis.

Every indult lawfully granted by the local Ordinary dispensing from the obligation of the common law, avails likewise for all religious living in the diocese, without prejudice to the vows and particular constitutions of their own institute.

With regard to this enactment consult can. 1245, which empowers Ordinaries to dispense from fast and abstinence in particular cases. This indult may be applied also to religious communities, as has been decided by the Holy Office, Dec. 20, 1871. There is but one restriction,— that of the vow. Thus the Minimi have a special vow of fasting, from which the superiors cannot dispense. Our Code adds: without prejudice to the constitutions, which might be interpreted as if the superiors could not use the episcopal indult whenever the constitutions prescribed a day of fast or abstinence. However, since the Ordinaries and superiors of exempt orders are by common law entitled to dispense in said cases (can. 1245, § 3), we believe that they may legally apply the power granted if the whole diocese is exempt from a restriction. Besides, the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars has declared that superiors of religious congregations may dispense in particular cases from the constitutions.[18]

18 March 2, 1894; Bachofen, Comp. Iuris Reg., p. 383. Too rigorous an application of the constitutions when the whole diocese is

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Therefore, they too may apply the indult granted by the Ordinary in a particular case, especially since the dispensation is granted and all that is needed is to apply it. If there should be any scruple, especially in female communities, the Ordinary may be asked to dispense in their behalf, provided, of course, no special vow stands in the way.

BEGGING

CAN. 621

§ 1. Regulares, qui ex instituto mendicantes vocantur et sunt, eleemosynas in dioecesi, ubi religiosa domus est constituta, quaerere valent de sola Superiorum suorum licentia; extra dioecesim vero indigent praeterea licentia scripto data ab Ordinario loci in quo eleemosynas colligere cupiunt.

§ 2. Hanc licentiam Ordinarii locorum, praecipue dioecesium finitimarum, nisi gravibus et urgentibus de causis, ne denegent neve revocent, si religiosa domus ex mendicatione in sola dioecesi, in qua est constituta, vivere nullo modo possit.

The Council of Trent[19] did not favor begging, and doubtless it had good reasons for its sweeping prohibition. Yet subsequent papal constitutions[20] mitigated this somewhat harsh measure, or rather furnished an authentic, but extensive, interpretation of the Tridentine law. This interpretation safeguarded the right of regulars who by their rule belong to the class of mendicant orders to beg alms in the diocese in which their house is situated. All that is needed is the oral or written per-dispensed and the supreme lawgiver allows the use of a dispensation, does not foster the spirit of willingness nor respect for the law.

19 Sess. 21, c. 7, de ref.

20 Pius V, "Etsi mendicantium," May 16, 1567; Clement XI, "Exponi nobis," July 8, 1717.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mission of their superior, either local or higher. This is the law laid down in the first paragraph of our canon. However, if they wish to beg outside their own diocese, regulars must obtain the written leave of the Ordinary in whose diocese they wish to beg.

§ 2 admonishes the Ordinaries, especially of adjoining dioceses, not to refuse or withdraw the license allowing mendicant regulars to beg, except for weighty and urgent reasons, if the religious house cannot possibly subsist on the alms gathered in the diocese in which it is situated.

It is certain that, according to the rule of St. Francis and certain authentic declarations of the Holy See,[21] the begging must be done by the regulars themselves. The text would also seem to exclude begging by letter or other indirect means. This is borne out by our Code, which recalls the fact that the mendicants need only the permission of their superiors to beg. The Apostolic grant, which is a privilege granted to mendicants only, must be interpreted according to the old law (cf. can. 623).

NON-MENDICANT ORDERS AND CONGREGATIONS

CAN. 622

§ 1. Alii omnes religiosi Congregationum iuris pontificii, sine peculiari Sanctae Sedis privilegio, stipem petere prohibentur; quibus, si hoc privilegium impetraverint, opus erit praeterea licentia scripto data ab Ordinario loci, nisi aliter in ipso privilegio cautum fuerit.

§ 2. Religiosi Congregationum iuris dioecesani stipem quaeritare nequaquam possunt sine licentia scripto data tum ab Ordinario loci in quo sita est

21 Const. cit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eorum domus, tum ab Ordinario loci in quo stipem quaerere cupiunt.

§ 3. Religiosis, de quibus in §§ 1 et 2 huius canonis, Ordinarii locorum licentiam quaeritandae stipis ne concedant, praesertim ubi sunt conventus regularium nomine et re mendicantium, nisi sibi constet de vera domus vel pii operis necessitate, cui alio modo occurri nequeat; quod si necessitati provideri possit stipe quaerenda intra locum seu districtum vel dioecesim in qua iidem commorantur, ampliorem licentiam ne largiantur.

§ 4. Sine authentico et recenti rescripto Sacrae Congregationis pro Ecclesia Orientali, Ordinarii latini nec sinant orientalem ullum cuiusvis ordinis et dignitatis in proprio territorio pecuniam colligere, nec suum subditum in orientales dioeceses ad eundem finem mittant.

§ 1. The Code now passes to institutes which do not belong to the class of mendicant orders, and to papal congregations. These, it says, need a special indult from the Holy See in order to be allowed to collect alms. A special indult is one not included in the approval of the consituations, or at least not specifically mentioned in that approval.[22] Besides this papal indult, these institutes need the written permission of the local Ordinary, unless this is not required by reason of a special provision made in the papal indult. Hence the Ordinary in whose diocese they wish to beg, must be asked for his permission, and the granting of it as to time and place and persons depends entirely on his judgment.

§ 2. Diocesan institutes need the written permission of 22 In Latin the papal indult would contain the clause: nulla requisita vel obtenta Ordinarii licentia, or, non obstante iure ordinarii de petenda licentia, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Ordinary of the diocese in which their house is located, as well as of that of the Ordinary in whose diocese they wish to beg.[23]

§ 3. Both kinds of religious mentioned (§§ 1 and 2) should not be permitted by the Ordinary to beg, unless the latter is convinced of the absolute neediness of the religious house and the necessity of their work. If the necessary means can be provided within their own place, or district, or diocese, no permission to go begging elsewhere is to be granted. The restriction made in this paragraph applies especially to dioceses in which there are convents of regulars who are in name and reality mendicants. This last clause is very just and based upon the old rules prohibiting a convent from being erected within about three hundred feet from a convent of mendicants.[24]

§ 4. Latin Ordinaries may never allow an Oriental of any order or dignity (patriarch, metropolitan, bishop, priest, religious of either sex) to collect alms in their dioceses without an authentic and recently issued rescript of the S. Congregation for the Oriental Church; nor should Latin Ordinaries send any collectors into Oriental dioceses. Authenticity is proved by the seal and signature of the S. C. for the Oriental Church; "recently issued" means not more than six months old. If a priest cannot show such a document, he should not be allowed to say Mass and should be publicly denounced.[25]

23 S. C. EE. et RR., Singulari quidem, March 27, 1896.

24 Cfr. Piatus M., II, p. 284.

25 Alexander VIII, Alias emanavit, Oct. 21, 1690; Clement XII, Dudum, March 26, 1736; S. C. Prop. Fide, June 1, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 532 ff.)

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 623

Non licet Superioribus stipem colligendam committere, nisi professis aetate animoque maturis, maxime si de mulieribus agatur, nunquam autem iis qui in studia adhuc incumbunt.

Superiors must not entrust the collection of alms to others than professed subjects of mature age and character, especially in the case of women, and never may students be so employed.[26]

CAN. 624

Quod vero attinet ad modum in quaeritanda stipe servandum et ad disciplinam a quaestuantibus custodiendam, religiosi utriusque sexus stare debent instructionibus a Sede Apostolica hac de re datis.

As to what concerns the method to be followed in seeking alms and the discipline to be observed by those who seek them, religious of both sexes must conform to the instructions given by the Holy See on this subject.

These instructions are:

(1) That there should always be two sent out seeking alms; only in case of strict necessity is it permitted to send one, and he or she must be of approved moral character.

(2) When begging outside the place where their convent is located, religious should lodge with the clergy or pious benefactors.

(3) They should not remain outside their convent longer than one month, if begging in their own diocese; and not longer than two months if in a strange diocese.

(4) When begging in the place where their convent is

[26] S. C. Rel., Nov. 21, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, 153 ff.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

situated they are not allowed to remain out over night.

(5) They must conduct themselves humbly, modestly, and be clean in appearance, avoid places not suitable to their religious profession, and comply with their religious duties.

(6) Superiors are under strict obligation to make these instructions known to their subjects.

(7) If religious seeking alms do not conduct themselves properly, but give scandal, the Ordinary of the diocese may proceed against them according to law (cf. can. 616, § 2).

(8) Religious who go begging must carry with them the necessary permit, either from their superiors (cf. 621), or from both superior and Ordinary (if required according to can. 622) and be ready to show the same to the pastors and Ordinaries upon demand. The permission of the Ordinary is supposed to be valid until expressly revoked.[27]

PONTIFICAL RIGHTS OF ABBOTS

CAN. 625

Abbates regulares de regimine, legitime electi, debent intra tres menses ab electione benedictionem accipere ab Episcopo dioecesis in qua monasterium situm est; postquam vero benedictionem receperint, praeterquam potestate conferendi ordines ad normam can. 964, n. 1, fruuntur privilegiis de quibus in can. 325, excepto pileolo violaceo.

Lawfully elected abbots who actually govern a community must be blessed by the bishop in whose diocese the monastery is located, within three months from the date of election. After they have been blessed, they enjoy the power of conferring the tonsure and minor orders on those subject to them by virtue of the religious (at least simple) profession, and also, according to can. 325, the privilege of using pontificals, except the purple skullcap.

27 S. C. Rel., Nov. 21, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, 134 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning the right of pontificals some historical notes have been given in the section dealing with exemption. We add that formerly abbots had to ask the bishop three times for the blessing, and if he refused, they enjoyed their rights without the blessing.[28] Now the Code makes it imperative on all, even temporary abbots, who formerly (e. g., in the Cassinese Congregation) did not receive it, to obtain the blessing. It follows that the bishop is obliged to impart it when requested. Should he demur, recourse may be had to the S. C. of Religious.

After an abbot has been duly blessed, he enjoys two rights in particular: he may confer first tonsure and minor orders and he may pontificate.

The first is plainly stated in can. 964, 1.° Three conditions are required for licit and valid ordination. The abbot must be blessed, he must be a priest, and the ordinandus must be his own subject. (a) He must be blessed, whether by the diocesan or another bishop is immaterial as to the validity of the orders to be conferred. No privilege shall any longer be granted in this matter.[29] (b) The abbot must himself be a priest, which is not only appropriate, but absolutely required. (c) The one who is to be tonsured[30] or promoted to minor orders must be the abbot's own subject by virtue of at least simple pro-

28 C. 1, X, I, 10.

29 Formerly an abbot, even though not blessed, could by an apostolic privilege, confer these orders; S. C. C., May 11, 1624; March 16, 1647 (Richter, Trid., p. 199).

30 C. 3, 6°, V, 7 mentions tonsure only.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fession. The once mooted question [31] whether ordination performed on one who is not subject to the abbot was only illicit, but not invalid, is now settled; it is invalid. A religious becomes subject by profession to that abbot in whose hands and name he makes profession, or rather for whose community he pronounces the vows. Therefore an Abbot President or the Abbot Primate can no longer confer minor orders on the members of the congregation or of the order, unless their faculties are renewed, or unless these were understood as privileges. But even in that latter sense, it would not seem safe to act on them.[32]

The second abbatial privilege is that of pontificating, i. e., performing pontifical functions with throne and baldachino. Abbots may also wear a pectoral cross and a ring set with a precious stone, wherever they go. But the purple skullcap is not allowed them, except by indult. The Code does not limit the right of pontificating to a certain number of times, and hence the decree of Alexander VII, Sept. 27, 1659, is obsolete. However, as prelates nullius are allowed to pontificate only in their own territory (can. 325), the privilege of using pontificals seems to be restricted to their own churches, viz., such as are fully incorporated with the order. Neither would it be in accordance with the Code if abbots would pontificate outside the diocese without the consent of the Ordinary of the other diocese, since can. 337 requires this even for bishops. Nor does the Code (see can. 625, as compared with can. 325) grant to abbots the right of consecrating churches and altars, otherwise it would not enumerate that power specifically under can. 325, § 2.[33]

31 Cfr. Bachofen, Comp. Iuris Reg., p. 255 f.

32 Card. Gasparri refers to no decree of the S. C. EE. et RR., which had granted that faculty to the Abbot Primate and Abbots Presidents; but unless profession is explicitly made for the monastic congregation — not for the monastery — the text is against that privilege or faculty.

33 Cfr. can. 1147, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

OBLIGATIONS AND PRIVILEGES OF RELIGIOUS PROMOTED TO ECCLESIASTICAL DIGNITIES OR ADMINISTERING PARISHES

The laws laid down in the following chapter are partly new and partly taken from Leo XIII, "Romanos Pontifices," May 8, 1881. History, as said elsewhere, testifies that monks were not found incapable of ruling a diocese or parish or even the whole church. Concerning parishes, the Decretals made it obligatory that a companion should be given to the pastor if possible.[1] But on account of the scarcity of fit members this rule was often neglected, and, in fact, by contrary custom, abolished. The Apostolic See thereupon set up the law (called "recent" by Benedict XIV) that regulars should not be appointed to pastoral charges without an apostolic dispensation.[2] However, it was always and is still understood that if a parish is pleno iure incorporated with a monastery, the latter can, without an indult, appoint one of its members to govern it, because such a parish has become a regular benefice.[3]

CAN. 626

§ 1. Religiosus nequit, sine Sedis Apostolicae auctoritate, ad dignitates, officia aut beneficia promoveri, quae cum statu religioso componi non possint.

1 C. 5, X, III, 35 says that ancient canons allowed the monks to be pastors.

2 "Cum nuper," Nov. 8, 1751.

3 The principle stated above touched only secular benefices, i. e., such offices as by original right were held by the secular clergy.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 2. Legitime ab aliquo collegio electus, nequit electioni assentiri sine licentia Superioris.

§ 3. Si voto teneatur non acceptandi dignitates, specialis Romani Pontificis dispensatio est necessaria.

§ 1. No religious may, without the authority of the Apostolic See, be promoted to any dignity, office, or benefice which is incompatible with the religious state. To a dignity in the proper sense, i. e., an ecclesiastical office which implies precedence, rank, and jurisdiction, if it be a secular office, a religious cannot be promoted without a dispensation. But the supreme pontificate and the episcopacy has never been, by law, barred to religious. Hence the dignities here intended must refer to cathedral chapters. The vicar-generalship may also be included, as this dignity, according to can. 367, is to be conferred on secular priests only, unless the government of the diocese is entrusted to a religious family. Office would comprise all the minor offices, such as canonicates, pastorships, or chaplaincies held by secular priests, and also benefices, though, as stated before, if a parish belongs to a religious family by decree of the S. C. of Religious, a religious may be appointed to it.[4] Besides, as seen from the chapter on pastors and assistants, religious may be appointed temporary pastors or substitutes. Whether religious may be appointed diocesan consultors seems doubtful, because can. 425 requires consultors to reside in or near the episcopal city. But religious are not excluded from the office of synodal examiners, provided, of course, they have the permission of the superior or are themselves superiors. Neither does the Code forbid religious who are pastors to be rural deans. The main reason for excluding them from these offices is the incompatibility of the latter with the religious profession. Now where the Code does not explicitly state that the religious clergy is excluded, as is the case with the vicar-generalship, religious are capable of assuming offices which do not interfere with their profession. Hence a religious who is lawfully appointed pastor may also assume offices which are generally conferred on pastors.

4 Cfr. can. 432, 456.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. One who is legally elected by an electoral college may consent to his election only with the permission of his superior, as the Decretals [5] already stated. Hence a religious who would be elected superior for another monastery than his own, would need the special permission of his own superior. A general license to that effect is insufficient,[6] though if the electors had asked the superior before election to permit the choice of one of his subjects, this would suffice. An abbot who is elected bishop needs the consent of the Holy See for leaving his monastery.[7] Of course, here in this country this is of little practical value, since the Apostolic See, by freely appointing bishops is supposed to give its consent. For the rest, such cases are not frequent.

§ 3. If religious are bound by a vow not to accept ecclesiastical dignities (not mere offices), a special dispensation is required from the Roman Pontiff. This vow may be a religious vow, as the last class of the Jesuits pronounce, or a private conditional one. The Code makes no distinction.[8]

5 C. 27, 6°, I, 6. Neither is the superior obliged to ask the advice of his chapter or counsellors; ibid., § 1.

6 Engel, I, 6 n. 44.

7 C. 36, 6°, I, 6.

8 Urban VIII, "Honorum," Feb. 24, 1643, § 2. A vow is conditional if made dependently on the will of the superior; if made before profession, the superior may annul it afterwards; can. 1312, § 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 627

§ 1. Religiosus, renuntiatus Cardinalis aut Episcopus sive residentialis sive titularis, manet religiosus, particeps privilegiorum suae religionis, votis ceterisque suae professionis obligationibus adstrictus, exceptis iis quas cum sua dignitate ipse prudenter iudicet componi non posse, salvo praescripto can. 628.

§ 2. Eximitur tamen a potestate Superiorum et, vi voti obedientiae, uni Romano Pontifici manet obnoxius.

A religious who is created cardinal or appointed bishop, either residential or titular, remains a religious with all the rights and obligations proper to his profession, but may exempt himself from such obligations as he deems incompatible with his dignity, without prejudice, however, to the rule laid down in can. 628.

He is also exempt from the jurisdiction of his superiors and by virtue of the vow of obedience becomes subject to the Roman Pontiff. Hence a religious thus promoted enjoys all the privileges and spiritual favors which his institute enjoys, and remains bound by the obligations proper to his state. He must observe the rule and the constitutions, as far as they do not conflict with his new dignity. This entails the observance of the fast and abstinence and the penances prescribed by the rule and constitutions. Whether these prescriptions are compatible with his dignity, the religious dignitary himself is allowed to judge.[9] As to the Breviary he must follow that of his diocese, and if another religious recites with him, he also may follow the bishop's breviary.[10] A Cistercian, we presume, would be obliged to add the Office of the

[9] Benedict XIII, "Custodes," March 7, 1726; S. C. EE. et RR., May 6, 1864 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 712 ff.).

[10] S. Rit. C., June 11, 1605.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Blessed Virgin, unless important occupations excused him. With regard to the habit, a religious dignitary has to wear the same as his religious brethren, as far as form and color are concerned,[11] but may have it trimmed with purple buttons. Canons regular and such as are especially privileged, may dress like secular bishops.

CAN. 628

Religiosus ad dignitatim episcopalem vel aliam extra propriam religionem evectus:

1.° Si per professionem dominium bonorum amiserit, bonorum, quae ipsi obveniunt, habet usum, usumfructum et administrationem; proprietatem vero Episcopus residentialis, Vicarius Apostolicus, Praefectus Apostolicus, acquirit dioecesi, vicariatui, praefecturae; ceteri, Ordini vel Sanctae Sedi, ad normam can. 582, salvo praescripto can. 239, § 1, n. 19;

2.° Si per professionem dominium bonorum non amiserit, bonorum quae habebat, recuperat usum, usumfructum et administrationem; quae postea ipsi obveniant, sibi plene acquirit;

3.° In utroque autem casu de bonis, quae ipsi obveniunt non intuitu personae, debet disponere secundum offerentium voluntatem.

A religious promoted to the episcopal or any other dignity outside of his institute must observe the vow of poverty as follows:

1. If he has lost the right of possessing property,—as is the case with solemnly professed religious — he retains the use, usufruct, and administration of all property that comes to him during his actual exercise of the dig-

11 Benedict XIII, "Custodes"; however, the Apostolic See may grant and has granted dispensation to wear the regular episcopal dress.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nity, but the property itself belongs to the diocese, vicariate, or prefecture apostolic, if the religious is a residential bishop, vicar, or prefect apostolic. If he is none of these, the property belongs either to the order, if the latter is capable of possessing property, or to the Holy See, if it is a mendicant order. A titular bishop is therefore obliged to his monastery, or province or order, which may claim all his belongings after his death. However, Cardinals may bequeath their appurtenances to a church, or pious place, or religious community; otherwise they go to the pontifical sacristy, with the sole exception of the ring, pectoral cross, and reliquaries.[12]

2. A religious who has not lost the right of owning property by his profession, by promotion to a dignity regains the use, usufruct, and administration of all the property he possessed at the time of his profession; and what comes to him after his promotion, belongs to him as owner. In other words, he does not differ in this respect from a secular bishop.

3. However, a religious with solemn or simple vows, if promoted to a dignity, must use all donations that he receives according to the intention of the donor, unless they are intended for his own person.

ABDICATION

CAN. 629

§ 1. Dimisso cardinalatu vel episcopatu vel expleto munere extra religionem sibi a Sede Apostolica commisso, religiosus ad religionem redire tenetur.

§ 2. Potest tamen Cardinalis et Episcopus religiosus quamlibet suae religionis domum eligere in qua degat; sed caret voce activa et passiva.

12 Can. 239, § 1, 19; can. 1298, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

When a religious cardinal or bishop resigns or goes out of office, because his mission is discharged, for instance, as a legate or special envoy of the Holy See, he must return to his institute. If he has held the dignity of cardinal or bishop, he may choose any religious house for his home, but is not entitled to either an active or a passive voice. And this prohibition holds not only for the respective house, but for the whole institute.[13] Of course, if the religious dignitary is bound to return ad penates, his institute is bound to support him.[14]

RELIGIOUS AS PASTORS

Can. 630

§ 1. Religiosus, qui paroeciam regit sive titulo parochi sive titulo vicarii, manet adstrictus ad observationem votorum et constitutionum, quatenus haec observatio potest cum muneris sui officiis consistere.

§ 2. Quare, in iis quae ad religiosam disciplinam attinent, subest Superiori, cuius proinde est, et quidem privative respectu Ordinarii loci, in eius agendi rationem circa haec omnia inquirere eumque, si casus ferat, corrigere.

§ 3. Bona quae ipsi obveniunt intuitu paroeciae cui praeficitur, ipsi paroeciae acquirit; cetera acquirit ad instar aliorum religiosorum.

§ 4. Non obstante voto paupertatis, eidem licet eleemosynas in bonum paroecianorum, vel pro scholis catholicis aut locis piis paroeciae coniunctis, quovis modo oblatas accipere aut colligere, et acceptas sive collectas administrare, itemque, servata offerentium voluntate, pro prudenti suo arbitrio, erogare, salva semper vigilantia sui Superioris; sed eleemosynas pro

13 Paul IV, "In sacra," July 19, 1559, § 2.

14 S. C. C., Sept. 25, 1858.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesia paroeciali aedificanda, conservanda, instauranda, exornanda accipere, apud se retinere, colligere aut administrare pertinet ad Superiores, si ecclesia sit communitatis religiosae; secus ad loci Ordinarium.

§ 1. A religious who governs a parish, either as pastor or as vicar, remains bound by the vows and the constitutions in so far as compatible with his office.

§ 2. Therefore, as to religious discipline, he is responsible, not to the Ordinary, but to his superior, who may inquire into his conduct and correct him, if necessary.

§ 3. Property intended for the parish belongs to the parish; all else is acquired for his religious brethren.

§ 4. Notwithstanding the vow of poverty, he may collect and receive alms for the benefit of his parishioners, of Catholic schools and pious institutions connected with the parish, and administer and distribute such alms according to his own judgment and the intention of the giver, under the supervision, however, of the superior. But to receive, retain, collect, and administer alms intended for the building, maintenance, restoration, and ornamentation of the parochial church appertains to the religious superiors if the church belongs to the religious community; otherwise to the Ordinary.

This last clause of § 4 seems impractical, and, in many cases, we fear, will prove unfeasible. Besides, it would throw an unbearable burden on religious superiors who have many parochial churches. Furthermore it may cause troubles with regard to trustees and parishioners, who are entitled to know how the money is spent. Lastly, can. 533, § 1, n. 4, requires a separate account for parish money and religious money. All this would seem to demand a host of officials in the convent itself.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It is an entirely new regulation which has yet to stand the test of experience.

THEIR RELATION TO THE ORDINARY

CAN. 631

§ 1. Idem parochus vel vicarius religiosus, licet ministerium exerceat in domo seu loco ubi maiores Superiores religiosi ordinariam sedem habent, subest immediate omnimodae iurisdictioni, visitationi et correctioni Ordinarii loci, non secus ac parochi saeculares, regulari observantia unice excepta.

§ 2. Ordinarius loci, ubi eum suo muneri defecisse compererit, opportuna decreta condere ac meritas in eum poenas statuere potest; in quo nihilominus Ordinarii facultates minime privativae sunt, sed Superior ius cumulativum cum ipso habet, ita tamen ut, si aliter a Superiore, aliter ab Ordinario decerni contingat, decretum Ordinarii praevalere debeat.

§ 3. Quod attinet ad parochi vel vicarii religiosi remotionem e paroecia, servetur praescriptum can. 454, § 5; et quod ad bona temporalia, praescriptum can. 533, § 1, n. 4, et can. 535, § 3, n. 2.

§ 1. Religious pastors or assistants, although exercising the sacred ministry in the house or place where the higher superiors of the institute have their habitual residence, are immediately subject, in all matters concerning their pastoral charge, to the jurisdiction, visitation, and correction of the Ordinary of the diocese, just like secular pastors, with the sole exception of the regular discipline.

§ 2. If a religious pastor or vicar neglects his duties, the Ordinary of the diocese may issue opportune orders and inflict merited penalties. However, he may not proceed by himself alone, but must proceed in union with the religious superior; if the decisions of the latter conflict with those of the Ordinary, the latter's decree must prevail.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Concerning the removal of a religious pastor or assistant, can. 454, § 5, must be observed, and as to the temporalities, can. 533, § 1, n. 4, and can. 535, § 3, n. 2.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XIV

TRANSFER TO ANOTHER RELIGIOUS INSTITUTE

(Transitus ad aliam Religionem)

CAN. 632

Religiosus nequit ad aliam religionem, etiam strictiorem, vel e monasterio sui iuris ad aliud transire sine auctoritate Apostolicae Sedis.

No religious can, without authorization from the Holy See, pass to another institute, even stricter, or from one independent monastery to another.

This is now the general rule, based partly on the old law. For the rest, this whole Title is entirely new, as the lack of quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition plainly indicates. Hence the commentator, according to can. 6, must interpret the law according to the wording of the text itself, and only where a doubt arises, may he resort to the old law.

The Council of Trent [1] forbade the passing of religious from a stricter to a laxer order. A laxer order or congregation was one which prescribed fewer external austerities (fasting, abstinence, vigils, silence, labor). The Carthusians were and are looked upon as the strictest. A transition to a stricter order, if done from zeal to lead a more perfect life, and with the permission of the superior, could formerly be effected without the interposition of the Apostolic See.[2] Now, however, no change is al-

1 Sess. 25, c. 19 de reg.

2 C. 5, X, III, 31.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lowed without papal permission. Note the term religio, which means a society of religious distinct from others, whether an order or a religious congregation. Thus no one is allowed to pass from the Benedictine to the Franciscan order, or from the Sacred Heart Sisters to those of St. Joseph, or from one autonomous monastery to another of the same institute. Autonomous monasteries are complete juridical entities, and religious generally make the profession for the monastery, not for the order or congregation. The vow of stability is clearly emphasized. A Jesuit may therefore transfer himself from one province to another, but a Benedictine or Cistercian may not even change his monastery without papal permission. Of course transfer is here understood as implying transfer of the vows made for one monastery to another independent monastery. A temporary though protracted transfer for reason of studies (can. 606), or help, or removing occasions of sin (can. 661, § 2), needs no Apostolic indult. Here again we must add that the faculties formerly granted to the Abbot Primate and abbot presidents are no longer valid. Furthermore, it must be noted that the text, by using the term religio, includes diocesan institutes.

CAN. 633

§ 1. Transiens ad aliam religionem novitiatum peragere debet; quo durante, manentibus votis, iura et obligationes particulares, quas in religione derelicta habuit, suspensa manent, et ipse obligatione tenetur Superioribus novae religionis et ipsi novitiorum Magistro parendi etiam ratione voti obedientiae.

§ 2. Si in religione ad quam transiit, professionem non edat, ad pristinam religionem redire debet, nisi interim votorum tempus exspiraverit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Transiens ad aliud monasterium eiusdem Ordinis nec novitiatum peragit nec novam emittit professionem.

§ 1. He who passes to another institute, must make a novitiate, during which the vows remain intact, while the rights and particular obligations which he had in the former institute are suspended, and he is bound to obey the superior of his new institute and the master of novices even by virtue of the vow of obedience. This is the substance of § 1; but what, for instance, if a member of the Minimi, with his vow of perpetual abstinence and fast, enters a less strict order? The text says that "the vows remain intact." We believe, however, that, since the transiens has obtained permission from the Holy See, the latter included a dispensation from, or rather suspension of, the obligation of the particular vow, until the novice has made profession. The vows mentioned are chiefly the three principal vows of the religious state. Vows privately made in the former institute may be declared invalid or not binding by the lawful superior of the new institute.[3]

§ 2. If he does not make profession in the new institute, he must return to his old one, unless the term of his vows expire in the interval. The latter clause, of course, holds only in the case of temporary profession; hence, in orders with triennial vows before the solemn vows, and in religious congregations where annual vows are made for a certain term before the perpetual vows are taken. Should the time of temporary profession not have elapsed when he would have to return, he must go back to the former institute, or ask for a rescript of exclaustration until his time expires.

[3] Can. 1312 f.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 3. He who passes to another monastery of the same order makes neither a new novitiate nor a new profession. Note the term order, because the text evidently refers to such monasteries as are autonomous (sui iuris), and to monastic congregations of the same order. Generally, a retreat of some days is prescribed before incorporation in the new monastery or congregation. Therefore a change from one monastic congregation to another only requires a papal indult, but no new novitiate or new profession is necessary, no matter how different the discipline may be.

CAN. 634

Sollemniter professus aut professus a votis simplicibus perpetuis, si transierit ad aliam religionem cum votis sollemnibus vel simplicibus perpetuis, post novitiatum, praetermissa professione temporaria, de qua in can. 574, vel admittatur ad professionem sollemnem aut simplicem perpetuam, vel ad pristinam redeat religionem; ius tamen est Superiori eum probandi diutius, sed non ultra annum ab expleto novitiatu.

If a person who has made profession of solemn or of simple perpetual vows joins another institute with solemn vows or with simple perpetual vows, he must, after the novitiate, omit the temporary profession spoken of in can. 574, and make profession of solemn vows or of simple perpetual vows, according to the institute, or he must return to the former institute. The Superior, however, has the right to prolong the period of probation, but not beyond one year after the completion of the novitiate.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 635

Transeuntes ad aliud monasterium eiusdem religionis a die transitus, ad aliam vero religionem ab edita nova professione:

1.° Amittunt omnia iura et obligationes prioris religionis vel monasterii et alterius iura et officia suscipiunt;

2.° Religio vel monasterium a quo bona servat, quae ipsius religiosi ratione iam ei quaesita fuerunt; quod spectat ad dotem eiusve fructus et alia bona personalia, si qua habeat religiosus, servandum praescriptum, can. 551, § 2; demum nova religio ius habet pro novitiatus tempore ad iustam retributionem, si eidem locus sit ad normam can. 570, § 1.

Those who pass to another monastery of the same institute, from the day of transition, but if to another institute, from the day of their new profession:

1.° Lose all the rights and obligations of their former institute or monastery and assume all the rights and duties of their new institute or monastery;

2.° Abdicate, in favor of the monastery or institute which they leave, the property that they may have acquired as religious; thus all books, chattels, donations or legacies already received and appropriated by the former institute or monastery belong to it. As to the dowry and its interest and other personal property of the religious, if he had such, only the interest of the dowry due during the novitiate goes to the new institute during the term of the novitiate, whereas the dowry itself passes to the new institute only after profession. If a Sister passes from one convent of the same institute to another, her entire dowry passes to the latter on the day of her transfer. Besides, if the constitutions or mutual agreement permit compensation for board and habit, the same must be made for the time of the novitiate.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Personal belongings are manuscripts, works of art, devotional articles, clothing. These go with the person. Besides, any fortune or inheritance falling to the religious after the day of his passing from one monastery to another of the same order, or from the day of profession in a new institute, belongs to the latter. Hence title deeds, notes, etc., not cashed or used, must be handed over by the former institute or house to the latter.

As to the dowry, a distinction was formerly made. If the monastery or institute from which a transfer was made, was the cause of the religious taking leave, it was bound to restore the full dowry; but if no cause or fault could be charged, it was only bound to a certain amount of pro rata support.[4]

As to § 1 it may not be amiss to observe the following: since the Code simply states that the rights and duties of the new monastery are assumed, it is evident that no restriction as to these rights can be validly made as a quasi-condition of admittance, if for instance active and passive voice should be surrendered. Besides the Code makes no reference to rule or constitutions, and therefore should these permit such restrictions, they are simply out of force.

CAN. 636

Sollemnitas votorum in eo qui legitime secundum superiores canones vota simplicia in Congregatione religiosa nuncupat, eo ipso exstinguitur, nisi aliud in apostolico indulto expresse caveatur.

The solemnity of the vows of one who, according to the foregoing canons, lawfully makes profession of simple vows in a religious congregation, is by that fact abolished, except an apostolic indult expressly determines otherwise. In the light of this canon we believe the interpretation given above of can. 633, § 1, is completely justified.

4 S. C. EE. et RR., May 30, 1856 (Bizzarri, p. 645 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XV

LEAVING THE RELIGIOUS STATE

By leaving the religious state is meant either a lawful or an illicit breaking of the juridical bond by which one is connected with a religious institute, which one entered by profession. Profession, as we have seen, may be either temporary or perpetual, and its effects vary, especially if perpetual profession is at the same time solemn. One may leave the religious state in a perfectly lawful way, or he may forsake it unlawfully. Of all these points our Code treats, beginning with the most lawful one, i. e., by the cessation of the obligation incurred by temporary profession.

CAN. 637

Professus a votis temporariis, expleto votorum tempore, libere potest religionem deserere; pariter religio ob iustas ac rationabiles causas eundem potest a renovandis votis temporariis vel ab emittenda professione perpetua excludere, non tamen ratione infirmitatis, nisi certo probetur eam ante professionem fuisse dolose reticitam aut dissimulatam.

One who has made profession of temporary vows may, when the term of the vows has expired, freely leave the institute; likewise, the institute, for just and reasonable motives, can exclude a religious from renewing the temporary vows or from making profession of perpetual vows; not, however, because of ill-health, except it be

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clearly proved that the religious had fraudulently hidden or dissimulated the illness before profession.

From this text it again appears that temporary profession, whether triennial or annual, may truly be called a protracted novitiate; otherwise a religious could not leave the institute after his term has expired. Formerly, i. e., up to a few years ago, such a conception of the simple profession never occurred to anyone. What is said in the second clause concerning the institute itself, that it may refuse to admit a religious to solemn or perpetual vows, is based on the same idea. Non-admittance is only a milder form of telling a religious to break off his relations. But as the vow is not yet solved, the legislator requires reasons. Such would be palpable signs of the lack of a religious vocation, mental debility, protracted absence from the services of the community, etc. Infirmity or ill-health is not considered a lawful reason. A decision of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars [1] says that if a sickly disposition should have existed prior to profession, this would be no reason for exclusion; but if the religious himself concealed the state of his health by fraudulent testimonies of a physician, or by his own assertions, this would be a sufficient ground for not admitting him to solemn or perpetual profession. A physician's testimony, accompanied by an affidavit to the effect that the religious had deceived the institution by his assertions, would be legal proof, as would also be the testimony of two witnesses in whose presence the religious before his first profession asserted that he was in good health if it can be proved by a physician's sworn certificate that the illness existed before he entered; for in such a case deceit or fraud is evident. To conceal the true condition of one's health is a merely negative act,

[1] May 13, 1904, O. S. B. (A. S. S., XXXVII, 445).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

whilst to dissimulate it means to use positive means to hide the truth. Both have the same effect, viz., to deceive.

A question may here be asked: A cleric had made profession, Aug. 15, 1915, therefore previously to May 19, 1918, and his vows were considered perpetual on his part. On Aug. 15, 1918, his simple vows would expire. May he apply our canon in his case and leave the religious state? We believe the affirmative answer would be upheld by the Roman Court. For not only did it look upon these simple vows as strictly triennial for at least a few years prior to the Code, which we know from personal experience, but the authentic answers given to several questions lead to that assumption. Thus the answer to the question concerning sponsalia and other impediments contracted before the new Code went into force was that betrothal and other impediments already contracted and to be contracted were to be treated according to the existing law.

SECULARIZATION

CAN. 638

Indultum manendi extra claustra, sive temporarium, idest indultum exclaustrationis, sive perpetuum, idest indultum saecularizationis, sola Sedes Apostolica in religionibus iuris pontificii dare potest; in religionibus iuris dioecesani etiam loci Ordinarius.

The Apostolic See alone can grant an indult, either for temporary absence or perpetual secularization, to members of papal institutes; whilst the Ordinary of the diocese may grant such an indult to members of diocesan institutes.

Temporary absence is called exclaustratio, or sometimes sæcularisatio ad tempus, i. e., permission to stay outside the monastery for one or three years, after the expiration of which the religious could apply for perpetual secularization. Now he may get the latter at once, but he must clearly state in his petition what he wishes. If he is a priest or cleric in higher orders, he must send in the documents of his superior with another from an Ordinary who is willing to receive him into his diocese. Both must be sent to the S. C. of Religious. The reasons for the request (ill-health, necessary support of parents, mental depression, unjust treatment, etc.) must be stated in the petition.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 639

Qui indultum exclaustrationis ab Apostolica Sede impetravit, votis ceterisque suae professionis obligationibus, quae cum suo statu componi possunt, manet obstrictus; exteriorem tamen debet habitus religiosi formam deponere; perdurante tempore indulti caret voce activa et passiva, sed gaudet privilegiis mere spiritualibus suae religionis, et Ordinario territorii ubi commoratur, loco Superiorum propriae religionis, subditui etiam ratione voti obedientiae.

Whoever has obtained from the Holy See the indult of exclaustration, remains bound by his vows and the other obligations of his profession compatible with his state. There is no dispensation granted from the observance of the vows, whereas other obligations imposed by the rule or constitutions, for instance, concerning fast and abstinence, discipline or scourging, and other penances, may be dispensed with. As to the habit, the text says that it must not be worn exteriorly, hence an interior sign of it, as, for instance, a small-sized scapular or girdle, is not forbidden. As long as the indult lasts the religious has no right to either an active or a passive voice in the institute, and hence could not be lawfully elected to an office without a dispensation. But he enjoys the spiritual favors granted to his institute, especially the indulgences to be gained on certain feast days. Lastly, instead of to the superior, he is subject to the Ordinary of the diocese in which he lives, by virtue of the vow of obedience. Concerning poverty it may be added that he is allowed as much as he needs for his support, but whatever he acquires belongs to the institute. If he wishes to return, the institute must receive him without a new novitiate.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECULARIZATION PROPER

CAN. 640

§ 1. Qui, impetrato saecularizationis indulto, religionem relinquit:

1.° A sua religione separatur, habitus eiusdem exteriorem formam debet deponere, et in Missa et horis canonicis, in usu et dispensatione Sacramentorum saecularibus assimilatur;

2.° A votis liberatus manet, firmis oneribus ordini maiori adnexis, si in sacris fuerit; non tenetur obligatione horas canonicas vi professionis recitandi nec aliis regulis et constitutionibus adstringitur.

§ 2. Si ex apostolico indulto in religionem rursus recipiatur, novitiatum ac professionem instaurat et locum inter professos obtinet a die novae professionis.

§ 1. When a professed religious, having obtained an indult of secularization, leaves his institute:

1.° He is cut off from his institute and must lay aside the religious habit and, as to Mass and canonical hours, is likened to seculars;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° He is freed from his vows, without prejudice to the obligations attaching to major orders, if he has received them; he is not obliged to the recitation of the canonical hours by virtue of his profession, nor is he bound by other rules and constitutions.

§ 2. If, by virtue of an apostolic indult, he is received again into the institute, he must make a new novitiate and profession, and his place amongst the professed members must be reckoned from the day of his new profession.

All this is new legislation and applies to religious of both sexes. Since a complete separation takes place by secularization, the mutual obligations between the institute and the individual religious cease, as do also the rights. Therefore new by-laws to that effect should be set up in conformity with the Code, especially concerning property and claims to compensation. What the text says concerning the Missal touches especially the Dominicans, who follow a somewhat different way in saying Mass. The rule concerning canonical hours affects all who have a Breviary different from that used by the secular clergy. The vows are now — this is an innovation — completely dissolved for all secularized religious not in higher orders. There is no longer an obligation to observe celibacy or to recite the Breviary, except, of course, when the discharged member is in higher orders.

INCARDINATION VS. SECULARIZATION

CAN. 641

§ 1. Si religiosus in sacris constitutus propriam dioecesim ad normam can. 585 non amiserit, debet, non renovatis votis, vel obtento saecularizationis indulto, ad propriam redire dioecesim et a proprio Ordi-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nario recipi; si amiserit, nequit extra religionem sacros ordines exercere, donec Episcopum benevolum receptorem invenerit, aut Sedes Apostolica aliter proviserit.

§ 2. Episcopus religiosum recipere potest sive pure et simpliciter, sive pro experimento ad triennium: in priore casu religiosus eo ipso est dioecesi incardinatus; in altero, Episcopus potest probationis tempus prorogare, non ultra tamen aliud triennium; quo etiam transacto, religiosus, nisi antea dimissus fuerit, ipso facto dioecesi incardinatus manet.

§ 1. A religious in higher orders, who, having made only temporary vows, has not been excardinated from his own diocese, must return to that diocese and be received by his Ordinary, in case he has not renewed his temporary vows or obtained an indult of secularization. If, having made perpetual vows, he has been excardinated, he may not exercise the sacred orders outside his institute until a benevolent Ordinary receives him into his diocese or the Apostolic See otherwise provides for him.

The last sentence is taken from "Auctis Admodum," Nov. 4, 1892, which also threatens the penalty of suspension for those who leave the monastery before having been received into a diocese or otherwise provided with a sufficient patrimony. However, this penalty is not mentioned in the Code and therefore abolished. But the condition of having first found a bishop remains, unless the Apostolic See makes different provision in its indult, as it sometimes does when the secularized religious has a sufficient patrimony and therefore need not resort to means unbecoming to his state.

§ 2. The bishop may receive a secularized religious either unconditionally or on trial. If unconditionally, the religious is by that fact incardinated in the diocese; if on trial for three years, the trial may be protracted for three years more, hence the whole term of trial may last six years, but no longer; at the expiration of that term the religious becomes ipso facto incardinated, unless he was dismissed before.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This law is very opportune and does away with the uncertainties apt to befall secularized religious. However, it is a new law which went into effect May 19, 1918, and is not retroactive. A bishop may now give a secularized religious a three or six years' trial and after that the religious is ipso facto incardinated, unless the bishop previously dismisses him from the diocese.

SECULARIZED RELIGIOUS PROHIBITED FROM HOLDING CERTAIN OFFICES

CAN. 642

§ 1. Quilibet professus, ad saeculum regressus, licet valeat, ad normam can. 641, sacros ordines exercere, prohibetur tamen sine novo et speciali Sanctae Sedis indulto:

1.° Quolibet beneficio in basilicis maioribus vel minoribus, et in ecclesiis cathedralibus;

2.° Quolibet magisterio et officio in Seminariis maioribus et minoribus seu collegiis, in quibus clerici educantur, itemque in Universitatibus et Institutis, quae privilegio apostolico gaudent conferendi gradus academicos;

3.° Quocunque officio vel munere in Curiis episcopalibus et in religiosis domibus sive virorum sive mulierum, etiamsi agatur de Congregationibus dioecesanis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Haec valent quoque de iis qui vota temporaria, vel iuramentum perseverantiae, vel peculiares quasdam promissiones ad normam suarum constitutionum ediderunt et ab eisdem dispensati fuerunt, si per sex integros annos eisdem ligati fuerint.

§ 1. A professed who leaves his institute may exercise the sacred orders in accordance with can. 641, but unless he receives a new and special indult to that effect from the Holy See:

1.° He may not hold any ecclesiastical benefice in a major or minor basilica or cathedral. This means that no canonicate or prebend of any kind can be given to him. If benefice is taken as synonymous with office, a secularized religious is also debarred from the offices of pastor or assistant at a cathedral church. However, salvo meliori iudicio, since penalties are odious, we believe that benefice must be taken in the strict sense, and excludes our cathedral churches, though it must be confessed that the intention of the law would also affect cathedral churches of our country.

2.° He is not allowed to accept the office of teacher or official in clerical seminaries, higher or lower (petit seminaries) in which clergymen are educated or in Catholic universities or institutions endowed with the right of conferring academic degrees (e. g., the Catholic University of America, St. Vincent's Seminary, Beatty, Pa.).

3.° Neither may he hold any office or charge in an episcopal court (chancellor, examiner, etc.), or in religious houses of men or women (as confessor or chaplain), although these may be diocesan institutions.

§ 2. These regulations apply also to those who pronounced only temporary vows, or took the oath of perseverance, or made other promises according to their constitutions, if they are dispensed from them, provided, however, that they have lived under these obligations for a period of at least six years. From this it follows that a novice who left his institute before making his profession, or after his temporary profession expired, does not fall under these rather severe restrictions.[2] For the latter was not dispensed, but free to leave (can. 637), whilst a novice needed no dispensation, had taken no vows and made no promises. Wherefore the beginning of § 1, "Quilibet professus, ad saeculum regressus," although somewhat general, must be interpreted according to § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

COMPENSATION

CAN. 643

§ 1. Qui e religione, expleto votorum temporariorum tempore aut obtento saecularizationis indulto, egrediantur vel ex eadem fuerint dimissi, nihil possunt repetere ob quamlibet operam religioni praestitam.

§ 2. Si tamen religiosa sine dote recepta fuerit nec ex propriis bonis sibimet providere valeat, religio ex caritate eidem dare debet ea quae requiruntur ut modo tuto ac convenienti domum redeat, ac providere ut, naturali aequitate servata, per aliquod tempus, mutuo consensu vel in casu dissensus ab Ordinario loci determinandum, honeste vivere possit.

§ 1. Whoever leaves his institute, whether at the expiration of the term of temporary vows or by virtue of an indult of secularization, or whoever has been dismissed, cannot seek compensation for the services rendered by him to the institute.

§ 2. In the case of a female religious who has been re-

2 The S. C. Rel. (June 15, 1909) made these regulations to protect the religious state.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceived without a dowry and cannot provide for herself out of her own resources, the institute should, in charity give her what is necessary for her to return safely and becomingly to her home, and provide her for a certain period with the means, to be determined by mutual agreement or, in case of disagreement, by the local Ordinary, of an honest livelihood in accordance with natural equity. Natural equity must take into consideration the usefulness of the member as well as the material condition in which she finds herself at the moment of leaving. Note the phrase, "ex caritate," as an act of charity, not justice. Hence a member will appeal in vain to the civil court if this canon is properly incorporated in the by-laws.[3]

APOSTATES AND FUGITIVES

CAN. 644

§ 1. Apostata a religione dicitur professus a votis perpetuis sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus qui e domo religiosa illegitime egreditur cum animo non redeundi, vel qui, etsi legitime egressus, non redit eo animo ut religiosae obedientiae sese subtrahat.

§ 2. Malitiosus animus, de quo in § 1, iure praesumitur, si religiosus intra mensem nec reversus fuerit nec Superiori animum redeundi manifestaverit.

§ 3. Fugitivus est qui, sine Superiorum licentia, domum religiosam deserit cum animo ad religionem redeundi.

§ 1. An apostate from religion is one who, having made profession of perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, unlawfully leaves the religious house with the intention of not returning or who, with the intention of withdrawing himself from religious obedience, though he has lawfully left the house, does not return to it.

3 Cfr. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, p. 80 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. The perverse intention mentioned in § 1, is legally presumed when the religious has not returned within a month nor manifested to his superior his intention of returning.

It is illegal for a religious to leave the monastery without the permission of the superior, whether he lays aside his habit or not, provided he is determined not to return. This intention is not present if he leaves the monastery with the purpose of seeking a higher superior to demand redress for supposedly unjust treatment by his own superior.[4] If, however, he transfers himself to another religious institute without a papal indult, he is considered an apostate, because he wishes to withdraw himself from the obedience due to the superior into whose hands or for whose house he has made profession.[5]

The Code most reasonably gives one month for deliberation. After the lapse of that term the religious who refuses to return is presumed to be an apostate. But this presumption is only de iure and may be shattered by ordinary proofs. Thus, for instance, if the religious could prove by one trustworthy eye-witness that he wrote to the superior and the letter was lost, the presumption would cease; or if the superior misplaced or neglected to open the letter, and would find or open it later, presumption would be null, and the religious could not be called an apostate. Thus, also, if the religious was prevented by some accident from writing or returning home, he would not be an apostate.

4 This is common teaching; cfr. Piatus M., I, 196.

5 Sixtus V, "Cum de omnibus," Oct. 21, 1588; "Ad Romanam," Oct. 21, 1589.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. A fugitive is one who, without the permission of his superiors, deserts a religious house with the intention of returning to the institute. Here, too, a perverse intention must be supposed, consisting in the will and desire of getting rid of the obligation of religious obedience. To go away for fun or in a roaming spirit would be merely a stealthy withdrawal.[6] Neither must he be considered a fugitive who dwells with persons who know him well and have no suspicion of his irregular leave.[7] The Code does not say how long a time must elapse until a religious is to be regarded as a fugitive. This point may be determined by the constitutions or by custom. In houses where the religious may be absent for several days without suspicion or attention, it would be unreasonable to be hasty in branding one as a fugitive. Here again it must be stated that every religious has the right to seek a higher superior to obtain relief from injustice.[8]

OBLIGATIONS OF APOSTATES AND FUGITIVES

CAN. 645

§ 1. Apostata et fugitivus ab obligatione regulae et votorum minime solvuntur et debent sine mora ad religionem redire.

§ 2. Superiores debent eos sollicite requirere, et ipsos, si vera poenitentia acti redeant, suscipere; reditum vero monialis apostatae vel fugitivae caute curet loci Ordinarius, et, si agatur de monasterio exempto, etiam Superior regularis.

§ 1. Neither an apostate nor a fugitive is freed from the obligation of his rule and vows, and must without delay return to his institute.

6 Piatus M., I, p. 205.
7 Sixtus V, "Cum de omnibus," § 20.
8 Santi-Leitner, III, 31, n. 45 (Vol. III, p. 313).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. The superiors must seek them with solicitude, and receive them, if they return repentent; but as to apostate or fugitive nuns, the local Ordinary shall prudently see to their return, and the regular superior also, in the case of an exempt monastery.

A decree of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars [9] says that apostates and fugitives who repair to a convent of other regulars or religious, must be returned by the superiors of that convent, and that deserters must return under the penalties threatened for apostates. The penalties against apostates and fugitives are stated in can. 2385 f., infra.

Apostates in the strict sense of the word are subject to excommunication, reserved to the higher superior if the institute is exempt, or to the Ordinary of the diocese in which they live. However, in the former case any priest with ordinary faculties may absolve them (can. 519). If they are reserved to the Ordinary, the confessor must have faculties from the same, which are also granted to the canon penitentiary (can. 401).

Fugitives are deprived of any office they may hold and suspended if they are clerics in higher orders. This suspension is reserved to the higher superiors.

Should an apostate religious die outside his monastery — concerning confession note that all reservations cease in articulo mortis — his so-called property formerly was held to belong to the Camera Apostolica.[10] Now-a-days the civil courts would probably decide in favor of the religious institute or of the heirs, if the latter would claim the property.

9 Aug. 11, 1758 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 330). This decision proves the correctness of our interpretation as to the unlawfulness of an arbitrary transfer to another institute; cfr. also cc. 7, 24, X, III, 31.

10 Piatus M., I, 204.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVI

THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS

After mentioning legal and illegal egress from a religious institute, the Code draws attention to the part which the institute itself may take in dismissing members who are no longer regarded as desirable. Every society must have ways and means for expelling unfit members. The Code begins by mentioning three facts which entail ipso facto dismissal.

CAN. 646

§ 1. Ipso facto habendi sunt tanquam legitime dimissi religiosi:

1.° Publici apostatae a fide catholica;

2.° Religiosus, qui fugam arripuerit cum muliere; aut religiosa quae cum viro;

3.° Attentantes aut contrahentes matrimonium aut etiam vinculum, ut aiunt, civile.

§ 2. In his casibus sufficit ut Superior maior cum suo Capitulo vel Consilio ad normam constitutionum emittat declarationem facti; curet autem probationes facti collectas in domus regestis asservare.

§ 1. The following religious are ipso facto regarded as lawfully dismissed:

1.° Religious who have publicly apostatized from the Catholic faith;

2.° A religious who has run away with a person of the opposite sex;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Religious who attempt or contract marriage, even civil marriage.

Apostates from the Catholic faith are those who renounce Catholic doctrine or morality. Hence if a religious would openly deny even one article of faith, he would be an apostate, the same if he became a Mohammedan, or Buddhist, or Brahman, etc., or joined a heretical sect, or became a "free-thinker," for it hardly seems possible that any one could combine this state of mind with the obsequium fidei — due submission to the faith.[1] But, as stated, the defection must be public, i. e., either by public profession, or by evidence obtained from official sources.

Regarding n. 2, note that the intention of marrying each other is not required. Marriage is considered in n. 3. Those are said to attempt matrimony who cannot contract a valid (even though "purely civil") marriage under the law of the Church.[2]

In all such cases the higher superior, with his chapter or council, according as the constitutions prescribe, should make a declaration of the fact and preserve the documentary proofs thereof in the archives of the house. They are often needed later, especially if the apostate religious should attempt a trial. The higher superior is the one who, according to the constitutions, has the right to dismiss. The constitutions must also determine whether the superior must call the whole chapter, or the counsellors only.

1 Avanzini, Comment. in "Apostolicae Sedis," 1883, p. 4 ff.

2 A civil marriage is one contracted before the officials of the state.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH TEMPORARY VOWS

CAN. 647

§ 1. Professum a votis temporariis sive in Ordinibus sive in Congregationibus iuris pontificii dimittere potest supremus religionis Moderator vel Abbas monasterii sui iuris cum consensu sui Consilii per secreta suffragia manifestato, vel, si agatur de monialibus, Ordinarius loci et, si monasterium sit regularibus obnoxium, Superior regularis, postquam monasterii Antistita cum suo Consilio fidem de causis scripto fecerit; in Congregationibus vero iuris dioecesani, Ordinarius loci in quo religiosa domus sita est, qui tamen iure suo ne utatur Moderatoribus insciis vel dissentientibus.

§ 2. Ii omnes, graviter eorum onerata conscientia, religiosum dimittere nequeunt, nisi servatis quae sequuntur:

1.° Causae dimissionis debent esse graves;

2.° Possunt se habere sive ex parte religionis sive ex parte religosi. Defectus spiritus religiosi qui aliis scandalo sit, est sufficiens dimissionis causa, si repetita monitio una cum salutari poenitentia incassum cesserit, non vero infirma valetudo, nisi certo constet eam ante professionem fuisse dolose reticitam aut dissimulatam;

3.° Licet Superiori dimittenti certo innotescere debeant, non est tamen necesse ut formali iudicio com-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

probentur. At religioso semper manifestari debent, data eidem plena respondendi licentia; eiusque responsiones Superiori dimittenti fideliter subiiciantur;

4.° Contra dimissionis decretum est religioso facultas recurrendi ad Sedem Apostolicam; et pendente recursu, dimissio nullum habet iuridicum effectum;

5.° Si de mulieribus agatur, servari debet praescriptum can. 643, § 2.

§ 1 determines who are the superiors who may dismiss religious with temporary vows.

(1) In orders and congregations with papal approval this right belongs to the superior general, in autonomous monasteries, to the abbot; but the general as well as the abbot can only proceed with the consent of the counsellors, which must be given by secret ballot. Note the term "consent," which binds the superior under pain of acting invalidly.

(2) If a nun is to be dismissed, the Ordinary may dismiss her after the superioress with her counsellors has given a written attestation of the motives for the dismissal; if the convent is subject to regulars, the regular prelate may also dismiss her. The declaration of 1858 permits the general to subdelegate the business of dismissal to at least three prudent and honest religious for distant provinces.[1] This may still be admitted, according to Regula Juris, n. 68: "What one is permitted to do himself, he may do through others." The Code does not exclude this assumption, but rather favors it (see can. 668).

(3) In diocesan congregations the right of dismissing a Sister belongs to the Ordinary in whose diocese the house is located. However, he should not act without the knowledge of the superioress or against her just opposition. Such an arbitrary procedure would tend to relax discipline and undermine the authority of the superioress.

1 S. C. super Statu Regul., Junc 12, 1858, n. IV (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 856).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. These superiors and Ordinaries can dismiss a religious only on the following conditions, the observance of which constitutes for them a grave obligation in conscience:

1.° The motives for the dismissal must be grave;

2.° These motives may be either on the side of the institute or on the part of the religious. Thus a scandalous lack of the religious spirit would be a sufficient reason. A religious who, though often admonished, and even punished, refuses to mend his ways, may be dismissed. But ill-health, unless fraudulently concealed or dissimulated before profession, would not be a sufficient motive for dismissal.

3.° Although the superior who is entitled to dismiss a religious must be aware and certain of the motives, it is not necessary that they be proved by a judicial process, i. e., no witnesses, summonses, judge, plaintiff, and sentence are required; not even written documents. However, says the Code, the motives must be made known to the religious, and full liberty to reply given him; and his replies must be faithfully submitted to the superior effecting the dismissal.

4.° The religious has the right to appeal against the decree of dismissal to the Holy See, i. e., the S. Congregation of Religious; and pending the appeal, which should, of course, be notified to the superior, the dismissal has no juridical effect. This is a recourse or appeal in suspensivo.

5.° In the case of religious women, can. 643, § 2, concerning provision, must be observed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EFFECTS OF DISMISSAL

CAN. 648

Religiosus dimissus ad normam can. 647 ipso facto solvitur ab omnibus votis religiosis, salvis oneribus ordini maiori adnexis, si sit in sacris, et firmo praescripto can. 641, § 1, 642; clericus autem in minoribus ordinibus constitutus eo ipso redactus est in statum laicalem.

A religious (with temporary vows) dismissed according to can. 647 is ipso facto freed from all his religious vows, without prejudice to the obligations attaching to major orders (celibacy and the Breviary) if he has received them. A religious in higher orders who is dismissed by his superiors must return to his own diocese and obey the prescriptions of can. 642. A cleric in minor orders simply returns to the lay state.

Here a doubt occurs because of the wording of can. 642, § 2, where those who have made profession of temporary vows are laid under said restr ictions only in case they have been professed for six years. Are they obliged to the rule of said canon if dismissed before six years have elapsed? We believe they are, because it is not a mere voluntary dispensation, but a forced dispensation by reason of dismissal, which the legislator wishes to punish more severely. But we state this opinion with all due reserve.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS FROM A NON-EXEMPT CLERICAL OR LAY INSTITUTE

CAN. 649

In virorum religionibus clericalibus non exemptis et laicalibus, ut professus a votis perpetuis dimitti possit, praecedant necesse est tria delicta cum duplici monitione ac defectu emendationis ad normam can. 656–662.

The dismissal of a member who has made profession of perpetual vows in a non-exempt clerical or in a lay institute is effected in pretty much the same way as in an exempt clerical institute. The member to be dismissed must have been convicted of at least three offences; he must have been admonished twice and proved incorrigible. These points are further developed in can. 656–662.

CAN. 650

§ 1. Haec si constiterint, supremus religionis Moderator cum suo Consilio, perpensis omnibus facti adiunctis, deliberet num locus sit dimissioni.

§ 2. Si maior suffragiorum numerus pro dimissione steterit;

1.° In religione iuris dioecesani res tota deferatur ad Ordinarium loci in quo religiosa professi domus sita est, cuius est dimissionem pro suo prudenti arbitrio decernere ad normam can. 647;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

2.° In religione iuris pontificii ipse supremus religionis Moderator dimissionis decretum ferat; quod tamen ut suum sortiatur effectum, debet a Sede Apostolica confirmari.

§ 3. Religioso ius est suas rationes libere exponendi; eiusque responsiones in actis fideliter referendae sunt.

When these facts (i. e., the three offences, two admonitions and incorrigibility) are ascertained, the superior general of the institute with his council, having considered all the circumstances, shall deliberate whether the case be one for dismissal.

If the majority of the votes are for dismissal:

1.° In diocesan institutes, the whole matter must be referred to the Ordinary, in whose diocese the religious house of the professed is located, and it rests with him to decide on the dismissal according to his discretion, conformably to the terms of can. 647;

2.° In the case of papal institutes the superior general issues the decree of dismissal; but to become effective it must be ratified by the Apostolic See. This latter text is taken from "Conditae" (II, 1), which says that the superior general, in dismissing professed members, must follow the rules of the institute and the pontifical decrees. But these constitutions should now be modelled upon the new law.

§ 3. The religious has the right to freely expose his reasons, and his replies must be conscientiously reported in the acts, which are to be forwarded to the S. Congregation of Religious. In order to obtain this result, it will be best to make an abstract of the papers proving the offences, admonitions, and reasons stated by the religious and hand it over to the religious himself for his signature.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 651

§ 1. Etiam ad dimittendas religiosas professas a votis perpetuis sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus exiguntur graves causae exteriores una cum incorrigibilitate, experimento prius habito ita ut spes resipiscentiae evanuerit, iudicio Antistitae.

§ 2. Praescriptum can. 650, § 3 etiam in religiosarum dimissione servandum est.

Also for the dismissal of religious women who have made profession of perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, grave external reasons are required, together with incorrigibility, experience having proved, in the judgment of the superioress, that there is no hope of amendment. The Sister, too, according to can. 650, § 3, must be allowed to defend herself, and her reasons must be faithfully inserted in the documents to be sent to Rome.

CAN. 652

§ 1. Si agatur de religiosis iuris dioecesani, Ordinarii loci in quo sita est sororis professae domus, est causas dimissionis expendere et decretum dimissionis ferre.

§ 2. Si de monialibus, Ordinarius loci omnia acta et documenta transmittat ad Sacram Congregationem cum suo et Superioris regularis voto, si monasterium regularibus sit subiectum.

§ 3. Si de aliis religiosis iuris pontificii, suprema religionis Moderatrix rem totam ad Sacram Congregationem pariter deferat cum omnibus actis et documentis; Sacra autem Congregatio tum in hoc tum in praecedenti casu quod magis expedire censuerit, decernet, firmo praescripto can. 643, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. In the case of diocesan institutes the Ordinary in whose diocese the house of the professed Sister is located, must weigh the motives for and issue the decree of dismissal.

§ 2. If there be question of nuns with solemn vows, the local Ordinary shall transmit to the S. Congregation of Religious all the acts and documents with a statement of his own judgment and that of the regular superior if the monastery be subject to regulars.

§ 3. For dismissing members of a papal institute, the superioress general likewise shall transmit to the S. Congregation the whole matter with all the acts and documents, but without expressing her own opinion; whereupon the S. Congregation shall decide the case, without prejudice to can. 643, § 2, which guarantees a decent material provision.

CAN. 653

In casu gravis scandali exterioris vel gravissimi nocumenti communitati imminentis, religiosus statim potest a Superiore maiore cum consensu sui Consilii vel etiam, si periculum sit in mora et tempus non adsit adeundi Superiorem maiorem, a Superiore locali cum consensu sui Consilii et Ordinarii loci, ad saeculum remitti, habitu religioso illico deposito, ita tamen ut res per ipsum Ordinarium aut per Superiorem maiorem, si adsit, Sanctæ Sedis iudicio sine mora subiiciatur.

In the case of grave external scandal or of very serious imminent injury to the community, the religious may be dismissed immediately by the higher superior with the consent of his council, or even by the local superior with the consent of his council and of the local Ordinary if there be danger in delay and time does not admit of recourse to the higher superior; the religious must immediately put off the religious habit and the whole matter must, without delay, be referred to the Holy See (S. C. Rel.) either by the Ordinary or by the higher superior, if he be present.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Note the gradation of grave scandal and very serious imminent injury to the community. The scandal must be external, i. e., known to outsiders, e. g., the surrounding parish or municipality, and deserving of the name according to sound moral principles. Gossip or mere prejudice is not scandal. Neither is there real scandal if the fact is not notorious,[1] i. e., known to more than two or three persons. A very serious injury would threaten a community if a member had misappropriated large sums of money or proved a stumbling-block to other members by seduction or violent outbursts of temper, or caused suspicion of disloyalty [2] by foolish utterances or actions or political intrigues.

The term consent supposes strict balloting and involves the obligation on the part of the superior to abide by the vote of the majority. In case of a tie, for instance, two against two, his own vote would be decisive.

1 Cfr. can. 2197.

2 A disloyal citizen can hardly be a good religious, because he is lacking in obedience to the natural law.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

THE JUDICIAL PROCESS FOR THE DISMISSAL OF RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS IN EXEMPT CLERICAL INSTITUTES

CAN. 654

Vir professus a votis sollemnibus aut a votis simplicibus perpetuis in religione clericali exempta ne dimittatur, nisi processu instituto, salvo praescripto can. 646, 668, et revocato quolibet contrario privilegio.

After stating the rules for dismissing members who have made profession of temporary vows only, whether in orders or congregations, and for dismissing members with perpetual vows in non-exempt institutes, including nuns with solemn vows, the Code now proceeds to establish fixed rules for the dismissal of another class of religious, viz., members of male institutes with a clerical character, which belong to the category of exempt religious. These institutes, permitting their members to make profession of perpetual vows, occupy a higher place in the hierarchic order, and being by reason of exemption withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Ordinary, demand special consideration. Note the term exempt, which comprises not only orders of regulars proper, but all clerical institutes endowed with exemption by virtue of a papal indult. Hence the Passionists, the Redemptoists, the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Mary are included, whereas all female orders or congregations, although they may enjoy exemption, are excluded. A doubt arises as to laybrothers of exempt institutes; for they belong to such and yet are not of the clerical order proper. This doubt can only be solved by the authentic interpreters. Can. 654 says: No male religious, who has made profession of perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, in an exempt clerical institute, may be dismissed except upon a canonical trial, every privilege to the contrary being revoked, save only the case stated in can. 646 and 668. What a canonical trial means the following canons explain. The legislator revokes each and every privilege which would render this law ineffective. Hence if any order or exempt congregation has obtained a privilege previous to May 19, 1918, concerning dismissal of perpetually professed members without canonical trial, that privilege is now invalid. The Code excepts only two cases from this general rule, viz.: the one mentioned in can. 646, which requires no trial, but only a declaratory sentence; and the case of grave external scandal or very serious injury threatening the community. With these exceptions in view the legislator proceeds to outline the canonical trial. A trial requires a judge, a plaintiff, and a defendant, and, in criminal cases, also a crime that is prosecuted. The canon immediately following determines who is the judge in such trials.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 655

§ 1. Ad sententiam dimissionis ferendam competens est supremus religionis vel monasticae Congregationis Moderator cum suo Consilio seu Capitulo, quod quatuor saltem religiosis constet; si qui deficiant, eorum loco totidem religiosos eligat praeses de consensu aliorum qui cum ipso tribunal collegiale constituant.

§ 2. Praeses de aliorum consensu promotorem iustitiae nominet ad normam can. 1589, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In centralized organizations the superior general is the competent judge who issues the decree of dismissal; in monastic congregations the abbot president is the judge, but both the general and the abbot must have a council or chapter consisting of at least four religious whom they are obliged to consult. In case one or the other of these counsellors be absent, the president may, with the consent of the others, select ad hoc other religious, to form the collegiate tribunal. The president with the consent of the other counsellors must appoint a promotor iustitiae according to can. 1589, § 2.

Pope Urban VIII, in 1624, outlined the legal procedure to be taken in case of the expulsion or dismissal (which latter term is used exclusively in our Code) of religious. But, as the decree of the S. C. Rel., of May 16, 1911, stated, these formalities could not always be observed, and hence had to be reduced to what is a summary proceeding, which contains the essential elements of an ecclesiastical trial without the accidental features that might delay prompt action. It is this summary trial which we find embodied in the Code, following the instruction of May 16, 1911. The latter, therefore, must form the basis of interpretation.

The persons constituting the tribunal are the superior general with at least four "definers" or counsellors. The abbot president takes the place of the judge in monastic congregations. But he too must have at least four counsellors. Hence let it be understood once for all that all monastic congregations must at their general chapter elect counsellors. These counsellors are not to be the abbots of the single monasteries, but religious who dwell with the abbot president and form a regular or collegiate tribunal with him. The counsellors of the monastery whose abbot acts as president for a certain term, generally three or six years, are not the counsellors of the congregation, nor can they pretend to act as such. Only in case the one or other of the duly elected counsellors is absent, or missing, or dead, may the abbot president appoint other religious in their stead. But in doing so he must have the consent, to be given by ballot, of the remaining counsellors, i. e., those who constitute the tribunal. This is a point which should be clearly embodied in the constitutions, and no abbot is allowed to set it aside. The decree of the S. C. Rel., May 16, 1911, adds that if an abbey is not affiliated with any congregation, recourse must in each single case be had to the Holy See. This should remind all superiors of the importance of the enactment stated above.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But the Code also insists upon appointing a prosecuting attorney or promotor iustitiae. He is, according to § 2 of our canon, to be nominated by the superior general or the abbot president "with the consent of the others." Who are these others? According to § 1 they would be the counsellors of the regular tribunal, and this explanation may be accepted if the attorney is chosen for each single case of dismissal. However, the decree of the S. C. of Rel., quoted above, would have him elected by the general chapter. And it is certainly more in conformity with the intention of the legislator that his office be permanent or at least for a determined period or term. Hence he, too, would have to be elected by the general chapter. He must be a religious of the same order or congregation, says the decree quoted, and his functions are to defend justice and law: "pro iuris et legis tutela."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

REQUISITES OF A TRIAL

CAN. 656

Ad processum instruendum deveniri nequit nisi praecesserint:

1.° Gravia delicta externa sive contra ius commune sive contra speciale religiosorum ius;

2.° Monitiones;

3.° Defectus emendationis.

No judicial proceedings may be begun unless preceded by:

1.° Grave external offences either against the common law or against the special law of religious;

2.° Admonitions;

3.° Failure to amend.

CAN. 657

Delicta debent esse saltem eiusdem speciei, vel, si diversae, talia ut simul sumpta manifestent perversam voluntatem in malo pervicacem, aut unum tantum permanens, quod ex repetitis monitionibus virtualiter triplex fiat.

The offences committed must be at least three of the same species or, if they are of different species, of such a nature that when taken together they manifest the perversity of the will resolved on evil, or only one continuous offence which, from repeated admonitions, has virtually become threefold.

A grave external offence presupposes a public violation of some important law, either of the common law of the Church, in which case it comprises the whole range of the Penal Code (Book V); or of the particular statutory law set up by the respective institute. The essential feature of a delictum or crime is that it be externally manifest and cause injury to society at large or to the religious community.[1] Thus not to wear the religious habit is against the common law;[2] entering saloons without necessity is against the general law of the church,[3] etc., etc. The special laws of each religious institute are laid down in the respective constitutions, which differ in different orders. A common feature of all, we believe, is the prohibition of stubborn resistance to the injunctions of a superior when he commands in accordance with the rule and constitutions. Thus a Benedictine would act against his special laws by absenting himself without a sufficient reason from choir-service. A mendicant would transgress his rule if, without reason, he would refuse to go begging as enjoined by the rule. A member of a teaching order would transgress if he would refuse to teach.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

These offences, the Code says, must be grave and external, i. e., such as constitute a grievous sin, and be perpetrated notoriously. For we believe we are justified if we take external as synonymous with notorious. Notorious, according to the Code, is an act which cannot be concealed by any tergiversation or contrivance and excused by no pretext of law or right.[4] However, notoriety, as shall be seen from can. 658, may be effected by still other means, though even these suppose a certain measure of public knowledge.

The Code distinguishes (a) Offences of the same species, three in number, for instance, drunkenness committed on three different occasions; this is the numerical

1 In secular law "a crime or misdeamor is defined by Blackstone to be an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it." Bishop, Commentaries on the Criminal Law, ed. 6, Boston, 1877, § 32.

2 Can. 596, can. 136.

3 Can. 138.

4 Can. 2197.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

distinction; (b) Specifically different offences, for instance, absence from choir, outbursts of ill-temper, refusal to accept appropriate penances, which, taken together, show a lack of good will and no hope of amendment; (c) One continuous offence, e. g., familiarity proscribed by the constitutions; but this must be, as it were, split into three numerically distinct offences by the canonical admonition. Of these the Code speaks in the following canons, 658–661.

CANONICAL ADMONITIONS

CAN. 658

§ 1. Ad monitionem faciendam necesse est ut aut delictum sit notorium aut de eodem constet ex rei confessione extraiudiciali vel ex aliis sufficientibus probationibus quas praevia inquisitio suppeditaverit.

§ 2. In inquisitione peragenda serventur, congrua congruis referendo, praescripta can. 1939 seqq.

CAN. 659

Monitio fieri debet ad immediato Superiore maiori per se vel per alium de eius mandato; sed Superior mandatum ne det, nisi praevia informatione facti ad normam can. 658, § 1; datum vero mandatum pro prima monitione valeat etiam pro altera.

CAN. 660

Duae debent esse monitiones, scilicet singulae pro singulis duobus primis delictis; in delictis autem continuatis seu permanentibus intercedat necesse est inter primam et alteram monitionem saltem trium dierum integrum spatium.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 661

§ 1. Monitionibus Superior addat opportunas exhortationes et correptiones, praescriptis insuper poenitentiis aliisque remediis poenalibus, quae apta censeantur ad emendationem rei et scandali reparationem.

§ 2. Praeterea tenetur Superior reum ab occasionibus relabendi removere etiam per translationem, si opus fuerit, ad aliam domum, ubi facilior sit vigilantia et remotior delinquendi occasio.

§ 3. Singulis monitionibus adiiciatur dimissionis comminatio.

Can. 658 enjoins superiors not to proceed to canonical admonition unless the offence be notorious or manifest either from the extra-judicial confession of the culprit or from other sufficient proofs furnished by previous investigation. This investigation must be conducted according to the prescriptions of can. 1939–1946. The substance of these prescriptions is: a religious should be appointed to make the investigation; he is bound to strict secrecy and exhorted not to believe hostile denunciations, or to accept anonymous information or such offered by untrustworthy persons; he may secretly and confidentially employ helpers and must report the result to the superior, together with his own opinion. A sufficient proof, according to a decree of May 16, 1911, would be the testimony of two sworn witnesses. Authentic statements by a civil court would also be admitted.

Can. 659 says that the canonical admonition must be given by the immediate higher superior personally or by another acting on his mandate. Hence the provincial should give the admonition, or the local superior in virtue of a special mandate or commission of the provincial. But this commission must not be given by the latter until he has obtained information on the facts, according to can. 658, § 1. The mandate given for the first admonition avails also for the second.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 660 says that at least two admonitions must be given: one for each of the first two offences; but in the case of continuous or permanent offences, an interval of at least three whole days must elapse between the first and second admonition.

Can. 661 provides that (§ 1) the superior shall add to his admonitions opportune exhortations and corrections, besides imposing penances and other penal remedies,— for instance, retreats, removal from office,— which are calculated to procure the amendment of the culprit and the reparation of the scandal.

The superior is also bound (§ 2) to remove the culprit from the occasions of relapse, even to the extent of transferring him, if necessary, to another house, where he may be more easily watched and the occasion of offending is more remote.

Lastly (§ 3) each admonition must be accompanied by the threat of expulsion.

LACK OF AMENDMENT

CAN. 662

Religiosus censetur se non emendasse, si post secundam monitionem novum delictum commiserit vel in eodem permanenter perstiterit; post ultimam monitionem sex saltem dies erit expectandum, antequam ad ulteriora progressus fiat.

The religious is considered not to have amended if, after the second admonition, he commits a new offence or perseveres in the old one; after the last admonition, at least six days must elapse before further steps be taken.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 663

Immediatus Superior maior, postquam monitiones et correctiones incassum cesserint, omnia acta et documenta diligenter colligat et ad supremum Moderatorem transmittat; hic autem ea tradere debet promotori iustitiae, qui ea examinet et suas conclusiones proponat.

After the admonitions and corrections have proved inefficacious, the immediate higher superior shall carefully collect all the materials and documents and send the same to the superior general, who shall deliver them to the prosecuting attorney, who shall examine them and propose his deductions. We say, "deductions," for conclusion would mean the end of the allegations or proofs together with a renunciation of further investigation,[5] which cannot be the meaning here. The prosecuting attorney is simply to deduce from the materials submitted some opinion and submit the same.[6]

CAN. 664

§ 1. Si promotor iustitiae, cui fas est etiam ulteriores inquisitiones, quas opportunas iudicaverit peragere, accusationem proponat, instruatur processus, servatis praescriptis canonum in Parte Prima Libri Quarti, congrua congruis referendo.

§ 2. Ex processu constare debet de delictis patratis, de praemissa duplici monitione et de defectu emendationis.

After the prosecuting attorney, who may demand further investigations to be made if he deems fit, has formu-

5 Cfr. Reiffenstuel, II, 19, n. 159.

6 It is evident that the abbot president must not send the material to the Abbot Primate, because the former is the supreme superior in monastic congregations; besides the Abbot Primate has no council or chapter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lated the accusation, the regular trial may begin. In this trial, the Code says, the prescriptions of the first part of Book IV (concerning ecclesiastical procedure) must be observed. These are briefly: that the judge be competent, that the plaintiff (who is generally the institute itself) be duly represented and follow the rules prescribed, that the witnesses be beyond suspicion, that the summons be made according to the established rules, that the admonition be served in a proper way, that the necessary time be granted for defence, that exceptions and appeals be admitted, that the sentence be issued properly. All this, of course, requires a knowledge of Canon Law. The trial itself, says § 2 of our canon, must make it evident that the offences were really committed, that the two canonical admonitions were duly given, and that the culprit did not amend his conduct. These are the principal points to which the prosecuting attorney should devote his attention. If one of these cannot be proved, the trial comes to naught.

SENTENCE OF THE TRIBUNAL

CAN. 665

Tribunal, diligenter perpensis allegationibus tum promotoris iustitiae tum rei, si quidem iudicaverit satis probata esse ea de quibus in can. 664, §2, sententiam dimissionis pronuntiet.

After the tribunal has carefully weighed the allegations or pleas of both the prosecuting attorney and the defendant, it may pronounce sentence of dismissal, provided it has found the three points mentioned in can. 664, § 2, sufficiently proved. The sentence must be pronounced by the judge, i. e., the superior general or the abbot president, who must be morally certain of the truth regarding all three points.[7] The sentence is called definitive because the end of the trial (viz., dismissal) is attained.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RATIFICATION OF THE SENTENCE

CAN. 666

Sententia exsecutioni mandari nequit, nisi fuerit a Sacra Congregatione confirmata; ad quam tribunalis praeses et sententiam et omnia acta processus quamprimum transmittere curabit.

The sentence pronounced by the tribunal shall take effect only after it has been ratified by the S. Congregation of Religious, to which all the acta as well as the sentence itself must be forwarded by the president of the tribunal. Note that the S. Congregation will handle no case unless at least a preliminary attempt has been made by the religious tribunal to bring forward material enough for a decision. Hence it would be useless to refer a case to the S. Congregation without papers and a previous sentence, simply to shirk the obligation of a trial. Of course, if a dispensation is demanded, the case may go immediately to the S. Congregation.

DELEGATION OF TRIAL

CAN. 667

Pro dissitis regionibus etiam in casibus ordinariis supremi Moderatores cum consensu sui Consilii seu Capituli possunt dimittendi facultatem demandare probis ac prudentibus religiosis, qui saltem tres esse debent, firmo praescripto can. 663–666.

For distant provinces the superior general may, even 7 Cfr. can. 1868 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in ordinary cases, with the consent of his council or chapter, delegate the power of dismissal to trustworthy and prudent religious, who must be at least three in number and follow the prescriptions of can. 663–666. It is generally understood that the dissitae regiones are those beyond the Atlantic Ocean, but even Great Britain is, or was formerly, considered a distant and remote country.[8]

CAN. 668

In casu, de quo in can. 653, religiosus statim potest a Superiore maiore, vel si periculum sit in mora et tempus non adsit recurrendi ad Superiorem maiorem, a Superiore quoque locali, cum consensu sui Consilii, ad saeculum remitti, habitu religioso illico deposito; religioso autem dimisso, statim processus, si nondum fuerit institutus, instituatur ad normam canonum qui praecedunt.

This canon is a rehearsal of can. 653, with the exception of the last clause: after the religious has been dismissed, a trial (if it had not yet begun) must be started according to the preceding canons.

8 Whether the abbots presidents may delegate the power of dismissal to other religious is not plainly stated in the text. However, considering the great distances in our countries, we believe that, at least in extraordinary cases, as the S. C. Super Statu Regul., June 12, 1858, n. IV (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 856) says, delegation would be admissible and certainly valid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

DISMISSED RELIGIOUS WITH PERPETUAL VOWS

CAN. 669

§ 1. Professus qui vota perpetua emisit, a religione dimissus, votis religiosis manet adstrictus, salvis constitutionibus aut Sedis Apostolicae indultis quae aliud ferant.

§ 2. Si clericus est in minoribus ordinibus constitutus, eo ipso reducitur ad statum laicalem.

A dismissed professed religious remains bound by his religious vows, unless the constitutions or a papal indult determine otherwise. A clergyman in minor orders is, by dismissal, reduced to the lay state.

CAN. 670

Clericus in sacris qui aliquod delictum commisit de quo in can. 646, aut dimissus est ob delictum quod iure communi punitur infamia iuris vel depositione vel degradatione, perpetuo prohibetur deferre habitum ecclesiasticum.

A cleric in higher orders, who has publicly apostatized from the Catholic faith, or run away with a woman, or attempted marriage, is forever debarred from wearing the ecclesiastical garb. The same punishment follows him if he is dismissed from his institute on account of a crime which in common law is qualified as infamous, or punished with deposition or degradation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

In these two canons the Code states the general penalties for dismissed religious. Note the title of the chapter: it embraces all religious who have made profession of perpetual vows, because the legislator does not distinguish between clerical and non-clerical, exempt and non-exempt religious. Only the constitutions [1] or a papal indult may absolve them from the obligation of observing the vows. Hence a dismissed religious must observe the vow of poverty as far as his condition permits. What he acquires really belongs to the religious community. Here the civil law might interfere, unless the by-laws fix the point. As to the vow of chastity, the difference between simple and solemn vows is unchanged, that is to say, the former do not debar valid marriage, whereas solemn vows render an attempted marriage invalid. The vow of obedience to the religious superior also remains in force as do the special vows of the institute. However, many reliable authors — the Code does not oppose their opinion — declare such religious free from the obligation of the Breviary and fasts, etc.[2]

Can. 670 singles out the case of a religious cleric in higher orders — those in minor orders, dealt with in can. 669, § 2, lose their clerical rank — who has committed one of the offences mentioned in can. 646, or a crime which is punishable by infamy, whether inflicted by law, or ipso facto (see Book V).[3] Another class of crimes is that which the law expressly punishes with degradation [4] or deposition.[5] Notice that infamy by law here mentioned is infamy branded as such by ecclesiastical, not

1 This concerns members of the Society of Jesus with simple vows: Greg. XIII, "Ascendente Domino," § 7.

2 Piatus M., I, p. 223.

3 Can. 2320, 2343, § 1, n. 2; § 2, n. 2; 2351, § 2; 2356; 2357, § 1.

4 Can. 2314, § 1, n. 3; 2343, § 1, n. 3; 2354, § 2; 2368, § 1; 2388, § 1.

5 Can. 2314, § 1, n. 2; 2320, § 2; 2353, § 2; 2379; 2394 n. 2; 2401.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

civil, law. Some crimes, such as larceny, forgery, perjury, are also declared infamous crimes by our civil laws.[6] On the other hand, the differing views as to the solubility of marriage may cause a difference of procedure between Church and State, although the latter looks upon polygamy as infamous at least by statutory law.

STATUS OF DISMISSED RELIGIOUS

CAN. 671

Si vero dimittatur ob delicta minora iis de quibus in can. 670:

1.° Ipso facto suspensus manet, donec a Sancta Sede absolutionem obtinuerit;

2.° Sacra Congregatio, si id expedire iudicaverit, dimisso praecipiat ut, habitu cleri saecularis indutus, commoretur in certa dioecesi, indicatis Ordinario causis ob quas dimissus fuit;

3.° Si dimissus praecepto de quo n. 2 non paruerit, religio ad nihil tenetur, et dimissus eo ipso privatus est iure deferendi habitum ecclesiasticum;

4.° Ordinarius dioecesis pro eius commoratione designatae, religiosum in domum poenitentiae mittat, cel eum committat curae et vigilantiae pii ac prudentis sacerdotis; et si religiosus non paruerit, servetur praescriptum n. 3;

5.° Religio, per manus Ordinarii loci commorationis, caritativum subsidium dimisso suppeditet pro necessariis ad vitae sustentationem, nisi ipse aliunde sibimet providere valeat;

6.° Si dimissus vitae rationem ecclesiastico viro dignam non agat, transacto anno aut etiam prius, iudicio Ordinarii, privetur caritativo subsidio, eiiciatur e

6 Bishop, Criminal Law, 1877, I, § 974; § 502.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

domo poenitentiae eique auferatur ius deferendi habitum ecclesiasticum ab ipso Ordinario, qui statim mittere curet opportunam relationem tum ad Sedem Apostolicam tum ad religonem;

7.° Si vero dimissus praedicto tempore tam laudabiliter se gesserit ut merito haberi possit vere emendatus, Ordinarius eius preces apud Sanctam Sedem commendabit pro absolutione a censura suspensionis, et, ea obtenta, eidem in sua dioecesi permittat, adhibitis opportunis cautelis et limitationibus, Missae celebrationem et etiam, pro suo arbitrio et prudentia, aliud sacrum ministerium, unde honeste vivere queat; quo in casu religio caritativum subsidium intermittere potest. Quod si agatur de diacono aut subdiacono, res ad Sanctam Sedem deferatur.

The legislator now determines the status of one who, having pronounced perpetual vows, is dismissed on account of a lesser offence, i. e., one not mentioned in can. 646, nor entailing infamy, degradation, or deposition. Such a religious (1) remains suspended until he has obtained absolution from the Holy See. This absolution must be asked from the S. Congregation of Religious, as the following number insinuates. (2) The S. Congregation may command the religious to stay in a certain diocese and indicate to the Ordinary of the same the reasons for which the religious was dismissed. (3) If the dismissed does not abide by the injunction just named, the institute is under no further obligation towards him, and the culprit is deprived of the right of wearing the ecclesiastical garb. Formerly it was believed that a religious properly dismissed could claim no support from his former institute. The Code humanely provides that, as long as he abides by the injunction of the S. Congregation, he is entitled to the necessary means of subsistence from his institute, as is evident from n. 5. (4) The Ordinary in whose diocese the dismissed dwells for the time being, shall either send him to a house of penance or entrust him to the care and supervision of a pious and prudent priest; if the religious does not heed the Ordinary's command, the rule under n. 3 takes effect. (5) The institute shall grant, through the Ordinary in whose diocese the dismissed religious lives, the necessary livelihood, unless he possesses other means of subsistence. Therefore a religious with simple vows, who retains the right to own property and is blessed with earthly goods, must provide for himself. Besides, it is evident that, in case one is admitted to the sacred ministry, he does not need this charitable subsidy from the religious institute (n. 7). The intention of the legislator is evidently to keep dismissed religious from engaging in a sordid occupation or begging. (6) If the dismissed religious leads a life not conformable to the ecclesiastical state, the Ordinary shall, after one year, or even sooner if he deems it opportune, deprive him of the charitable support granted by his former institute, remove him from the house of penance, and deprive him of the right of wearing the ecclesiastical garb. He should report the case immediately to the Holy See and also inform the religious institute. (7) If, however, the conduct of the expelled religious has been praiseworthy for a whole year, so that he may be considered as having amended his life, the Ordinary may petition to have him absolved from suspension, and, if absolution has been obtained, permit him to say Mass under certain precautions and restrictions, e. g., on certain days only, and in private oratories, in the presence of trustworthy persons, etc. He may then also be admitted to other functions of the sacred ministry, in order to gain a livelihood, and in that case the charitable subsidy[7] from the religious institute may cease. As to deacons or subdeacons, the matter must be referred to the Holy See.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

OBLIGATIONS OF DISMISSED RELIGIOUS

CAN. 672

§ 1. Dimissus, votis in religione emissis non solutus, tenetur ad claustra redire; et si argumenta plenae emendationis per triennium dederit, religio tenetur eum recipere; quod si graves obstent rationes sive ex parte religionis sive ex parte religiosi, res iudicio Sedis Apostolicae subiiciatur.

§ 2. Quoties vero vota in religione emissa cessaverint, si dimissus episcopum benevolum receptorem invenerit, sub eius iurisdictione et speciali vigilantia maneat, servato praescripto can. 642; secus res ad Sanctam Sedem deferatur.

The dismissed religious is not free from the obligations of his vows (whether the three substantial or special vows),[8] and as these obligations cannot be fully complied with in the world, he is bound to return to the monastery. The latter, on the other hand, on account of the existence of a bilateral contract, is obliged to receive him back if he gives signs of complete emendation. Should serious reasons, either on the part of the institute or of the expelled member, militate against his being received back, the matter may be submitted to the decision of the Holy See. Such reasons according to canonists would 7 Note that the text always speaks of a "charitable subsidy," from which we may conclude that there is no question of a strict right enforcible by civil authority.

8 Such a special vow is that of the Jesuits to go on missions and that of the Minimi to observe perpetual abstinence.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be: scandal to innocent souls, grave detriment to the good standing of the institute resulting from a grievous crime committed by the religious after his dismissal, or an immoral life led by him and witnessed by trustworthy persons, or an incurable contagious disease.[9]

If the vows have ceased to be effective, through a dispensation granted by the Holy See or by virtue of the constitutions, as is the case with the simple vows of the Jesuits, the dismissed religious may apply to a bishop to be received into his diocese. If he is received, he must live under the jurisdiction and special supervision of the Ordinary, without prejudice to the restrictions of can. 642; otherwise the matter must be referred to the S. Congregation of Religious.

9 Piatus M., I, p. 224.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVII

SOCIETIES OF MEN OR WOMEN LIVING IN A COMMUNITY WITHOUT VOWS

DIFFERENT KINDS OF COMMUNITIES

CAN. 673

§ 1. Societas sive virorum sive mulierum, in qua sodales vivendi rationem religiosorum imitantur in communi degentes sub regimine Superiorum secundum probatas constitutiones, sed tribus consuetis votis publicis non obstringuntur, non est proprie religio, nec eius sodales nomine religiosorum proprie designantur.

§ 2. Huiusmodi societas est clericalis vel laicalis, iuris pontificii vel dioecesani ad normam can. 488, nn. 3, 4.

Every society, whether of men or women, whose members imitate the manner of life of religious by living in community under the government of superiors according to approved constitutions, but without being bound by the usual three vows, is not properly a religious institute, nor are its members properly called religious. Such a society is clerical or lay and must be acknowledged either by the Holy See or by the Ordinary, and therefore be either a papal or a diocesan foundation. The most prominent societies of this class are the Lazarists or

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Missionaries of St. Vincent de Paul, the Oratorians of St. Philip Neri, and the Fathers of the Precious Blood.[1]

ESTABLISHMENT AND SUPPRESSION

CAN. 674

Circa erectionem et suppressionem societatis eiusque provinciarum vel domorum, eadem valent quae de Congregationibus religiosis constituta sunt.

As to the erection and suppression of such an approved society and its provinces or houses, the same laws apply as are laid down for religious congregations.

GOVERNMENT

CAN. 675

Regimen determinatur in uniuscuiusque societatis constitutionibus; sed in omnibus serventur, congrua congruis referendo, can. 499–530.

The government of every such society is determined by its constitutions, but, preserving due proportions, canons 499–530 must be observed by all. The general rule is that they are subject to the Ordinary in whatever pertains to the care of souls, whereas in the administration of their own property, in the internal government of their institutes, choice of confessors and chaplains the societies of men at least enjoy independence. However, the following canon must also be considered.

1 Their institute was recognized and the Constitutions were approved by the S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 17, 1841. The constitutions contain the "general rule" and a special American observance. They, too, must now accommodate themselves, not to the "Auctis Admodum," but to the new Code.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ADMINISTRATION OF PROPERTY

CAN. 676

§ 1. Societas eiusque provinciae et domus capaces sunt acquirendi et possidendi bona temporalia.

§ 2. Administratio bonorum regitur praescripto can. 532–537.

§ 3. Quidquid sodalibus obvenit intuitu societatis, eidem acquiritur; cetera bona sodales secundum constitutiones retinent, acquirunt et administrant.

Every society, and its provinces and houses, are capable of acquiring and possessing property. The administration of the property is regulated by canons 532–537. Whatever property the members acquire with a view to the society belongs to it; as to other property, the members retain, acquire, and administer it according to the constitutions.

ADMISSION

CAN. 677

In admittendis candidatis serventur constitutiones, salvo praescripto can. 542.

For the admission of candidates the constitutions are to be observed, without prejudice to the prescriptions of can. 542.

STUDIES

CAN. 678

In iis quae ad studiorum rationem et ad suscipiendos ordines pertinent, sodales iisdem legibus tenentur ac saeculares clerici, salvis pecularibus praescriptionibus a Sancta Sede datis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In matters pertaining to studies and the reception of orders, the members are governed by the same laws as secular clerics, without prejudice to the particular prescriptions given by the Holy See. Cfr. can. 1365 ff., 995 ff.

DUTIES

CAN. 679

§ 1. Sodales societatis, praeter obligationes quibus, uti sodales, obnoxii sunt secundum constitutiones, tenentur communibus clericorum obligationibus, nisi ex natura rei vel ex sermonis contextu aliud constet, pariterque stare debent praescriptis can. 595–612, nisi constitutiones aliud ferant.

§ 2. Clausuram servent ad normam constitutionum sub Ordinarii loci vigilantia.

The members of a society, besides the obligations to which the constitutions bind them as members, are bound by the common obligation of clerics, except it appears otherwise from the nature of the case or from the context. They shall observe the law of enclosure (set forth in can. 595–612) according to the terms of their constitutions, under the supervision of the local Ordinary.

PRIVILEGES

CAN. 680

Iidem, etiam laici, gaudent clericorum privilegiis, de quibus in can. 119–123, aliisque societati directe concessis, non autem privilegiis religiosorum sine speciali indulto.

The members, even lay members, of such societies, enjoy the privileges of clerics enumerated in can. 119–

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

123, and other privileges accorded directly to the society, but not the privileges of religious, without a special indult.

LEAVING A SOCIETY

CAN. 681

Praeter proprias cuiusque societatis constitutiones, circa transitum ad aliam societatem vel ad aliquam religionem aut circa sodalium exitum a societate etiam iuris pontificii, serventur, congrua congruis referendo, praescripta can. 632–635, 645; circa eorum dimissionem, praescripta can. 646–672.

Besides the constitutions proper to each society concerning the passing to another society or to some institute, or the departure of members from a society, even though it be approved by the Holy See, the prescriptions of can. 632–635 and 645 are to be observed, due proportion being maintained; and as to their dismissal, the prescriptions of canons 646–672 are to be followed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART III

THE LAITY

After determining the distinction between clergy and laity, and establishing the hierarchic order in its general and special functions and degrees, the Code lays down rules for a state which in its essence is neither hierarchic nor clerical, yet partakes more of the clerical than of the lay state. This is the large body of religious of whom this volume has so far treated. Now the legislator turns to a still larger class of members, who form the great bulk of the Church established by Christ, viz., the laity, more especially as united or organized into confraternities and pious unions. This at first sight seems like slurring the lay state as such, but the slur is only apparent, for the entire third book is devoted to the reception of the Sacraments, the feasts and fasts, ecclesiastical teaching and other matters preëminently intended for the laity.

CAN. 682

Laici ius habent recipiendi a clero, ad normam ecclesiasticae disciplinae, spiritualia bona et potissimum adiumenta ad salutem necessaria.

As far as ecclesiastical discipline permits, laymen are entitled to receive from the clergy spiritual benefits, especially the means necessary for salvation. The reason for this general principle lies partly in the fact that laymen

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

belong to the Church and must therefore be sanctified, taught, and governed, partly in the fact that the Sacraments are instituted for the salvation of men, and lastly that the clergy is the custodian and dispenser of the treasures of grace. The phrase, "ad normam ecclesiasticae disciplinae" means that although all Catholics are entitled to the spiritual benefits, yet certain rules must be observed in the reception and distribution of them. Thus only actual and faithful members are in a condition to receive the spiritual bounties offered by the Church, whereas unworthy and disloyal members are debarred from certain benefits either for a time, or until they have complied with the conditions imposed. From this point of view it will be readily understood that the Sacraments especially may be given only to such members as are neither excommunicated nor unworthy to receive them. Besides, it is a general principle that those who have not been in actual communion with the Church during life shall not be in communion with her after death.[1] This reasonable rule debars certain unfaithful members from Christian burial, as will be seen in Bk. III, Title XII. Lastly, it must be remembered that the right to receive spiritual favors entails the duty to honor and support those by whom these favors are dispensed. This duty not only implies proper material support, but assistance in the administration of church property, as far as the sacred canons permit laymen to share therein as trustees, administrators, tutors, etc. Benedict XIV enjoins especially missionaries and pastors generally to provide for the spiritual welfare of the sick and poor, and to visit them in their distress and need without distinction of person or sex.[2] This precept needs no emphasizing,

1 C. 1, C. 24, q. 2; c. 12, X, III, 28.

2 "Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744, § 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google since it is but a practical application of Christ's teaching.[3] Above all, the means necessary for salvation must be supplied to all. These are primarily the so-called Sacraments of the dead (Baptism and Confession) and secondarily the other Sacraments as far as they are intended for all. For two of them, Holy Orders and Matrimony, are intended merely for society as such, but not for each individual member. So much about spiritual benefits, omitting the sacramentals, which are not necessary for salvation. Since there is an essential hierarchic difference between laity and clergy, it is but meet that this distinction should also appear outwardly. Hence the following canon:

CAN. 683

Non licet laicis habitum clericalem deferre, nisi agatur vel de Seminaricrum alumnis aliisque adspirantibus ad ordines de quibus in can. 972, § 2, vel de laicis, servitio ecclesiae legitime addictis, dum intra eandem ecclesiam sunt aut extra ipsam in aliquo ministerio ecclesiastico partem habent.

With the exception of seminarists and others aspiring to holy orders (even if they do not live in a theological seminary; can. 972), laymen are not allowed to wear the clerical garb, unless they are legitimately engaged in the service of the Church, in which case they may wear the ecclesiastical garb in church and also outside of it, when taking part in ecclesiastical functions. The clerical garb consists of the cassock and the so-called Roman collar. In Rome and in Italy generally, as elsewhere, the students of petits seminaires usually wear a cossack. This practice the Code permits. It also allows sextons or sacristans, singers, beadles (sometimes called [3] Matt. 9, 12 f.; 28, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"Schweizers"), or ushers to wear their distinctive insignia in church as well as outside of it when they take part in ecclesiastical functions, for instance, processions, dedications, and perhaps also in schools if the function has an ecclesiastical character. Outside these places and ceremonies lay people are not allowed to wear the ecclesiastical garb. There is not much danger of transgression in this country. However, we sometimes hear of bogus priests and even prelates, and hence the warning is opportune even here. The prohibition is based upon the privilegium canonis and on that of ecclesiastical immunity formerly accorded to the clergy, when scoundrels like the roaming deacons (diaconi selvaggi) often abused the clerical dress.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XVIII

ASSOCIATIONS OF THE FAITHFUL IN GENERAL

We live in an age of organizations, though it would be wrong to imagine that societies were unknown to former ages. On the contrary, even the Middle Ages had their guilds and confraternities, some of which have left traces of their noble deeds. "Nobles, priests, religious, clerks, sons of the soil who labored at various manual works lived then so to say in common, and they are found continually together in all their daily occupations," says Cardinal Gasquet,[1] and quotes a sentence from Toulmin Smith to the effect that guilds are older than kings in England.[2] Fraternities are as old as the Church. The first Christians, according to the Acts of the Apostles, held everything in common and prayed in common.[3] The collegium tenuiorum and the corporation of the fossores or grave diggers are well known. We may safely say that the Church has always fostered pious unions and confraternities, as long as they kept within proper limits and acknowledged ecclesiastical authority.

The lack of spiritual guidance or of acknowledgment of ecclesiastical authority has caused no little disturbance in the camps of the Christian Socialists, as the unions or federations of workingmen in Germany have

1 Card. Gasquet, The Eve of the Reformation, 1901, p. 309 (Ch. XI).

2 Id., Parish Life in Mediaeval England, 1906, p. 253; cfr. also Translations and Reprints from the Original Sources of European History, University of Pa., 1902, Vol. II, No. 1, p. 11 ff.

3 Acts 2, 44 ff.; 4, 32 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proved.[4] The democratic-idealistic movement in France, known by the name of Sillon, also seemed to endanger the progress of true democracy and Catholicity and was therefore disowned by Pius X.[5] Besides social or charitable unions, the Church recommends especially confraternities for young people based on supernatural principles,[6] i. e., the teachings of the Gospel. Two rules should always be observed by laymen in founding pious societies: a specific good work to be undertaken and respect for ecclesiastical authority. If these two essentials are properly safeguarded, the Church will favor a society, whereas if they are not, she will disapprove or merely tolerate.

How much influence may be permitted to laymen in ecclesiastical affairs is a difficult and delicate question, the solution of which depends on the kind of work in hand as well as on individual prudence and zeal. What may be becoming, or even necessary, in one country may be inadvisable in another, where circumstances are different.

Can. 684

Fideles laude digni sunt, si sua dent nomina associationibus ab Ecclesia erectis vel saltem commendatis; caveant autem ab associationibus secretis, damnatis, seditiosis, suspectis aut quae studeant sese a legitima Ecclesiae vigilantia subducere.

The faithful who enrol in societies organized, or at least recommended, by the Church are worthy of praise; but they should beware of entering secret, condemned, seditious or suspect societies, or such as strive to withdraw themselves from the vigilance of the Church.

4 Ep. Pii X ad Card. Fischer (A. Ap. S., III, 18 f.) etc.

5 Aug. 25, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 607 ff.).

6 Letter of Card. Merry del Val to Mons. Bougonier, Nov. 19, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 714 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There are societies for every need in the Catholic Church, but not all are organized by her,— in fact very few. Most were established privately and their constitutions had first to be examined and their work tested. As soon as a society is approved by the Church, the latter may be truly said to have given it her sanction and authority. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the Association for Christian Doctrine, the Peter Claver Sodality, and many others may be said to have been organized by the Church. Recommendation in a lesser degree involves a judgment — though not an infallible one — as to a society's soundness. Many such recommendations may be read in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, especially under Pius X, who fully realized the usefulness of Catholic associations.

On the other hand there are societies which the Church disapproves. Five different kinds of them are mentioned in our canon, although we would not assert that the lines are sharply drawn. By secret societies are meant principally the Freemasons. All their societies or lodges are forbidden, but not all are condemned in the same degree. For condemnation means prohibition or proscription enforced by penal sanction, and is generally made by name. Many ecclesiastical documents, especially the constitutions of Clement XII, "In eminenti," April 28, 1738, and of Benedict XIV, "Providas," March 18, 1731, give the reasons why Freemasons are condemned. These reasons are: because they espouse the principle of indifferentism in religion, envelop themselves in secrecy confirmed by terrible oaths, show repugnance and disobedience not only to ecclesiastical, but also to civil law, and, lastly, because they are shunned and abhorred by good and prudent men. It may be true, as often stated, that the lower degrees are not aware of the real tendencies of the craft as manifested in the higher degrees. But this fact does not lessen the danger. It is safe to say that all secret societies are forbidden; some of them are also condemned for reasons which the student of Freemasonry will easily perceive.[7] Condemned are societies which aim at the ruin of Church or State, whether their oath be secret or not (S. O., Aug. 5, 1846). Some (the Independent Order of Good Templars, the Odd Fellows, the Sons of Temperance, and the Knights of Pythias) have been nominally forbidden,[8] though the Holy Office would not precisely state whether the members incur censure. To enter such a lodge would be a grievous sin, especially since our Code declares that those who enrol in a Masonic sect are excommunicated.[9] Members who would sustain a great loss if they left one of these societies, on account of insurance, may obtain permission to remain in the lodge, provided they entered it bona fide, abstain from participation in any ritualistic ceremony, give no scandal, and suffer no spiritual loss.[10]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Seditious, though not secret societies are the radical Socialists, Communists, Nihilists, and Anarchists, who aim at overthrowing all authority, and subverting the family and property rights.[11]

Questionable are all those societies whose moral and religious principles give rise to doubts as to their sound-

7 Cfr. Arthur Preuss, A Study in American Freemasonry (Based upon American Masonic Standard Works), 3rd edition, St. Louis, Mo., 1914.

8 S. O., Aug. 9, 1893; Aug. 20, 1894; Jan., 1896. S. O., May 10, 1884 (Coll. P. F., n. 1615); Aug. 1, 1855 (Coll. cit., n. 1116) S. C. P. F., Sept. 24, 1867 (Coll. cit., n. 1320).

9 Can. 2335.

10 Putzer, Comment. in Facult. Apost., ed. 4, 1897, p. 235 f.

11 Leo XIII, "Quod apostolici muneris," Dec. 28, 1878. Seditious are also certain societies formed for political purposes, though they may bear a literary title.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ness. Such a one was the Sillon in France; such are the societies which seek to withdraw themselves from the authority of the Church, no matter how well-meaning they may be. Interconfessional associations are almost compelled to shirk the restraints imposed by ecclesiastical authority.

OBJECTS OF CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS

CAN. 685

Associationes distinctae a religionibus vel societatibus de quibus in can. 487–681, ab Ecclesia constitui possunt vel ad perfectiorem vitam christianam inter socios promovendam, vel ad aliqua pietatis aut caritatis opera exercenda, vel denique ad incrementum publici cultus.

After drawing the line between forbidden and recommended societies, the Code explains for what ends or purposes Catholic societies may be established. Apart from religious institutes and societies dealt with in can. 487–681, the Church permits the establishment of societies for a threefold purpose:

(a) To assist the members to promote a more perfect Christian life (e. g., Tertiaries, etc.);

(b) To encourage works of piety or charity (e. g., confraternities);

(c) To promote public worship (e. g., Eucharistic societies, societies for ecclesiastical music and song, altar societies, societies of acolytes and sextons, etc.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

AUTHORITY FOR ESTABLISHING SOCIETIES

CAN. 686

§ 1. Nulla in Ecclesia recognoscitur associatio quae a legitima auctoritate ecclesiastica erecta vel saltem approbata non fuerit.

§ 2. Associationes erigere vel approbare pertinet, praeter Romanum Pontificem, ad loci Ordinarium, exceptis illis quarum instituendarum ius, apostolico ex privilegio, aliis reservatum est.

§ 3. Licet privilegium concessum probetur, semper tamen, nisi aliud in ipso privilegio cautum sit, requiritur ad validitatem erectionis consensus Ordinarii loci scripto datus; consensus tamen ab Ordinario praestitus pro erectione domus religiosae valet etiam pro erigenda in eadem domo vel ecclesia ei adnexa associatione, quae non sit constituta ad modum organici corporis et illius religionis sit propria.

§ 4. Vicarius Generalis ex solo mandato generali, et Vicarius Capitularis nequeunt associationes erigere aut consensum praebere pro earum erectione aut aggregatione.

§ 5. Erectionis litterae ab iis qui ex privilegio apostolico associationem erigunt, gratis concedantur, sola excepta taxa pro expensis necessariis.

§ 1. The Church gives her recognition to no society which has not been organized, or at least approved of, by the legitimate ecclesiastical authority.

§ 2. To erect or approve societies belongs, aside from the Roman Pontiff, to the Ordinary of the diocese, with the exception of those whose institution is by Apostolic concession reserved to others.

§ 3. Even in case a concession has been granted, the written consent of the Ordinary is required for the valid foundation of a society, unless the contrary is explicitly stated in the concession. The permission of the Ordinary to erect a religious house includes permission to establish in this house or the adjacent church any society that may be customary with the religious institute in question, even though it may not form part and parcel of the institute itself.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. In virtue of their usual powers, neither a vicar general nor a vicar capitular enjoys the right of establishing any society or of granting the required consent to one already established.

§ 5. With the exception of a nominal fee to cover the necessary expenses, letters of foundation are to be granted gratis.

ECCLESIASTICAL SANCTION

CAN. 687

Ad normam can. 100, tunc tantum fidelium associationes iuridicam in Ecclesia personam acquirunt, cum a legitimo Superiore ecclesiastico formale obtinuerunt erectionis decretum.

In accordance with can. 100, associations of the faithful acquire official recognition as juridical persons only when they have obtained a formal decree of establishment from the competent ecclesiastical superior. This decree is issued in the form of a simple rescript. The time from which the recognition is to be dated, is the date of execution, if an executor is chosen; or let us rather say, the date on which the decree reaches those who asked for it. Before that time members cannot validly be enrolled. Note that the question here is of ecclesiastical acknowledgment only; civil recognition depends entirely on the secular authorities.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE TO BE CHOSEN

CAN. 688

Associatio titulum seu nomen ne assumat quod levitatem aut absonam novitatem sapiat, vel speciem devotionis a Sede Apostolica non probatam exprimat.

No society is permitted to choose for itself any name that savors of levity or novelty, or is connected with any devotion discountenanced by the Holy See.

STATUTES

CAN. 689

§ 1. Quaelibet associatio sua statuta habeat, a Sede Apostolica vel ab Ordinario loci examinata et approbata.

§ 2. Statuta quae non sint confirmata a Sede Apostolica, moderationi et correctioni Ordinarii loci semper subiecta manent.

§ 1. Every society shall have its own statutes, which are to be examined and approved by the Apostolic See or by the Ordinary of the diocese.

§ 2. Statutes which have not been approved by the Apostolic See always remain subject to modification and correction by the diocesan Ordinary.

AUTHORITY OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 690

§ 1. Omnes associationes, etiam ab Apostolica Sede erectae, nisi speciale obstet privilegium, iurisdictioni subsunt et vigilantiae Ordinarii loci, qui ad normas sacrorum canonum eas invisendi ius habet et munus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Associationes tamen, quae vi privilegii apotolici a religiosis exemptis in suis ecclesiis institutae sunt, Ordinariis locorum fas non est visitare quod attinet ad ea quae internam disciplinam seu spiritualem associationis directionem spectant.

§ 1. All societies, even those erected by the Apostolic See, unless they enjoy a special privilege to the contrary, are subject to the authority of the Ordinary, who has the right and duty to watch over them according to the prescriptions of the sacred canons.

§ 2. It is not permissible, however, for diocesan Ordinaries to meddle in the internal discipline or spiritual direction of societies which exempt religious institutes have erected in their churches by virtue of an apostolic privilege.

TEMPORALITIES

CAN. 691

§ 1. Associatio legitime erecta, nisi aliud expresse cautum sit, bona temporalia possidere et administrare potest sub auctoritate Ordinarii loci, cui rationem administrationis saltem quotannis reddere debet, ad normam can. 1525, minime vero parochi, licet in eius territorio erecta sit, nisi aliud Ordinarius ipse statuerit.

§ 2. Potest, ad normam statutorum, oblationes recipere, et receptas erogare ad pios ipsius associationis usus, salva semper offerentium voluntate.

§ 3. Nulli associationi eleemosynas colligere licet, nisi id aut statuta permittant, aut necessitas postulet, et loci Ordinarii consensus accedat ac servetur forma ab eodem praescripta.

§ 4. Ad eleemosynas extra territorium colligendas uniuscuiusque Ordinarii venia, scripto data, requiritur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 5. Oblationum quoque ac eleemosynarum fidelis erogationis rationem associatio reddat Ordinario loci.

§ 1. A society legitimately established may possess and administer temporalities under the direction of the local Ordinary, unless the contrary is expressly stated in the letters of approbation. It must render an account of its property at least annually to the Ordinary, conformably to the prescriptions of can. 1525, but it is not in this regard subject to the parish priest in whose territory it exists, unless the Ordinary legislates otherwise.

§ 2. Such a society may accept donations according to the tenor of its statutes, and use them for any good purpose, with due regard, of course, paid to the will of the donors.

§ 3. No society is allowed to seek alms unless either its statutes permit or necessity demands, and then only with the consent of the Ordinary and in the way prescribed by him.

§ 4. For soliciting alms elsewhere than within their own territory, the written permission of the respective Ordinary is required.

§ 5. The society must render an account to the local Ordinary of the alms and other offerings received.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS

CAN. 692

Ad fruendum associationis iuribus, privilegiis, indulgentiis, aliisque gratiis spiritualibus, necesse est et sufficit ut quis in eam valide receptus sit, secundum propria associationis statuta et ab ea legitime non expulsus.

To enjoy the rights, privileges, indulgences, and other spiritual favors accruing to a society, it is required and

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google sufficient for one to be validly received into the same, according to the statutes, and not expelled from it.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP

CAN. 693

§ 1. Acatholici et damnatae sectae adscripti aut censura notorie irretiti et in genere publici peccatores valide recipi nequeunt.

§ 2. Eadem persona potest adscribi pluribus associationibus, salvo praescripto can. 705.

§ 3. Absentes ne adscribantur associationibus ad modum organici corporis constitutis; praesentes autem, nonnisi scientes ac volentes adscribi possunt.

§ 4. Salvo praescripto can. 704, religiosi possunt piis associationibus nomen dare, exceptis iis quarum leges, Superiorum iudicio, cum observantia regulae et constitutionum conciliari nequeant.

§ 1. Non-Catholics and members of a condemned sect, those laboring under notorious censure, i. e., one they cannot hide by any artifice, and, in general, public sinners, cannot be validly received.

§ 2. Without prejudice to can. 705, one and the same person may be enrolled in several societies. The exception regards Tertiaries of religious orders, who may not belong to several orders without a special indult; thus, for instance, an oblate of St. Benedict may not at the same time be a Franciscan tertiary.

§ 3. Absent persons may not be enrolled as full-fledged members of a society; those who are present may be received only with their knowledge and consent.

§ 4. Without prejudice to can. 704, religious may join pious associations, except those whose laws, in the judgment of the superior, cannot be reconciled with the rule and constitutions. Can. 704 forbids professed religious to become tertiaries of any order.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

FORM OF RECEPTION

CAN. 694

§ 1. Receptio fiat ad normam iuris ac statutorum uniuscuiusque associationis.

§ 2. Ut autem de receptione constet, inscriptio in albo associationis fieri omnino debet; imo haec inscriptio, si associatio in personam moralem erecta fuerit, est ad validitatem necessaria.

§ 1. Reception into any society must be effected according to the laws and statutes of the same.

§ 2. To insure certainty in the matter of reception, the name of each member must be inscribed on the roster of the society; if the society enjoys the status of a persona moralis, registration is necessary for validity.

NO SPECIAL RECOMPENSE

CAN. 695

Occasione receptionis in associationem nihil directe vel indirecte exigatur, praeter id quod in statutis legitime approbatis designatum sit, aut ab Ordinario loci, ratione specialium circumstantiarum, expresse permissum in associationis favorem.

On the occasion of reception into a society no fee may be exacted beyond that determined in the lawfully approved statutes, or what the Ordinary of the diocese, by reason of special circumstances, has expressly permitted in favor of the society.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

DISMISSAL

CAN. 696

§ 1. Nemo, legitime adscriptus, ab associatione dimittatur, nisi iusta de causa ad normam statutorum.

§ 2. Qui in casum inciderint, de quo in can. 693, § 1, expungantur, praemissa monitione, servatis propriis statutis et salvo iure recursus ad Ordinarium.

§ 3. Etiamsi in statutis nihil expresse caveatur, etiam loci Ordinarius quod ad omnes associationes, et Superior religiosus quod ad associationes ex apostolico indulto a religiosis erectas attinet, possunt socios dimittere.

§ 1. No one who has been lawfully enrolled in a society, may be dismissed from the same, except for a just cause, according to the statutes.

§ 2. Whoever falls under can. 693, § 1, may be expelled after due warning, with due regard to the respective statutes and without prejudice to the right of appeal to the Ordinary.

§ 3. Even though nothing be expressly stated in the statutes, the Ordinary of the diocese may dismiss any member of any society. The religious superior enjoys the same right in respect to societies erected by his subjects in virtue of an Apostolic indult.

MEETINGS AND OFFICERS

CAN. 697

§ 1. Associationes legitime erectae ius habent, ad normam statutorum et sacrorum canonum, celebrandi comitia, edendi peculiares normas quae ipsum sodali-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tium respiciant, eligendi administratores bonorum, officiales et ministros, firmo praescripto can. 715.

§ 2. In iis quae convocationem ad comitia et electiones respiciunt, serventur ius commune, quod prostat in can. 161–182 et statuta iuri communi non contraria.

§ 1. Societies legitimately established enjoy the right, according to the rules laid down in their statutes and in the sacred canons, of convoking meetings, promulgating special by-laws pertaining to their society, electing administrators for their property, and other officials necessary for the well-being of the society. Can. 715 must not be overlooked in this connection.

§ 2. In all meetings and elections the common law, as outlined in can. 161–182, must be observed, as well as the statutes not opposed to the common law.

MODERATOR AND CHAPLAIN

CAN. 698

§ 1. Nisi privilegium apostolicum aliud expresse caveat, nominatio moderatoris et cappellani pertinet ad loci Ordinarium in associationibus ab ipso vel ab Apostolica Sede erectis aut approbatis, et in associationibus a religiosis vi apostolici privilegii erectis extra proprias ecclesias; in associationibus vero erectis a religiosis in propriis ecclesiis requiritur tantum Ordinarii loci consensus, si a Superiore moderator et cappellanus e clero saeculari eligantur.

§ 2. Moderator et cappellanus possunt, durante munere, benedicere associationis habitum seu insignia, scapularia, etc., eaque adscribendis imponere; quod vero ad conciones attinet, serventur praescripta can. 1337–1342.

§ 3. Moderatorem et cappellanum revocare ex iusta

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

causa possunt qui illos nominaverunt eorumque successores vel Superiores.

§ 4. Idem potest esse moderator et cappellanus.

§ 1. Unless an apostolic privilege provides otherwise, the appointment of a moderator and chaplain belongs to the Ordinary in societies established or approved either by himself or by the Apostolic See and in societies erected by religious outside their own churches by virtue of an Apostolic privilege; but in societies established by religious in their own churches, the consent of the Ordinary only is required in case the moderator and the chaplain are appointed by the religious Superior from among the secular clergy.

§ 2. During their term of office, the moderator and the chaplain are empowered to bless the habit or insignia, scapulars, etc., of the society and to invest candidates with them; regarding sermons, canons 1337–1342 are to be observed.

§ 3. Those who possess the power of nominating moderators and chaplains, as also their successors or Superiors, can revoke the nomination for a just cause.

§ 4. One and the same person may act as moderator and chaplain.

SUPPRESSION OF SOCIETIES

CAN. 699

§ 1. Ob graves causas et salvo iure recursus ad Apostolicam Sedem, potest loci Ordinarius supprimere non solum associationem a se vel a decessoribus suis erectam, sed etiam associationem ex apostolico indulto a religiosis erectam de consensu Ordinarii loci.

§ 2. Associationes vero ab ipsa Apostolica Sede erectae nonnisi ab eadem supprimi possunt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. For grave reasons, and with due regard to the right of recourse to the Holy See, the local Ordinary may suppress not only a society established by himself or his predecessors, but also a society erected by religious in virtue of an apostolic indult requiring the consent of the Ordinary.

§ 2. Societies erected by the Holy See itself can be suppressed only by the same.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XIX

ASSOCIATIONS OF THE FAITHFUL IN PARTICULAR

DIFFERENT KINDS OF ASSOCIATIONS

CAN. 700

Triplex distinguitur in Ecclesia associationum species: tertii Ordines saeculares, confraternitates, piae uniones.

There are three kinds of associations in the Church: secular tertiaries, confraternities, pious unions.

PRECEDENCE

CAN. 701

§ 1. Inter pias laicorum associationes, ordo praecedentiae est qui sequitur, firmo praescripto can. 106, nn. 5, 6:

1.° Tertii Ordines;

2.° Archiconfraternitates;

3.° Confraternitates;

4.° Piae uniones primariae;

5.° Aliae piae uniones.

§ 2. Confraternitas sanctissimi Sacramenti, si agatur de processione in qua defertur sanctissimum Sacramentum, praecedit ipsis archiconfraternitatibus.

§ 3. Omnes autem tunc solummodo ius praecedentiae habent, cum collegialiter incedunt sub propria cruce vel vexillo et cum habitu seu insignibus associationis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Without prejudice to the regulations laid down in can. 106, nn. 5 and 6, the order of precedence among pious lay associations is the following:

First — Tertiary Orders;

Second — Archconfraternities;

Third — Confraternities;

Fourth — Primary organizations for pious purposes;

Fifth — Other organizations for pious purposes.

§ 2. In processions in which the Blessed Sacrament is carried, the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament enjoys the right of preceding even the Archconfraternities.

§ 3. The right of precedence belongs to these organizations only when they march in a body under their own cross or banner and with the garb or insignia of their society.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

SECULAR TERTIARIES

CAN. 702

§ 1. Tertiarii saeculares sunt qui in saeculo, sub moderatione alicuius Ordinis, secundum eiusdem spiritum, ad christianam perfectionem contendere nituntur, modo saeculari vitae consentaneo, secundum regulas ab Apostolica Sede pro ipsis approbatas.

§ 2. Si tertius saecularis Ordo in plures associationes dividatur, harum quaelibet legitime constituta dicitur sodalitas tertiariorum.

§ 1. Secular Tertiaries are those who live in the world under the direction of an Order, and endeavor to attain Christian perfection according to its spirit, in a manner compatible with secular life. They have a moderator of the same order and rules approved by the Apostolic See.

§ 2. If the secular Tertiaries of any Order are divided into several bodies, each of them is called a sodality of Tertiaries.

The first category of Catholic associations is that of the Tertiaries, a name derived from the organization formed by St. Francis of Assisi, most probably in 1221, near Portiuncula,[1] as an order of penitents. However, though the widespread influence of this particular organization is due to the founder of the Franciscans, similar institutes had been in existence before the XIth century. The Clunians admitted laymen to a share in their

1 Cfr. Cath. Encycl., XIV, 641.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spiritual benefits. In the diocese of Treves, in the well-known abbey of Prüm (erected in the eighth century in honor of our Holy Redeemer), Abbot Stephen (988–1000) "instituted a confraternity in honor of St. Benedict in which many noble men were enrolled."[2] This, perhaps, is one of the first instances where the Oblates of St. Benedict are referred to as a fraternity or sodality. The eleventh century produced the Oblates of St. Benedict, who have been reorganized by Leo XIII.[3] The Order of St. Dominic and the Carmelites (1273) followed this example and admitted seculars among their Tertiaries. But, as we have said, the best known organization of this kind is that of the Tertiaries of St. Francis. Note that, although they are called an Order of Tertiaries, they cannot be properly styled religious. On the other hand these societies of Tertiaries are more than confraternities or sodalities, and the rules of confraternities do not simply apply to them.[4] The division into sodalities of which can. 702, § 2, speaks, is made for the sake of facilitating administration, but each sodality must be affiliated with the Order of Secular Tertiaries or it can have no legal standing in the Church.

POWERS OF SUPERIORS AND OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 703

§ 1. Firmo privilegio nonnullis Ordinibus concesso, nulla religio potest tertium Ordinem sibi adiungere.

§ 2. Dato etiam apostolico privilegio, Superiores religiosi possunt quidem personas particulares tertio Ordini adscribere, sed nequeunt sodalitatem tertiario-

2 Schorn, Eiflia Sacra, 1889, II, p. 351.

3 Cfr. Statutes and Prayers for the Oblates of St. Benedict, Conception, Mo., 1917.

4 Cfr. Beringer, Die Ablässe, 1906 (ed. 13), p. 200 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rum valide erigere sine consensu Ordinarii loci, ad norman can. 686, § 3.

§ 3. Nec sodalitatibus a se erectis possunt concedere usum particularium vestium, in publicis sacris functionibus deferendarum, sine speciali eiusdem Ordinarii licentia.

§ 1. With the exception of such Orders as have been accorded the privilege, no religious institute is allowed to establish a Third Order. Hence only orders of regulars, but no congregations, even though exempt, may establish a third order of their own, and even these orders need a special privilege to that effect.

§ 2. Although religious superiors may enroll particular persons as Tertiaries, they may not validly establish a sodality of Tertiaries, although their order has an apostolic privilege to that effect, without the approval of the diocesan ordinary, according to can. 686, § 3.

§ 3. Neither are they permitted to allow the sodalities which they — the religious superiors — have erected, to wear a special garb at public sacred functions without the special permission of the Ordinary. This special garb must not be confounded with the insignia of the Tertiaries, which consist of a scapular of smaller size and a girdle of hemp or wool, which they may wear at processions without special permission.[5]

RELIGIOUS CANNOT BE TERTIARIES

CAN. 704

§ 1. Qui vota nuncupavit vel in perpetuum vel ad tempus in aliqua religione, nequit simul ad ullum ter-

5 "Veste uniformi induti, vulgo sacco"; S. C. E. et RR., April 6, 1900; Beringer, l. c., p. 800, p. 805 f.; a sacco means a sack or dress covering the whole body, even the face, such as some confraternities wear in Rome at funerals.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tium Ordinem pertinere, etsi eidem antea fuerit adscriptus.

§ 2. Si solutus a votis ad saeculum redierit, antiqua adscriptio reviviscit.

§ 1. Whosoever has pronounced vows, whether perpetual or temporal, in any religious institute cannot simultaneously belong to any Third Order, even though he was once enrolled in such a one.

§ 2. If one is freed from his vows and returns to the world, his former status as Tertiary revives.

Note the term "has pronounced." It means that a novice enjoys the privileges of a Tertiary during his novitiate (S. C. Indulg., Jan. 31, 1893). This canon binds all Tertiaries and the Oblates of St. Benedict (S. C. Indulg., Jan. 15, 1895).

NO ONE MAY BE A TERTIARY IN TWO ORDERS

Can. 705

Nulla tertiariorum sodalitas, sine apostolico indulto, adscribere potest sodales alius tertii Ordinis in eodem remanentes; singulis tamen sodalibus licet iusta de causa transire sive ab alio ad alium tertium Ordinem, sive ab alia ad aliam sodalitatem eiusdem tertii Ordinis.

No sodality of Tertiaries is allowed, without an Apostolic indult, to enroll members of another Third Order; for a just cause, however, it is permissible for Tertiaries to transfer themselves either to a different Third Order, or to a different sodality of the same Third Order.

This rule dates back to Jan. 31, 1893, but has retroactive force, as the S. C. Indulg. declared, June 21, 1893. Therefore, as a rule, no one may belong to two different orders as a Tertiary. Nor is there any necessity for this,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as the purposes of all third Orders are practically about the same.

PROCESSIONS

CAN. 706

Publicis processionibus, funeribus aliisque ecclesiasticis functionibus tertiarii possunt, sed non tenentur, collegialiter interesse; at si intersint, cum suis insignibus sub cruce propria incedant necesse est.

At public processions, funerals, and other ecclesiastical functions Tertiaries may, but are not obliged to, attend in a body. If present in a body, they must march under their own cross and wear their proper insignia.

If the first Order, for instance, of the Franciscans march in procession, their Tertiaries may march under the same cross (S. Rit. C., June 30, 1905).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

CONFRATERNITIES AND PIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

CAN. 707

§ 1. Associationes fidelium quae ad exercitium alicuius operis pietatis aut caritatis erectae sunt, nomine veniunt piarum unionum; quae, si ad modum organici corporis sint constitutae, sodalitia audiunt.

§ 2. Sodalitia vero in incrementum quoque publici cultus erecta, speciali nomine confraternitates appellantur.

§ 1. Associations of the faithful founded to further some work of piety or charity, are known as pious organizations; if they enjoy a quasi-corporate status, they are called brotherhoods (sodalitia).

§ 2. Brotherhoods that have for their object the enhancement of public worship are called confraternities.

Such confraternities may be traced to the fourth century. But the climax of the guild and fraternity movement was witnessed in the XIIIth century, when the Gonfalieri, or banner-bearers, were founded and recommended by the Church.[1] The most renowned confraternities to-day are those of the Holy Rosary and the Scapular.

ESTABLISHMENT

CAN. 708

Confraternitates nonnisi per formale erectionis decretum constitui possunt; pro piis autem unionibus

1 Cfr. Beringer, l. c., p. 514.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

sufficit Ordinarii approbatio, qua obtenta, ipsae, licet morales personae non sint, capaces tamen sunt obtinendi gratias spirituales ac praesertim indulgentias.

Confraternities may be established only by a formal decree of erection; but for pious organizations, the approbation of the Ordinary suffices, though it does not constitute them moral persons, but enables them to gain spiritual favors, especially indulgences. The S. C. of Indulgences (Jan. 8, 1861) issued two formularies, one for confraternities erected by religious superiors, the other for archconfraternities established by an apostolic indult.[2] These formularies are based on the Constitution of Clement VIII, "Quaecumque," Dec. 7, 1604.

SACRED FUNCTIONS

CAN. 709

§ 1. Confratres nequeunt sacris functionibus operam praestare, nisi confraternitatis habitum seu insignia deferant.

§ 2. Mulieres confraternitatibus adscribi tantum possunt ad lucrandas indulgentias et gratias spirituales confratribus concessas.

§ 1. Male members are not allowed to take part officially in any sacred function, unless vested in the garb or insignia of their confraternity.

§ 2. Women can be enrolled in confraternities only to gain indulgences and other spiritual favors granted to the members.

The S. C. of Indulg. wishes that the male members should wear the special garb of the fraternity, but this is not a condition strictly required for gaining the indulgences.[3]

2 Ibid., p. 538 ff.

3 Beringer, l. c., p. 572.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE OF ASSOCIATIONS

CAN. 710

Titulus seu nomen confraternitatis vel piae unionis desumatur vel a Dei attributis, vel a christianae religionis mysteriis, vel a festis Domini et Beatae Virginis Mariae, vel a Sanctis, vel a pio opere ipsius sodalitii.

The title or name of a confraternity or pious organization is to be taken from the attributes of God, or the mysteries of the Christian religion, or the feasts of our Lord and His Blessed Mother, or from the Saints, or from the specific work of piety pursued by the brotherhood.

SEVERAL ASSOCIATIONS

CAN. 711

§ 1. Plures confraternitates vel piae uniones eiusdem tituli ac instituti, nisi id eis specialiter concessum sit aut iure cautum, ne erigantur neve approbentur in eodem loco; si vero agatur de magnis civitatibus, id licet, dummodo inter ipsas intercedat conveniens, iudicio Ordinarii loci, distantia.

§ 2. Curent locorum Ordinarii ut in qualibet paroecia instituantur confraternitates sanctissimi Sacramenti, ac doctrinae christianae; quae, legitime erectae, ipso iure aggregatae sunt eisdem Archiconfraternitatibus in Urbe a Cardinale Urbis Vicario erectis.

§ 1. Unless the contrary be specially conceded or provided for by law, several confraternities or pious organizations bearing the same name, or founded under the same auspices, may not be erected or approved in the same place. In large cities, however, this may be done,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

provided a sufficient distance intervenes between the respective confraternities according to the good judgment of the Ordinary.

§ 2. It is the duty of the diocesan Ordinaries to see to it that the confraternities of the Blessed Sacrament and of Christian Doctrine be established in every parish. Once legitimately erected, these confraternities are ipso iure aggregated to the Archconfraternities of the same name established by the Cardinal Vicar in the city of Rome.

Pius V[4] as well as Benedict XIV,[5] and again Pius X, insisted upon religious instruction to be imparted by laymen well versed in Christian doctrine. The Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament was founded in Rome in 1538, and exceedingly favored by the Pontiffs.[6] Both are warmly recommended to the Ordinaries. Among students, the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin has justly been favored and produced splendid results.[7]

ESTABLISHMENT

CAN. 712

§ 1. Confraternitates vel piae uniones ne erigantur, nisi in ecclesia aut oratorio publico vel saltem semipublico.

§ 2. Ne instituantur, sine Capituli consensu, in ecclesia cathedrali aut collegiali.

§ 3. In ecclesiis vel oratoriis religiosarum Ordinarius loci permittere potest erectionem associationis mulierum tantum, aut piae unionis quae nonnisi precationibus incumbat et gratiarum dumtaxat spiritualium communicatione gaudeat.

4 "Ex debito," Oct. 6, 1571, § 2.
5 "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 7.
6 Beringer, l. c., p. 593.
7 Cfr. Elder Mullan, S. J., The Sodality of Our Lady Studied in the Documents, New York, 1912 (a very thorough work).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Confraternities or pious organizations may be erected only in public or semi-public churches or oratories.

§ 2. They cannot be established in cathedral or collegiate churches without the consent of the chapter.

§ 3. In churches or oratories of religious women, the diocesan Ordinary is allowed to erect associations for women only, or pious organizations, the scope of which is to gain spiritual favors by means of the apostolate of prayer.

Leo XIII, July 7, 1883, granted permission to erect confraternities of the Sacred Heart of Jesus for the conversion of sinners in such oratories, and this privilege is now extended to all societies engaged in the work defined above, not only to the alumnae of female religious institutes, but also to other lay persons of both sexes.[8]

RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 713

§ 1. Religiosi cum confraternitatibus piisve unionibus a se erectis possunt et debent communicare omnes et solas gratias spirituales, quae in facultatibus a Sede Apostolica receptis specifice et nominatim communicabiles declarentur, eaeque in actu erectionis manifestandae sunt singulis, servato praescripto can. 919.

§ 2. Confraternitatibus, ab iisdem erectis, non licet vestem propriam seu insignia, quae in publicis processionibus aliisque sacris functionibus deferenda sunt, assumere sine speciali Ordinarii loci licentia.

8 Beringer, l. c., p. 593; Mullan, l. c. n. 1925; sodalities of the Bl. Virgin for women only may be erected in the chapels of Sisters if the Ordinary permits them, Mullan, l. c., n. 1932; even sodalities or pious organizations of both sexes the Ordinary could permit according to S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 18, 1907, Mullan, l. c., n. 1933.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Religious who have erected Confraternities or organizations for pious purposes, can and should impart to them all and only those spiritual favors that have been explicitly specified as communicable in the faculties received from the Apostolic See. Without prejudice to can. 919, said favors shall be communicated to all sodalities in the act of erection.

§ 2. Without the special permission of the diocesan Ordinary it is not permissible for confraternities to assume a garb or insignia to be worn in public processions or at other sacred functions. The indulgences are not given by the fact of erection, but communicated by the Apostolic See. But as soon as the superiors have obtained the necessary faculties, they must communicate the spiritual favors in detail to their respective confraternities as soon as these are erected. In doing this they must follow the rules imposed by the Apostolic See, otherwise the favors are null and void.[9] As to the dress, it is hardly necessary to add that the sacci or sacks seen in Rome are not worn in our country.

CHANGE OF DRESS

CAN. 714

Confraternitas proprium habitum vel insignia, sine licentia Ordinarii loci, ne dimittat neve immutet.

No Confraternity is allowed to abolish or modify its garb or insignia without the permission of the diocesan Ordinary.

POWER OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 715

§ 1. Comitiis confraternitatum, etsi in regularium

[9] Beringer, l. c., p. 535.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesiis et oratoriis celebrandis, per se vel per delegatum praeesse sine iure tamen suffragii, dignos et idoneos officiales et ministros electos confirmare, indignos vel non idoneos respuere aut removere, statuta aliasve normas, nisi a Sede Apostolica approbatae fuerint, corrigere et approbare, pertinet ad loci Ordinarium.

§ 2. De comitiorum extraordinariorum celebratione confraternitas Ordinarium loci eiusve delegatum tempestive praemoneat; secus Ordinario ius est comitia impediendi vel eorum decreta penitus infirmandi.

§ 1. It pertains to the diocesan Ordinary to preside, either personally or by proxy, at the meetings of confraternities, even those held in the churches and oratories of regulars, to confirm the election of worthy and capable officials, to reject or remove unworthy ones, and to amend and approve statutes and norms that have not the formal sanction of the Holy See. However, the Ordinary has not the right of suffrage at these meetings.

§ 2. Confraternities shall in due time notify the Ordinary or his delegate of any extraordinary meeting; if they fail to do so, the Ordinary may impede such meetings or annul their decrees.

PARISH RIGHTS

Can. 716

§ 1. Confraternitates et piae uniones, in propriis ecclesiis erectae, functiones non paroeciales, servatis servandis, independenter a parocho exercere possunt, dummodo ministerio paroeciali in paroeciali ecclesia non noceant.

§ 2. Idem servetur etiam in casu quo paroecia erecta sit in ipsa confraternitatis ecclesia.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. In dubio utrum functiones confraternitatis vel piae unionis noceant, necne, ministerio paroeciali, ad Ordinarium loci spectat ius decidendi, itemque statuendi practicas normas servandas.

§ 1. Confraternities and pious organizations having their own churches, may exercise non-parochial functions,[10] servatis servandis, independently of the parish priest, provided the parochial ministry does not suffer any injury.

§ 2. The same holds good in cases where the parish as such is erected in the church of a confraternity.

§ 3. In case of doubt whether the functions of a confraternity or pious organization injure the parochial ministry, the diocesan Ordinary is to decide and lay down practical rules for guidance.

CAN. 717

§ 1. Si in ecclesiis non suis erectae sint, proprias functiones ecclesiasticas in sacello tantum vel altari, in quo sunt erectae, peragere possunt ad norman can. 716 et peculiarium statutorum.

§ 2. Patrimonium confraternitatis et piae unionis, quae erecta sit in ecclesia non sua, aut cuius ecclesia sit simul ecclesia paroecialis, debet esse separatum a bonis fabricae vel communitatis.

§ 1. If established in churches not their own, confraternities may perform their proper ecclesiastical functions only in a chapel or at an altar specially designated

10 Parochial functions are only those strictly defined in can. 462; in these the director and members are not allowed to participate or meddle, cf. Mullan, n. 260, n. 967; but besides these associations are dependent on the parish priest if the confraternity is erected in the parish church, Mullan, l. c., n. 948, as can. 717 insinuates.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for their services according to the prescriptions of can. 716 and the statutes.

§ 2. The property of any confraternity or pious organization established in a church not its own, or in a church which serves at the same time as parochial church, must be kept separate from the rest.

PROCESSIONS

CAN. 718

Confraternitates processionibus consuetis et aliis, quas Ordinarius loci indixerit, tenentur collegialiter cum propriis insignibus et sub proprio vexillo interesse, nisi Ordinarius aliud praescripserit.

Unless the local Ordinary determines otherwise, confraternities are obliged to take part in a body in the usual processions, and others ordered by the Ordinary. They march under their own cross and wear their proper insignia.[11]

HEADQUARTERS

CAN. 719

§ 1. De Ordinarii loci consensu confraternitas vel pia unio de alia ad aliam sedem transferri potest, nisi iure aut statutis a Sede Apostolica probatis translatio prohibeatur.

§ 2. Quoties agatur de transferenda confraternitate vel pia unione alicui religioni reservata, Superioris consensus est requirendus.

§ 1. With the consent of the diocesan Ordinary, any confraternity or pious organization may transfer its quar-

11 "In solemn processions, in which the pastor usually takes part, the confraternity can have its chaplain at its head, apart from the pastor." Mullan, l. c., n. 267.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ters from one place to another, unless such transfer is prohibited either by law or by statutes that have been approved by the Holy See.

§ 2. Whenever there is question of transferring a confraternity or pious organization that belongs to a definite religious institute, the consent of the respective superior is required.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

ARCHCONFRATERNITIES AND PRIMARY ORGANIZATIONS

CAN. 720

Sodalitia quae iure pollent alias eiusdem speciei associationes sibi aggregandi, archisodalitia, vel archiconfraternitates, vel piae uniones, congregationes, societates primariae appellantur.

Brotherhoods that are empowered by law to affiliate to themselves other associations of the same nature, are termed archconfraternities or archbrotherhoods, or pious organizations, congregations, societies of primary rank.

AGGREGATION

CAN. 721

§ 1. Nulla associatio potest sine apostolico indulto alias sibi valide aggregare.

§ 2. Archiconfraternitas vel primaria unio eas tantum potest confraternitates vel pias uniones sibi aggregare, quae sint eiusdem tituli ac finis, nisi indultum apostolicum aliud ferat.

§ 1. No association can validly affiliate to itself other associations without an apostolic indult.

§ 2. Unless an apostolic indult grants larger powers, archconfraternities or organizations of primary rank are allowed to affiliate with themselves only those confraternities or pious organizations whose title and purpose is the same as their own.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

COMMUNICATION OF SPIRITUAL FAVORS

CAN. 722

§ 1. Per aggregationem communicantur omnes indulgentiae, privilegia et aliae gratiae spirituales communicabiles quae associationi aggreganti directe et nominatim a Sede Apostolica concessae fuerint vel in posterum concedantur, nisi aliud in indulto apostolico caveatur.

§ 2. Ex hac communicatione nullum ius associatio aggregans acquirit supra aggregatam.

§ 1. By affiliation, confraternities and pious organizations share equally in all the indulgences, privileges, and other communicable spiritual favors that have been or will be conceded by the Apostolic See to the archconfraternity or pious organization, provided the contrary is not stated in an apostolic indult.

§ 2. The affiliating society does not acquire any right over the affiliated by virtue of this communication of privileges.

Communication of privileges between confraternities is entirely excluded. Only directly granted favors may be communicated to affiliated organizations.

CONDITIONS FOR AFFILIATION

CAN. 723

Ad aggregationis validitatem requiritur ut:

1.° Associatio iam fuerit canonice erecta nec alii archiconfraternitati vel primariae unioni aggregata;

2.° Fiat de consensu Ordinarii loci scriptis dato una cum eius litteris testimonialibus;

3.° Indulgentiae, privilegia et aliae gratiae spirituales quae per aggregationem communicantur,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

enumerentur in elencho, ab Ordinario loci in quo archiconfraternitas sita est, recognito et societati aggregatae tradendo;

4.° Aggregatio fiat formula in statutis praescripta et in perpetuum;

5.° Litterae aggregationis expediantur gratis omnino et nulla prorsus mercede etiam sponte oblata, exceptis necessariis expensis.

Valid affiliation requires: (1) that the association be canonically erected and not affiliated to any other archconfraternity or primary pious organization; (2) that it is done with the written approval of the diocesan Ordinary and with testimonial letters from him; (3) that the indulgences, privileges and other spiritual favors communicated be enumerated in writing, the list to be inspected by the Ordinary of the diocese in which the archconfraternity exists, and forwarded to the affiliated society;[1] (4) that the affiliation be made according to the form prescribed in the statutes and forever;[2] (5) that, excepting unavoidable expenses, the letters of affiliation be expedited gratis and without recompense, even if such be freely offered.

TRANSFER OF ARCHCONFRATERNITIES

CAN. 724

Archiconfraternitas vel primaria unio de alia ad aliam sedem nonnisi ab Apostolica Sede transferri potest.

Archconfraternities or primary organizations can be

1 The superior of the primary society is not allowed to withold some indulgences and privileges, but must communicate all he has. Mullan, l. c., n. 151.

2 This is generally called diploma and must be placed in the church or sacristy.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google transferred from one place to another only by the Apostolic See.

CAN. 725

Titulus archisodalitii vel archiconfraternitatis vel unionis primariae, etiam honoris tantum causa, potest associationi ab una Sede Apostolica concedi.

The titles "Archconfraternity," "Archbrotherhood," "Primary Organization," may, even as honorary titles, be granted only by the Apostolic See.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX

Questions to be Answered in the Quinquennial Report of Religious Superiors (can. 510) [1]

1. Has the congregation obtained the decree of approbation or encouragement, and when was it granted by the Holy See?
2. What is the end or particular scope of the institute?
3. Has the name which the institute took in the beginning, or the scope or habit of the Sisters, undergone any change afterwards, and by what authority?
4. How many members have received the habit since the beginning, or at least in the last twenty years?
5. How many members have left the institute since the beginning, or at least in the last twenty years, and when, whether during the novitiate, after the temporary profession, or after having taken perpetual vows? Have there been any fugitives, and how many?
6. When was the last report sent to the Holy See?

I. About Persons

(a) About Postulants

7. How many new members have been received since the last report?
8. Did all of them bring the proper testimonials?
9. Have any special efforts been purposely made to draw members, and especially have the Superiors availed themselves of the newspapers for this purpose?
10. How often and for what impediments or obstacles was a dispensation required, and by what ecclesiastical Superior was it granted?
11. In which house and for how long did postulants or candidates dwell?

[1] Translation substantially from Bastien-Lanslots, op. cit., Appendix.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) About Novices

12. How many houses are there with a novitiate, and was each one founded with the sanction of the Holy See?

13. How many novices have received the habit of the institute since the last report?

14. How many novices are there at present?

15. Are the novices kept apart from the professed Sisters, according to law?

16. Has each of them a complete copy of the constitutions?

17. Have all of them before profession spent a whole and continuous year in the novitiate house under the care of the mistress of novices?

18. Has the time of the novitiate, as established by the constitutions, ever been extended or shortened, and by what authority?

19. Have the novices applied themselves during the first year of the novitiate to works of piety, or have they been put to other work, and to what kind of work?

20. Have the novices been sent to other houses in the second year of the novitiate, where two years are prescribed?

21. Has the Bishop or his delegate made the required examination of candidates before they took the habit or made their first profession?

(c) About Professed Sisters

22. How many members are there at present in the congregation: (a) with temporary vows; (b) with perpetual vows?

23. Have the temporary vows always been renewed at the proper time?

24. Have the members been admitted to take perpetual vows at the expiration of the period of temporary vows?

25. How many professed Sisters or novices have died since the last report?

(d) About Sisters who have left or have been dismissed

26. How many members have left the institute since the last report? (a) of the novices; (b) of professed Sisters with temporary vows; (c) of professed Sisters with perpetual vows.

27. Have the rules regarding the dismissal of members, as laid down in the constitutions, been always observed?

28. Has a dispensation from the vows always been obtained in cases of dismissal, and from what ecclesiastical Superior?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

29. Has, in cases of dismissal of Sisters with perpetual vows, the confirmation of the Holy See always been obtained?

30. Has the entire dowry, however invested, and the furniture they brought, in its present condition been returned to those leaving for any reason whatever?

31. Have those who have left the institute, having no property of their own, been provided with sufficient funds for their safe and decent return to their families?

II. About Property

(a) About Houses

32. How many houses does the institute possess, and in which dioceses are they located? Has the institute any provinces, and if so, how many?

33. Have any new houses been opened since the last report, and if so, how many? Has the proper authorization been obtained for all, and has the mode of procedure prescribed by the constitutions been followed?

34. How many members of the different classes are there in each house, and in what works have they been employed (in case the institute has charge of different works)?

35. Has any house been suppressed since the last report, and by what authority?

36. Has each member her own cell, or at least her own bed in the common dormitory, properly separated from the others?

37. Has a place been set aside with all necessary conveniences for the care of the sick?

38. Has a sufficient number of rooms been set aside, as should be, for the reception of guests, apart from the community rooms?

39. Has the dwelling of the chaplain or of the confessor a separate entrance, and has it any communication with that of the Sisters?

(b) About Finances

40. What has been the yearly income and expenditure since the last report; (a) of the institute in general, and (b) of each house in particular?

41. Has the institute or any individual house acquired, since the last report, any movable or immovable property, and what is its value?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

42. Has the money always been invested profitably, yet honestly and safely?

43. Has there been any loss or damage since the last report; if so, how much and from what cause?

44. Has any immovable or very expensive movable property been alienated, to what value and by what authority?

45. Has any part of the capital been spent?

46. Are there any debts on the property in common, or on any house in particular, and to what amount?

47. Has any new indebtedness been incurred since the last report; if so, how much and by what authority?

48. Has each house a procurator or treasurer other than the local superiors and the treasurer general?

49. Have the procurators, general and local, given a report of their administration at stated times, and have these reports been examined and approved?

50. Are there any lawsuits pending about the property?

51. Has each house a safe closed with three keys, and are the laws bearing on the subject observed?

52. Have money or other valuable been accepted from lay people for safe keeping, and on what conditions?

53. Have the dowries of the Sisters been invested safely and profitably, according to Canon Law? Has any part of them been used; if so, how much, in what manner, and by whose authority?

54. Are any pious legacies or foundations in the institute, either for Masses to be offered or for works of charity; if so, which are they?

55. Have the obligations been faithfully carried out?

56. Has the principal of those foundations been duly invested, and is there an entirely separate account kept of them?

57. Has an account of these foundations been rendered to the Bishop, according to the constitution "Conditae"?

58. How much of the favorable balance of each house has been turned into the common treasury at the end of each year?

59. Have all contributed their share willingly or unwillingly?

60. Have the superior or treasurer any money of which they can freely dispose, even for the welfare of the institute, without rendering an account of it?

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

III. About Discipline

61. Are the spiritual exercises carefully performed in each house, as prescribed for each day, month, year, or other times?

62. Do all the members hear Mass daily?

63. Can all members be present at the common exercises, and are those who must occasionally be absent from the one or the other on account of domestic work, given time to perform them privately afterwards?

64. Is the decree "Quemadmodum" observed, (a) with regard to the manifestation of conscience; (b) with regard to sacramental confession? Is the decree "Sacra Tridentina Synodus" concerning Holy Communion observed, and are both decrees read in public at stated times in the vernacular?

65. Is the ordinary confessor changed every three years or confirmed by lawful authority?

66. Are the prescriptions concerning the enclosure in that part of the house especially reserved for the religious faithfully carried out?

67. Are the religious frequently given the privilege of the parlor, and are the constitutions on that point observed?

68. Do the superiors always give a companion to Sisters leaving the house?

69. Are catechetical instructions given, as also pious exhortations to the lay-sisters, to the pupils, to the servants and others living in the house, how and at what times?

70. Are writings on piety, religion, etc., even for the exclusive use of the community, ever printed without the consent of the Bishop?

71. Do the members use any books and which, either ancient or modern, even written by hand, edited with the permission only of the Superiors of the congregation?

About the Observance of Certain Special Laws

72. Are all the regulations concerning the general chapter faithfully carried out: (a) in regard to the letters of convocation; (b) in regard to the election of delegates; (c) in regard to the election of tellers and of a secretary; (d) in regard to the election of the superior general; (e) in regard to the election of general councillors, treasurer, and secretary?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

73. Has perfect freedom been given to the members for writing and for receiving letters which are exempted from the inspection of superiors?

74. Has the law concerning the changes of superiors after a certain lapse of time been faithfully observed? Have any dispensations been obtained from the law, how many and for whom?

75. Have the general and provincial superiors rightly performed the prescribed visitation of the houses?

76. Have the superior general and the provincial and local superiors called their councils at fixed times to treat of the business of the congregation, of the province or of the house?

77. Has due liberty been given to the councillors in these deliberations?

78. Have the elections of the general chapter been made freely and according to the laws?

79. Have the superiors with the required motherly care supplied all necessaries to the members, especially with regard to food and clothing? Are there any among the members who procure these things for themselves from outsiders?

80. Is the number of Sisters in any place so inadequate that they are overburdened with work to the serious detriment of their health?

81. Is due provision made for the comfort of the sick, and are their corporal and spiritual needs charitably attended to?

82. Have the pontifical decrees been publicly read at the appointed times?

About the Works of the Congregation

83. How many persons or classes of persons have been benefited by the works to which the religious devote themselves according to the scope of the institute?

84. If the number of such persons has decreased since the last report, give the reasons.

85. For congregations which collect from door to door:

(a) Do the constitutions clearly and certainly authorize them to collect from door to door?

(b) Has the decree "Singulari," of March 27, 1906, been inserted in the constitutions?

(c) Is this decree faithfully observed in all its details?

86. Have the Sisters in their houses any hostelries or hospitals for all classes of persons, even of the other sex, and if so, with whose permission and with what safeguards?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

87. Have the Sisters taken upon themselves the care of the domestic department in seminaries, colleges, and other houses of ecclesiastics, and to what extent?

88. Do the Sisters practice any works of charity (such as taking care of infants, of confinement and surgical cases) which appear improper to virgins consecrated to God and wearing the religious habit?

89. Have the Sisters who wait on the sick in their homes always used the precautions prescribed by the constitutions?

90. Have the superiors ever allowed Sisters to dwell in the houses of lay people and for how long?

91. Has, since the last report, any new work, or kind of work been added to those already existing, and by what authority?

92. Have any abuses crept into the congregation, or into individual houses, and of what nature?

93. Are there any troubles or difficulties existing, (a) with the ordinaries, (b) with the confessors, (c) with the chaplains?

It is evident that this questionnaire is not to be answered by all alike. Besides, it may be reasonably expected that the S. Cong. of Religious will modify and shorten it according to the Code. As it is now, it might prove irksome to the superiors who have to answer all those detailed questions.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google

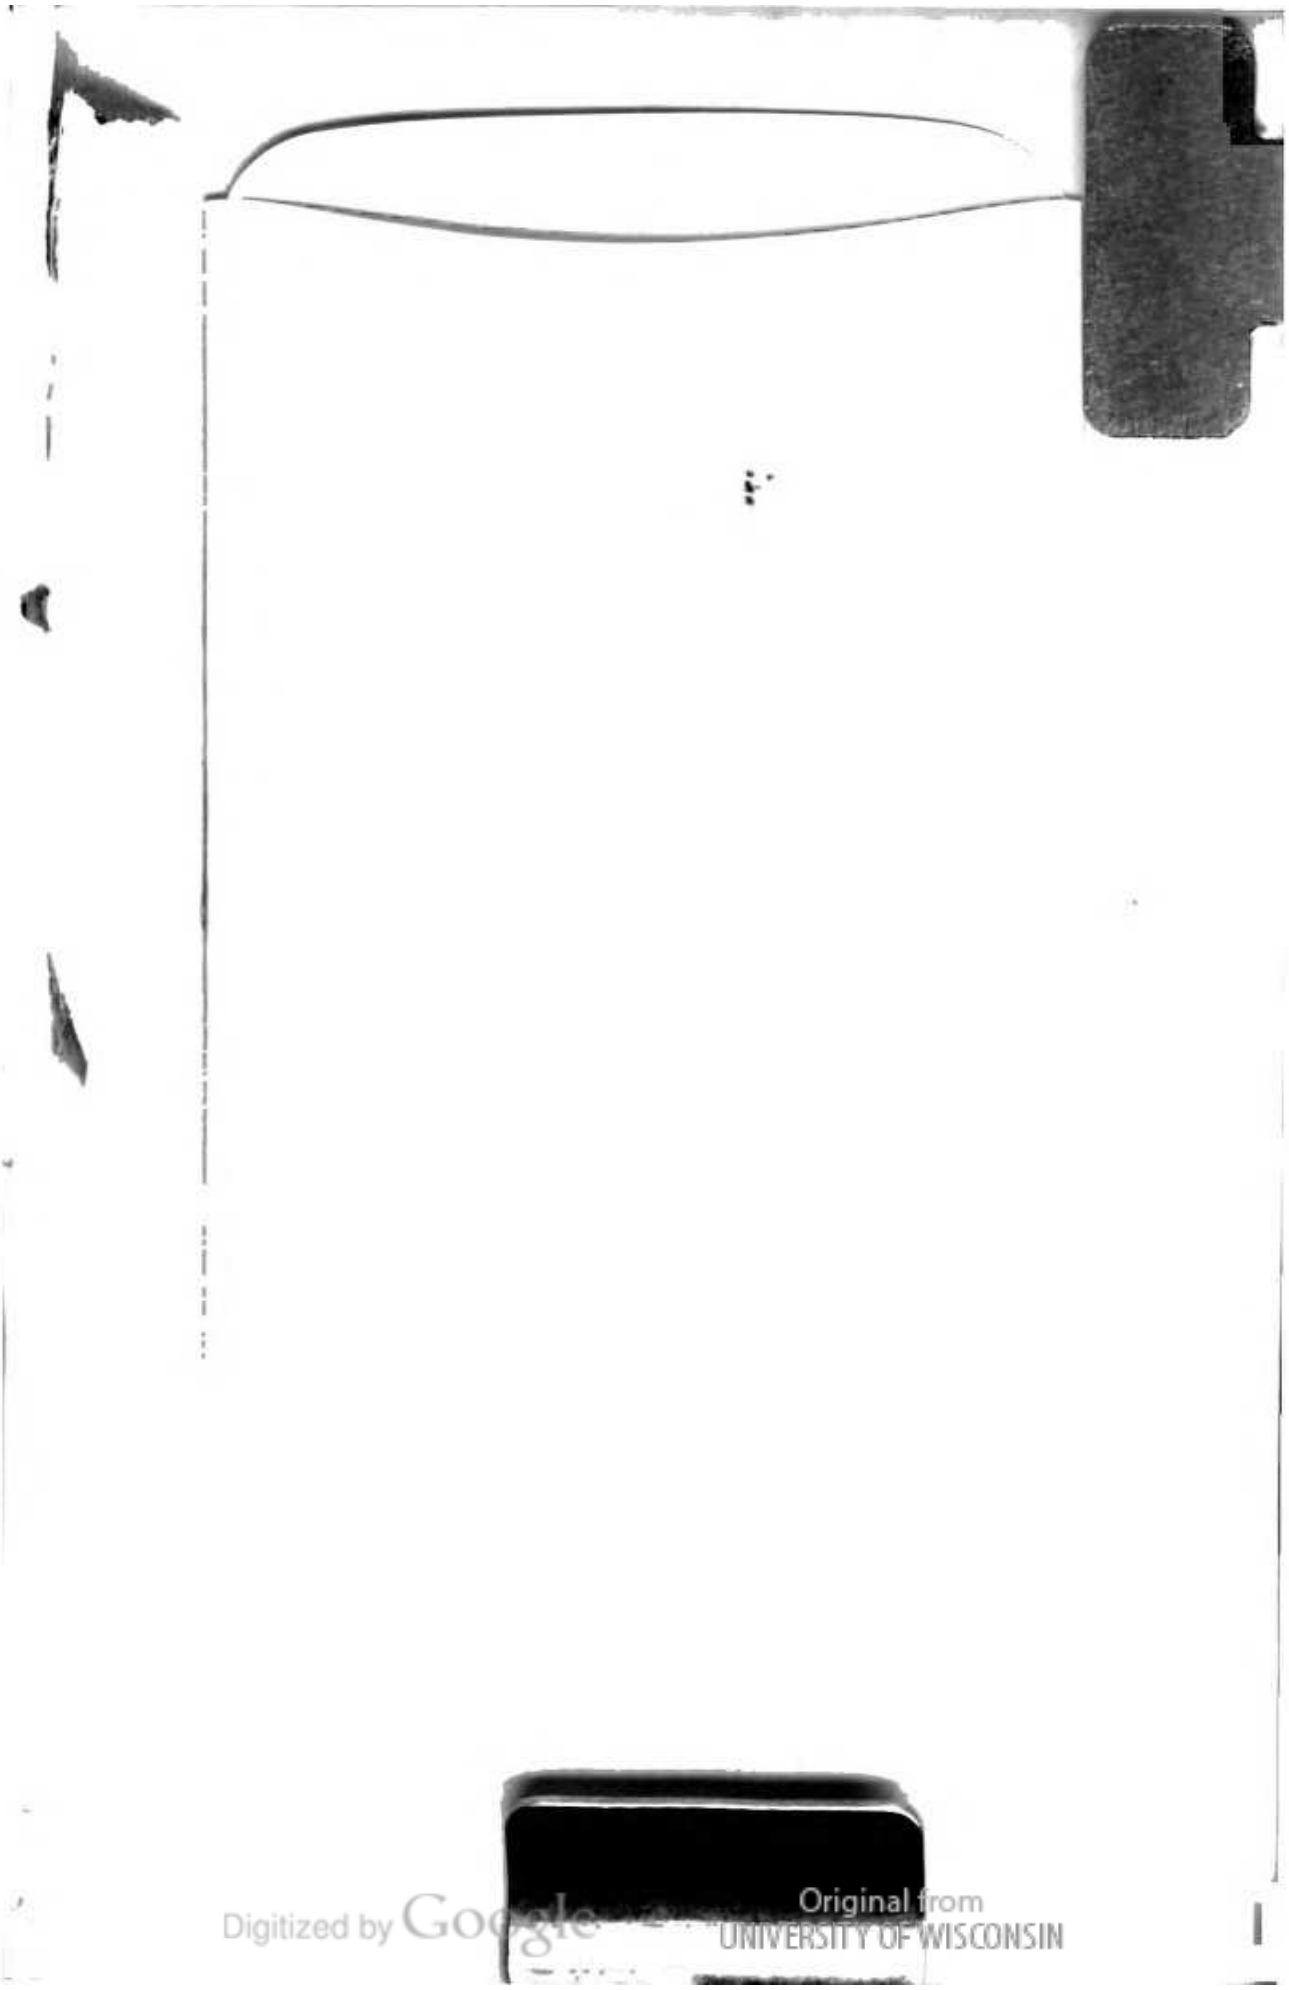
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89097198170

B89097198170A

he kept



Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89097198170

b89097198170a

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library

of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

BOOK III

De Rebus, or Administrative Law

VOLUME IV

On the Sacraments (Except Matrimony) and Sacramentals

(Can. 726-1011, 1144-1153)

SECOND, REVISED EDITION

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68, GREAT RUSSELL ST., LONDON, W. C.
1921

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NIHIL OBSTAT

Sti. Ludovici, die 15. Feb. 1921

F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR

Sti. Ludovici, die 16. Feb. 1921

✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright, 1920
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved
Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
B12
4

587680

CONTENTS

	PAGE
BOOK III. ECCLESIASTICAL THINGS	1
Preliminary Remarks	1
Things in General	2
Simony	5
Penalties against Simony	12
When There Is No Simony	16
PART I. THE SACRAMENTS	19
Administration and Reception	19
The Three Sacraments Which Cannot Be Repeated	22
Rites to Be Observed	25
The Holy Oils	28
No Unlawful Exactions Permitted	31
TITLE I. BAPTISM	33
CH. I. THE MINISTER OF BAPTISM	37
The Ordinary Minister	37
Extraordinary Ministers	41
Baptism of Adults	44
CH. II. THE SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM	46
The Wayfaring State	48
Children of Infidels	53
Children of Non-Catholics	56
Baptism of Adults	57
Disposition for Baptism	61
Baptism of Insane Persons	62
CH. III. RITES AND CEREMONIES OF BAPTISM	65
Rite	66
Baptismal Water	67
Method of Baptizing	69
Private Baptism	70
Christian Names	73

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

Ch. IV. Godparents or Sponsors 75
Sponsors at Conditional Baptism 76
Number of Sponsors 77
Requisites of Legal Sponsorship 77
Spiritual Relationship 83
Duties of Sponsors 83

Ch. V. Time and Place of Baptism 85
Solemn Baptism 86
Place of Baptism 87
A Baptismal Font in Every Parish Church 88
Solemn Baptism in Private Houses 91

Ch. VI. Baptismal Record and Proof 94
Proof of Baptism 95

Title II. Confirmation 97

Matter and Form 97

Ch. I. The Minister of Confirmation 100
The Bishop's Power 107
Duty of the Bishop 109

Ch. II. The Subject of Confirmation 112

Ch. III. Time and Place of Administering Confirmation 116

Ch. IV. Sponsors 118

Requisites of Sponsorship 119
Requisites of Licit Sponsorship 121
Spiritual Relationship 122

Ch. V. Record and Proof of Confirmation 123
Record 123
Proof 124

Title III. The Holy Eucharist 125

Ch. I. The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass 126

Art. 1. The Celebrant of the Mass 126
Concelebrating Forbidden 127
The Celebret 128
The Obligation of Saying Mass 132
Binating 134

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Moral Disposition of the Priest 140
The Obligation of Fasting Before Saying Mass . 141
Application of the Mass 142
Preparation and Thanksgiving 146
Vestments for Mass 147
No Assistant Priest Allowed at Mass 149
Mass Without a Server 150

ART. 2. Rites and Ceremonies of the Mass 152
The Species 152
Observance of the Rubrics and Rites 156

ART. 3. Time and Place of Celebrating the Mass . . 160
The Hour for Saying Mass 162
The Place for Saying Mass 168

ART. 4. Alms and Stipends for Masses 175
Various Kinds of Mass Stipends 183
No Trafficking in Mass Stipends Allowed 186
Obligation Never Ceases 189
Number of Masses Not Determined 190
Mass Stipends to Be Fixed by the Ordinary . . . 191
Additional Stipulations 192
Time of Fulfilling the Obligation 197
Posters in Churches 200
Masses Sent Away 201
Duration of the Obligation of a Mass Stipend . . 202
Duties of Ordinaries and Religious Superiors . . 209
Stipend Books 210

CH. II. THE HOLY EUCHARIST AS A SACRAMENT . . 213

ART. 1. The Minister of Holy Communion 213
Communion at Mass and Outside of It 215
Public Communion for the Sick 218
Private Communion 219
The Holy Viaticum 221
Communion Under the Species of Bread 223

ART. 2. The Recipient of Holy Communion 224
Communion of Children 225
Who Are Not to Be Admitted to Holy Communion . 229
Communion May Be Received Only Once a Day . . 233
The Eucharist Fast 234

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Obligation of Receiving Communion 236
The Duty of Parents and Others 239
Unworthy Communion Does Not Satisfy the Law . 240
Communion on Holy Thursday 240
Frequent Communion 241
Duty of Receiving the Viaticum 242
Rite of Holy Communion 244

ART. 3. Time and Place for Distributing Holy Communion 245
Time 245
Place 247

TITLE IV. THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE 249

CH. I. THE MINISTER OF PENANCE 251
Ordinary Jurisdiction 255
Delegated Jurisdiction 260
Confessors of Exempt Religious 265
Confessors of Female Religious 266
Examination of Confessors 273
Limited Jurisdiction 275
Jurisdiction Expressly to Be Granted 277
Revocation of Jurisdiction or License 278
Confessors of Vagi and Peregrini 282
Absolution in Danger of Death 286
Confessors at Sea 289
Absolutio Complicis Invalida 291
Additional Prayers 294
Absolution Not to Be Refused or Deferred 294
Wholesome Penances 297
The Confessor a Judge and Physician 298
The Seal of the Confessional 300
Use of Knowledge Gained Through Confession Forbidden 303
Novice-Masters and Directors Not to Hear Confessions 306
The Duty of Hearing Confessions 307

CH. II. THE RESERVATION OF SINS 311

Only One Sin Properly Reserved to the Holy See . . 318
Reservation to Be Made at the Synod 319

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Exempt Religious Superiors 321
Number and Quality of Reserved Cases 322
Promulgation and Absolution of Reserved Cases . . 330
When Reservations Cease or Lose Their Force . . . 334

CH. III. THE SUBJECT OF PENANCE 337
Matter and Integrity of Confession 337
Confession Through an Interpreter 340
Obligation of Denouncing Sollicitation 341
Instruction of the Holy Office of Feb. 20, 1866 . . . 343
Instruction of the Holy Office of July 20, 1890 . . . 345
Confession May be Made in Any Rite 347
The Annual Confession 348
Sacrilegious Confession 349

CH. IV. THE PLACE FOR HEARING CONFESSIONS . . . 350

CH. V. INDULGENCES 354

ART. 1. Grant of Indulgences 354
Who May Grant Indulgences 356
The Papal Blessing 359
Privileged Altars 365
Promulgation of Indulgences 370
Plenary Indulgences 374
The Transfer of Feasts and Indulgences 376
The Day for Gaining Indulgences 378
Loss of Local and Real Indulgences 379

ART. 2. The Gaining of Indulgences 381
Visit of a Semi-Public Oratory 385
Indulgences Applicable to the Dead 387
Confession and Communion 388
Prescribed Works 390
Commutation of Pious Works 394
Mutes 395

TITLE V. EXTREME UNCTION 396

CH. I. THE MINISTER OF EXTREME UNCTION 398

CH. II. THE SUBJECT OF EXTREME UNCTION 401

CH. III. RITES AND CEREMONIES 406
The Anointings 407

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

TITLE VI. HOLY ORDERS 409

CH. I. THE MINISTER OF ORDINATION 412
Promoted by the Pope 414
Mandatum de Consecrando 414
Consecrators 417
The Episcopus Proprius 418
Vicars and Prefects Apostolic, Prelates Nullius . . . 424
Recipients of Dimissorial Letters 431
Rights of Religious Superiors 434
The Bishop of the Diocese 439

CH. II. SUBJECT OF HOLY ORDERS 444
Valid and Licit Ordination 444
Necessity and Utility of the Diocese 447
Forbidding Ordination ex Informata Conscientia . . 448
The Clerical State Must Be Embraced Freely . . . 451
Clerical Training in Seminaries 451
ART. 1. Requisites of Candidates for Ordination . . 454
The Canonical Age 457
The Knowledge Required 457
Ordinations per Saltum Not Permitted 460
The Interstices 461
Titulus Ordinationis 464
Loss and Lack of Title 468
Tituli Servitii et Missionis 471
Titles for Religious 474

ART. 2. Irregularities and Other Impediments . . . 476
Irregularities ex Defectu 478
Irregularties ex Delicto 484
How Irregularity ex Delicto Is Incurred 495
Ignorance No Excuse 501
Multiplied Irregularities and Impediments . . . 502
The Ordinary's Dispensing Power 504
Petitions for Dispensation 507

CH. III. PREREQUISITES OF ORDINATION 512
Testimonials 513
Examinations Before Ordination 521
Publication of the Ordination 524
Special Information 525
Spiritual Exercises or Retreat 526

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
CH. IV. RITES AND CEREMONIES OF S. ORDINATION . . 528
The Ordination Mass 529
Oriental and Latin Rites 530
Holy Communion in S. Ordination 531

CH. V. TIME AND PLACE OF ORDINATION 532
Days on Which Ordination May Be Conferred . . . 532
Defective Ordination 536
Ordination Outside the Diocese 544
Place of Ordination 545

CH. VI. ROSTER OF ORDINANDS AND ATTESTATION OF ORDINATION 548

PROCEDURE IN ORDINATION CASES (LIB. IV, TIT. 21) 550

The Competent Court 550
The Plaintiff 554
Mode of Procedure 555
Suspension Pending Trial 555
Two Sentences Required 556

TITLE VIII. THE SACRAMENTALS 558
Definition 558
Institution, Interpretation, Change 559
Minister of the Sacramentals 560
Diverse Consecrations and Blessings 561
Rites to Be Observed 565
Subject of Sacramentals 566
Effect of Constitutive Blessings 567
Exorcisms 568
Appendix to Can. 821 571
Appendix II. Unleavened or Leavened Bread 572

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

BOOK III

ECCLESIASTICAL THINGS

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

The third book of the Code treats of "things" (de rebus). The provisions which it embodies may be called administrative law, because the "things" comprised therein together form the object of ecclesiastical administration, either in the merely spirtual or the mixed domain. Besides, since a potiori fit denominatio, and the Sacraments constitute the most important part of this Book, the sacred ministry of the Church here becomes most conspicuous. But even mixed things, such as benefices and temporalities, must be assigned to the administrative section. One doubt only, at least for a moment, arose in our mind, viz., concerning the magisterium ecclesiasticum, whether it has found its proper place. However, we must admit that the place for it was properly chosen. For although the teaching office may be reckoned among the personal rights of jurisdiction, yet, considering its objects (such as the censorship of books, seminaries, and schools), it is manifest that these fall under the heading of res. The Code, therefore, in Book III, treats in 827 canons of the following subjects:

Part I. Sacraments and Sacramentals.
Part II. Sacred Places and Times.
Part III. Divine Worship.
Part IV. The Magisterium Ecclesiasticum.
Part V. Ecclesiastical Benefices.
Part VI. Church Property.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THINGS IN GENERAL

CAN. 726

Res de quibus in hoc libro agitur quaeque totidem media sunt ad Ecclesiae finem consequendum, aliae sunt spirituales, aliae temporales, aliae mixtae.

The things of which this book treats, and which are as many means by which the Church attains her end, are either spiritual, or temporal, or mixed. The end of the Church is foremost and above all spiritual. But since the society founded by Christ is visible, and a moral or artificial person with corporate rights, the Church as such, as well as her members, cannot abstract from temporal or bodily things. The very notion of a sacrament, a thing sacred par excellence, implies a visible sign, which presupposes an inherent right to the appropriation and use of such material things as are necessary for the proper and divinely established administration of these visible signs. Furthermore divine worship requires buildings and ground on which to erect them, as well as sacred furniture to be used for the divine service. Moreover, the ministers of the Church are entitled to a decent support. Lastly, charitable institutions, which are the natural offspring of the Church, require material aid and subsidy. All of which goes to show that many objects or things, no matter how temporal or material they may appear, become hallowed by the use to which they are put in the Church, who, as it were, transfers them into a higher sphere.

But it must never be lost sight of that temporal things claimed by the Church are but means to realize the end for which she has been founded (media sunt ad Ecclesiae finem consequendum), and consequently are not sought by her for their own sake, but only as far as her end requires. The scope of these requirements, needless to say, is wide, and the needs are enormous, especially now-a-days, when Christian charity is overwhelmed with all sorts of demands.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code treats of three kinds of things: spiritual, temporal, and mixed.

First, let us answer the question, what is a thing, a res?

The reader may remember that the division adopted by the Code rests on the old trilogy: personae, res, actiones. After having treated of the rights and duties as annexed to the persons of men, the legislator now inquires into the objects of right or law (obiecta iuris), leaving actions to be dealt with in the last two books, in connection with the penal code.

A thing (res) is an object that exists outside, though it may be strictly connected with, a person, and is perceived by the senses. When we say "perceived by the senses," this phrase must be understood in the way a human being reasons. There are corporeal things, i. e., such as affect the senses, and incorporeal things, which are not the object of sensation and can neither be seen nor handled, as, for instance, a hereditary right, an advowson, a usufruct.[1] The latter, in some way, are objects of sensation, else they would not be mentioned in the law.

The Roman law[2] took cognizance of divine things (res divini iuris), and things appertaining to men (res humani iuris). The divine things it divided into res sacrae, places or objects set apart and solemnly conse-

1 L. 1, Dig. 1, 8; Blackstone-Cooley, Commentaries on the Law of England, Chicago, 1879, Vol. 1, § 17.

2 Dig. l. c.; Ramsay-Lanciani, Manual of Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 300.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

crated to the gods by a deliberate act of the State, such as groves, altars, chapels, temples; and res religiosae sive sanctae, places or objects which acquired a sacred character from the purposes to which they were applied, such as sepulchres and the walls of a fortified city.

Our Code adopts a somewhat different division, though the distinction of the Roman law is still apparent. But one thing is certain: all "things" dealt with here are ecclesiastical (res ecclesiasticae). The division adopted may be illustrated by the subjoined diagram:

Res ecclesiasticae { 1. spirituales { a) stricte spirituales; b) sacrae; c) religiosae } 2. temporales 3. mixtae }

1. Spiritual things, in the strictest sense, are such as directly refer to the salvation of souls and their supernatural end, such as, e. g., the Sacraments, the sacramentals, prayer, fasts and feasts, indulgences, ecclesiastical offices.

Res sacrae are things made sacred by a special dedication, blessing, or consecration, such as churches, cemeteries, sacred vessels,[3] etc.

Res religiosae are things connected with the religious life or such as bear a religious character without a special blessing or consecration, for instance, religious houses, hospitals, etc.

2. Temporal things are such as are employed for the temporal support of the Church and her ministers, or for other necessities, for instance, dowries, funds, salaries, collections, subscriptions, etc.[4]

3. Res mixtae are such things as combine a temporal

[3] See can. 1154; can. 1497.

[4] Cfr. Devoti, Institut. Canonic., l. iv, Leodii, 1874, t. i, p. 308 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with either the strictly spiritual or the sacred or religious character, as, e. g., ecclesiastical benefices and the ius patronatus, also churches and sacred vessels in so far as a distinction may be made between the consecration or blessing and the material value of the consecrated or blessed object. All these things, then, in so far as they fall under ecclesiastical jurisdiction, form the subject-matter of the third book.

SIMONY

CAN. 727

§ 1. Studiosa voluntas emendi vel vendendi pro pretio temporali rem intrinsece spiritualem, ex. gr., Sacramenta, ecclesiasticam iurisdictionem, consecrationem, indulgentias, etc., vel rem temporalem rei spirituali adnexam ita ut res temporalis sine spirituali nullo modo esse possit, ex. gr., beneficium ecclesiasticum, etc., aut res spiritualis sit obiectum, etsi partiale, contractus, ex. gr., consecratio in calicis consecrati venditione, est simonia iuris divini.

§ 2. Dare vero res temporales spirituali adnexas pro temporalibus spirituali adnexis, vel res spirituales pro spiritualibus, vel etiam temporales pro temporalibus, si id ob periculum irreverentiae erga res spirituales ab Ecclesia prohibeatur, est simonia iuris ecclesiastici.

CAN. 728

Cum de simonia agitur, emptio-venditio, permutatio, etc., late accipiendae sunt pro qualibet conventione, licet ad effectum non deducta, etiam tacita, in qua scilicet animus simoniacus expresse non manifestetur, sed ex circumstantiis colligatur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 727, § 1, defines simony iuris divini as a deliberate eagerness to buy or sell for a temporal price anything either intrinsically spiritual, or temporal with a spiritual thing attached to it in such a way that the temporal without the spiritual object could not exist at all, or the spiritual object itself, though only in a partial way, is intended in the bargain.

1. Studiosa voluntas, or the deliberate will externally manifested, here implies not only the essential malice of a sin against the virtue of religion, but also the juridical element of external manifestation. For, as the Gloss[5] says, unless simony is external, it can be neither proved nor punished. Hence merely mental simony, if it is not manifested in any shape or form, does not enter the canonical realm. Different from this is the state of mind which prompts one to give or offer something temporal, not as a real price, but as a motive for attaining or causing something spiritual, or if the spiritual is given by way of gratuitous compensation, or vice versa.[6] This may happen when a gift is presented under the pretext of just remuneration, although the real motive is to obtain a spiritual favor, and vice versa.[7] However, if there is no intention to commit simony, and the sentiment of gratitude prevails, no simony can be construed.

Another kind of simony is called conventional, namely, when a pact intervenes, although the object of the simoniacal contract has not yet been delivered, or delivered only by one of the parties. Simony is real not only when a formal agreement has been made, but when 5 Ad. c. 1, C. 1, q. 1, s. v. "Quidam." The malice consists in this that a spiritual thing is treated as if it were menial and entirely dependent on man's will, and not on God's grace and power. Cfr. St. Thom., i–ii, q. 100, a. 1.

6 Prop. damn. ab Innoc. XI, n. 45 (Denzinger, Enchiridion, n. 1062).

7 Layman, Theologia Moralis, l. iv, tr. 10, c. 8, n. 66.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the object of that agreement has been delivered by both parties.

Confidential simony is that committed by the resignation of a benefice without regard to the ecclesiastical law.

2. The next element of simony is sale or purchase. Hence there must be a contract as understood by common law or custom. Can. 728 says:

When there is question of simony, purchase, sale, and other similar terms must be taken in a wide sense as signifying any stipulation, even though not fulfilled, and made only in a tacit manner, i. e., one in which the simoniacal intention was not explicitly manifested, but could be gathered from the circumstances of the case. Hence the stipulation required to render a transaction simoniacal may be any kind of onerous contract, sale or exchange, bailment, hiring, borrowing, or debt.[8] It is not required that the pact be carried into effect. Therefore if one would promise to give $1000 for a certain ecclesiastical office, for instance, a pastorship, he would be guilty of simony. Lastly, the agreement may be only tacit, i. e., without a written or oral understanding as to the sort of benefit, whether spiritual or temporal. All that is required by law is a probable conjecture as to the simoniacal intention (ex circumstantiis colligatur). Such conjectures[9] may be based on the quality of the person who gives or receives, the quantity of the gift, and the time. Thus a poor person who gives a large sum to a prelate in order to obtain a spiritual favor, may justly be suspected of acting from a wrong motive, whereas a rich person need not be suspected,

8 One of the four species of contractus innominatus: do ut des, facio ut facias, do ut facias, facio ut des. Cfr. Engel, V. 3, n. 4.

9 Cfr. c. 18, X, V, 3 de simonia; Suarez, De Relig. l. iv, de sim., c. 36, n. 12 (ed. Paris, 1859, t. 13, 843 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

because he or she may intend merely to make a present. Besides, the persons who give and those who take may be bound by friendship, blood-relationship, etc.,— reasons which would make simony a rather remote motive. Again, the reputation of giver and recipient must be taken into consideration.

The quantity of the gift must also be weighed. A large and disproportionate sum might cause suspicion, whereas an insignificant sum would not. The proportion between the price paid and the spiritual benefit received may also be indicative of the underlying intention. Consumable gifts (eatables, etc.) are not to be reckoned. Lastly, the time may offer a basis for conjecture. If the price is offered long before or after the spiritual benefit is bestowed, simony can not easily be presumed. The circumstances of the person should also be taken into account,— whether he is in need or not, etc. At any rate, some sort of agreement must be made, and consequently presents made out of liberality, pious donations, or charitable subsidies cannot be branded as simoniacal.[10]

3. The temporal price is generally comprised by the threefold kind mentioned in the Decree of Gratian:[11]

(a) Munus a manu, or pecuniary advantage, which comprises money and other movable as well as immovable things, the remission of debt, easements, etc.;

(b) Munus a lingua, which implies recommendations, praise, adulation, flattery, of a kind which is a matter of stipulation and procures a benefit;

(c) Munus ab obsequio, which involves service of any kind, either habitual or actual, not due by reason of mutual obligation, hire or pay, but rendered with respect to a spiritual favor, for instance, an office. Here again

10 Cfr. cc. 3, 18, 34, X, V, 3; Layman, l. c., n. 8.

11 C. 114, C. 1, q. 1; c. 8, C. 1, q. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it must be noticed that free and voluntary service, rendered, e. g., by a friend or relative to a Cardinal or Bishop, though in the hope of obtaining a spiritual benefice, is not simony. Of course, there may be room for suspicion in such cases.

It may not be amiss to state that there is no simony involved if parents or ecclesiastical superiors promise talented boys a collegiate or seminary course, in order to induce them to embrace the ecclesiastical state, or if parents promise their children some temporal benefit to induce them to frequent the Sacraments. There is no real compact or mutual stipulation between the parties.[12]

4. Finally, the spiritual element must be considered. Our Code mentions two kinds of spiritual things: — such as are intrinsically spiritual, and such as are annexed to something spiritual.

(a) Intrinsically spiritual things, the Code says, by way of example, are the Sacraments, ecclesiastical jurisdiction, consecration, indulgences, etc. Hence to administer the Sacraments for the sake of money would be an act of simony.[13] Thus also the administration of the sacramentals for filthy lucre's sake would be simoniacal. The same must be said concerning acts of jurisdiction, absolution, delegation, grant of faculties,[14] if performed solely for a material reward. As to consecration, it is well known that the bishop is not allowed to charge anything, either for the sacred chrism or for consecration. But compensation for expenses is not forbidden.[15] Selling indulgences is simony in the truest sense of the word, but no simony is implied if a contribution is demanded in 12 Layman, l. c., n. 11.

13 Cfr. C. 1, q. 1; X, V, 3 passim.
14 C. 14, X, V, 3.
15 C. 22, C. 1, q. 1; c. 21, X, V, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the shape of an alms, as a requisite for gaining an indulgence.[16]

Simony is committed by religious if they charge a price for admittance to the religious state, because the latter is something intrinsically spiritual.[17] But dowries, victuals or compensation cannot be looked upon as a price for entering, but are necessary means of support. Intrinsically spiritual is the act of preaching the word of God and teaching the catechism, and hence to receive a temporal remuneration for performing these functions would be simony, according to S. Thomas.[18] However, preachers and teachers may lawfully be paid for administering their office.

These are the chief intrinsically spiritual things, i. e., such as are spiritual by their very nature and purpose, as well as by their divine origin.

(b) There are, besides, certain temporal things distinguished by a spiritual character attached to them (res temporalis rei spirituali adnexa). The Code speaks of a twofold connection of the temporal with the spiritual:

(1) That which is necessary to make the thing what it is supposed to be, for the one supposes the other. This is the case in all ecclesiastical benefices, pensions, and in fact all religious things. Hence the adage, "Beneficium propter officium," which means that the material element necessarily presupposes the spiritual. This is what the authors[19] call subsequent or consequent connection.

(2) The other connection is present when the spiritual character or thing is the object, though only partial, of the contract. This is what is styled antecedent connec-

16 Layman, l. c., n. 40.
17 Cfr. cc. 8, 19, 30, X, V, 3.
18 Summa Theol., II–II, q. 100, a. 3, ad. 2; Suarez, l. c., c. 18, n. 22 f.
19 S. Thom. II–II, q. 100, a. 4; Suarez, l. c., c. 13.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion, for instance, the consecration in the sale of a consecrated chalice. For the chalice is made and is such before it receives any consecration, and therefore the material element exists prior to the spiritual. Note, however, the wording of the Code: the spiritual must be intended in the bargain; in other words, because it is a consecrated chalice, I buy or sell it. Since consecration is intended in recto, and is something essentially spiritual, therefore the bargain is an act of simony iuris divini. On the other hand, as shall be seen in Can. 730, even a consecrated chalice may be bought or sold. The same rule is to be applied not only to consecrated vessels, but also to churches, oratories, cemeteries and blessed graves. It matters little whether the spiritual element is of strictly divine origin or of ecclesiastical institution, so long as it is spiritual in itself and attached to the temporal element by the lawful authority. The hieratic or sanctifying element is essentially spiritual or divine by reason of the divine power of the Church.

§ 2 of Can. 727 provides that it is simony *iuris eccl*ē*siastici* to give temporal objects annexed to spiritual for other objects annexed to spiritual, or spiritual objects for spiritual objects, or temporal objects for temporal objects, when forbidden by the Church on account of the danger of irreverence for spiritual things. This law is evidently new, as the lack of quotations proves; but the matter itself is old.

First note the term dare, to give, which, as the particle pro indicates, here means to exchange. The exchange must be of the same objects, e. g., if you exchange one set of holy oils for another set of holy oils; or one consecrated chalice for another; or one Mass for another; or if you preach for another who says Mass in your place; or exchange one piece of church property for another. But as there seems to be no sinful agreement in these cases, what is it that renders the act simoniacal? It is the express prohibition of the Church. Yet, as Suarez [20] appropriately says, this would not be sufficient; therefore another reason is added by the Code: ob periculum irreverentiae,— because these acts, though not evil in themselves, concern sacred things and may lead to irreverence. In order to remove this danger, the Church, by positive legislation, prohibits even such acts as are not in themselves sinful. This is especially the case in the exchange of ecclesiastical benefices and in selling holy oils or minor church offices.[21]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PENALTIES AGAINST SIMONY

CAN. 729

Firmis poenis in simoniacos iure statutis, contractus ipse simoniacus et, si simonia committatur circa beneficia, officia, dignitates, subsequens provisio omni vi caret, licet simonia a tertia persona commissa fuerit, etiam inscio proviso, dummodo hoc non fiat in fraudem eiusdem provisi aut eo contradicente. Quare:

1.° Ante quamlibet iudicis sententiam res simoniace data et accepta, si restitutionis sit capax nec obstet reverentia rei spirituali debita, restitui debet, et beneficium, officium, dignitas dimitti;

2.° Simoniace provisus non facit fructus suos; quod si eos bona fide perceperit, prudentiae iudicis vel Ordinarii permittitur fructus perceptos ex toto vel ex parte eidem condonare.

Apart from the penalties established by law (see Book V, Canons 2371, 2392), every simoniacal stipulation is 20 De Rel., l. IV, de simi., c. 7.

21 Cfr. c. 8, C. 1, q. 3; c. 8, X, V, 3; Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Simonia," n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

null and void, and simony committed in connection with benefices, offices, and dignities renders the appointments null and void, even though the simoniacal act was perpetrated without the knowledge of the beneficiary, by a third person, provided, however, it was not done in order to defraud the one thus provided, or against his protest. Therefore:

1.° Prior to any judicial sentence the thing simoniacally given and received must be restored, if restitution is possible and feasible without irreverence to the spiritual object, and the benefice, office or dignity must be surrendered;

2.° The beneficiary of a simoniacal transaction cannot receive the revenues of his benefice, but if he has accepted them in good faith, it is left to the discretion of the judge or Ordinary to condone the income thus received, either totally, or in part.

Since no other penalties are now in force except those mentioned by the Code,[22] the penalties of simony are:

(a) Those mentioned in can. 2371, 2392.

(b) The simoniacal contract is null and void. This occurs in resignations of office, as stated in can. 185. Furthermore no simoniacal stipulation is binding in the ecclesiastical court and in the court of conscience. Hence, if one has given a sum of money to a bishop in order to obtain a certain ecclesiastical office, the contract, even though made in writing, would be devoid of judicial force. A simoniacal compact obliges neither in the forum externum nor in the forum internum.

A reasonable doubt may be entertained with regard to entering religion. The act is complete only after profession has been made, and hence one may ask: Is the profession invalid? The Code does not give a direct

[22] Cfr. can. 6, 5°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

answer to this question, nor do the Decretals [23] insinuate or the authors [24] assert its invalidity.

As to indulgences it has been decreed [25] that all objects endowed with indulgences must be delivered to the faithful gratis; if anything is demanded for them, no matter under what pretext, whether by way of price, exchange, gift, or alms, the indulgences are eo ipso lost. Simple blessings, without indulgences, are not subject to this decree, so far as we know. We may add that the Sacraments are valid, even though administered simoniacally, for the Code only says that the contract, not the thing stipulated therein, is invalid. Thus the blessing remains, though the Church, by positive law, exempts indulgences from the effect of a simoniacal act. The same must be held as to acts of jurisdiction tainted by simony; they are valid unless special provision is made to the contrary.

(c) Such provisions are here made concerning benefices, offices, and dignities. Benefices are accurately defined in can. 1409. Offices have been described in can. 145. By dignities are understood here, we think, not only those mentioned in can. 394 (diocesan chapters), but all which combine jurisdiction with preëminence, such as a prelacy, to which class belong bishops and abbots as well as the superiores maiores of religious communities. The text says that if simony is committed in connection with these benefices (presentation, appointment, election, postulation, nomination, etc.), the subsequent provision is null and void.[26]

(d) This penalty follows even if the simoniacal act was

23 Cfr. cc. 8, 19, 30, X, V, 3.

24 Cfr. Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Simonia," art. 1, n. 7.

25 S. C. Indulg., July 16, 1887, ad 3 (A. S. S., t. 20, 63 f.).

26 Cfr. c. 12, X, I, 6; c. un. X, III, 12; cc. 2, 11, 12, 13, X, V, 3; c. 2, Extrav. Comm., V, 1; Paul IV, "Inter caeteras," Nov. 27, 1557; Pius V, "Cum primum," April 1, 1566; "Intolerabilis," June 1, 1569.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

committed by a third person. Hence if a relative or friend endeavors to put a person into office, or to obtain a dignity for him, the appointment, if made, is void, no matter whether the person thus appointed had knowledge of the simoniacal act or not.[27] The case is different, however, if the appointee protested against the simony, or if a third person committed the crime to prevent one from getting the office (ex odio).[28]

A moral and juridical consequence of this penalty is that the thing simoniacally given and accepted must be restored, provided, of course, restitution is possible. A Sacrament administered simoniacally cannot be returned, but the administrator must restore the price received to the person who has paid it.[29] An act of jurisdiction, if validly performed, cannot be "restored." Nor, according to the text, is restitution required or admissible if it involves irreverence to some spiritual thing. This would be the case if sacred relics, Agnus Deis, blessed objects or consecrated vessels had passed through irreverent hands and been sold, as happened not infrequently in the ninth century.

In making restitution the rules of justice and equity must be conscientiously observed. Thus a consideration for the bodily or physical exertion made in imparting spiritual things, v. g., in the administration of a Sacrament, preaching, etc., may be deducted from the amount to be restored.

As to benefices, offices and dignities, the text says that persons simoniacally in possession of them must be dismissed at once.[30] Dismissal is not resignation, and there-

27 Cfr. cc. 25, 33, X, V, 3.

28 Cfr. c. 27, X, V, 3: per fraudem — in dispendium — malitiose — hence envy may prompt a competitor or enemy to act simoniacally, in order to damage the other.

29 C. 115, C. 1, q. 1; c. 23, X, V, 3.

4 Suarez, l. c., n. 15.

30 C. 27, X, V, 3 and the Con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fore no right, or compensation, or consideration can be claimed in such a case. Both restitution and dismissal must be completed before any declaratory or condemnatory sentence, because the law itself declares such simoniacal transactions null and void.[31]

The second consequence, that a simoniacally provided person cannot claim any revenues, is perfectly logical; not having the right claimed, he cannot appropriate the object of that right.[32]

It may be added that these penalties and their consequences follow real simony only; almost all canonists exempt mental and conventional simony from these penalties.[33] As to confidential simony, which is committed in benefices, we shall recur to it under that heading.

WHEN THERE IS NO SIMONY

CAN. 730

Non habetur simonia cum temporale datur non pro re spirituali, sed eius occasione ex iusto titulo a sacris canonibus vel a legitima consuetudine recognito; item cum datur res temporalis pro re temporali, quae tanquam subiectum habeat adnexum aliquid spirituale, ex. gr., calix consecratus, dummodo pretium non augeatur propter adnexam rem spiritualem.

Here the Code considers two cases which apparently constitute simony, yet do not.

1. There is no simony if a temporal object is given, not as an equivalent for a spiritual thing, but on the occasion thereof, for a reason acknowledged as just by stitutions of Pius V, already quoted.

31 C. 8, X, I, 35; c. 41, X, V, 3.

32 C. 115, C. 1, q. 1; c. 23, X, V, 3.

33 Cf. Layman, l. c., n. 68; Ferraris, l. c., art. 3, n. 1 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

either canon law or custom. Under this heading falls the necessary and decent support of the clergy who administer spiritual things unto the faithful and receive temporal things in return. Natural justice dictates that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that one who works and occupies himself for another should receive his due. There is no simony here because the salary is not given as a temporal equivalent for the spiritual office and there is no equalization or proportion intended between the two.[34]

Canons who come to choir because of the daily distributions which are established by law precisely as an inducement, do not commit simony; unless indeed, as St. Thomas says, they purposely exclude every other intention.[35]

Mass stipends do not involve simony because they are not given as a price for the holy Sacrifice, or for the intrinsic or concomitant labor involved in saying Mass, but merely as an alms intended to contribute to the necessary support of the sacred ministers.[36]

Legacies and foundations are not simoniacal because, partly, they bear the character of benefices, and partly involve a merely material obligation not intrinsically connected with the spiritual character, and partly partake of the nature of Masses or salaries.[37]

From this it may also be seen that clergymen may, without danger of committing simony, treat with bishop or congregation for a just and sufficient support.[38]

There is no simony committed if something is demanded for a plot or lot in a cemetery, for the purpose

34 Layman, l. c., n. 60.
35 Quaest. Quodlib., 8, q. 6.
36 Cfr. prop. dam. Wicliff., n. 25 (Denzinger, n. 501).
37 Suarez, l. c., c. 39, n. 17.
38 Cfr. c. 11, X, III, 5; Layman, l. c., n. 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of meeting the necessary expenses of maintenance. To sell the right of burial in consecrated ground, of course, would be simony.[39]

Taxes established according to the rules of justice and custom are not simoniacal.[40]

2. There is no simony involved when a temporal object is given for another temporal object which has some spiritual benefit attached to it, as, for instance, a consecrated chalice, provided, however, that the price be not raised on account of the spiritual benefit. The reason for this ruling lies in the fact that the connection between the spiritual benefit and the material is antecedent, and not intrinsically necessary, whilst, on the other hand, the material and workmanship of the object has a price. Hence churches, sacred vessels, and vestments may be materially valued, provided the consecration or blessing attached to them is not prized, nor the price augmented on account of the spiritual benefit.[41]

39 C. 15, X, III, 28; c. 41, X, V, 3.

40 S. C. C., June 10, 1896 (Coll. P. F., n. 1939).

41 Layman, l. c., n. 37; Suarez, l. c., c. 14, n. 12.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART I

THE SACRAMENTS

ADMINISTRATION AND RECEPTION

CAN. 731

§ 1. Cum omnia Sacramenta Novae Legis, a Christo Domino Nostro instituta, sint praecipua sanctificationis et salutis media, summa in iis opportune riteque administrandis ac suscipiendis diligentia et reverentia adhibenda est.

§ 2. Vetitum est Sacramenta Ecclesiae ministrare haereticis aut schismaticis, etiam bona fide errantibus eaque petentibus, nisi prius, erroribus reiectis, Ecclesiae reconciliati fuerint.

§ 1. As the Sacraments of the New Law, instituted by Christ our Lord, are the chief means of sanctification and salvation, the greatest care and reverence must be taken that they be suitably and properly administered and received.

The law is concerned mainly with the administration of the Sacraments. They must be administered opportune et rite, says our canon. Opportune refers not only to time and circumstances, but also to worthiness. Hence the minister must beware of two extremes: extreme severity and too great leniency. An instruction of the S. C. de Propaganda Fide [1] enjoins mercy and kindness, especially towards the newly converted and those who live in places whither missionaries go but rarely. The clergy, though perhaps compelled to impose a public and protracted penance, should not deprive sinners, if really repentant, of the benefit of absolution, nor refuse them the Holy Eucharist. Besides, a distinction must be made between different crimes and criminals, especially if excommunication is involved, although the latter penalty renders them incapable of receiving the Sacraments. Excommunicati tolerati may be treated more leniently than vitandi.

1 April 29, 1784 (Coll., n. 569).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Rite signifies, properly speaking, with due regard to the use of the rite prescribed. This point is treated more fully in can. 733. Rite may also refer to the intention of the minister and the recipient. This, according to the common teaching of theologians and canonists, must be virtual, i. e., one which, though not present here and now, continues to exert its influence by virtue of an intention previously had and never retracted, on the part of the minister. On the part of the recipient, a habitual intention, i. e., one that proceeds from the inclination of the mind and routine, but without actual reflection or even with distraction, suffices.[2]

But rite may also have another meaning, viz., without simulation. Simulation is an act by which one utters the form required over valid matter, but directly excludes the intention of effecting a Sacrament. This is strictly prohibited, and the contrary proposition, "Grave and urgent fear is a reason for simulating the Sacraments," has been formally condemned.[3] Entirely different from

2 Cfr. Devoti, Institut. Can., 1874, Vol. I, p. 319 f.; Lehmkuhl, Theol. Moralis II, n. 22; Marc, Institut. Morales Alphonsianae, II, 1412 ff.

3 Prop. dam. ab Innoc. XI, March 4, 1679, n. 29 (Denzinger, Enchiridion, n. 1046).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fictitious or feigned administration is dissimulation, i. e., the act of pretending to administer the Sacraments, which is rather a concealed refusal, and is not only licit, but at times may be necessary.[4]

On the care and reverence with which the Sacraments must be treated, we shall say what is necessary when dealing with the single Sacraments. The same holds good concerning juridically worthy reception. It must be remembered that we write on law.

§ 2 of our canon forbids the administration of the Sacraments to heretics and schismatics, even though they may be in good faith and ask for them. It is necessary that they first renounce their errors and become reconciled to the Church.

The penitential canons were rather strict on this subject.[5] Somewhat milder was the later theory as to those who relapsed into heresy and then repented; these were not to be denied penance and the Eucharist.[6]

The rules to be followed are these:

(a) Before the age of fourteen, heretics and schismatics must pronounce the profession of faith, but need not formally abjure heresy, provided, of course, they are sufficiently instructed in the Catholic faith. After that age, the profession of faith must be accompanied by abjuration of heresy or schism, otherwise they cannot be admitted to the Sacraments.[7]

(b) It is never permitted to absolve heretics or schismatics, even though they may never have thought of heresy or schism and profess to believe in only one Christian religion, in which they are ready to live and

4 Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 44 f.

5 C. 91, C. 24, q. 1, dictates one year of penance, if administered nescienter; ten, or seven, or five years if administered scienter.

6 C. 4, 6°, V, 2.

7 S. O., March 8, 1892 (Coll. P. F., n. 2012).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

die.[8] Such are merely material non-Catholics, but they cannot be absolved before making formal abjuration, if they have completed the fourteenth year of age.

(c) Such material heretics or schismatics may not be admitted to the Holy Eucharist, and no Catholic priest can absolve them or permit them to receive the Holy Eucharist in a schismatical temple.[9]

(d) Even in danger of death neither absolution nor the holy Viaticum can be administered to material heretics or schismatics, for instance, in a hospital, unless there is a solid presumption that they are members of the Catholic Church, or if they showed signs of willingness to be reconciled, but always under condition that the danger of scandal be removed.[10]

Of apostate Catholics it is required that they abjure their apostasy, and if they survive, they must make a written abjuration before the faithful, or at least permit the confessor to make their abjuration known to the faithful.[11]

(e) If persons who mix up with the faithful in church (soldiers, etc.) are suspected of heresy or schism, the Sacraments may be administered unto them only after they have given proof that they never had fallen away from the faith, or after formal abjuration.[12]

THE THREE SACRAMENTS WHICH CANNOT BE REPEATED

CAN. 732

§ 1. Sacramenta baptismi, confirmationis et ordinis, quae characterem imprimunt, iterari nequeunt.

8 Ibid.

9 S. O., Aug. 28, 1669 (Coll., n. 185).

10 S. O., Jan. 13, 1864 (Coll., n. 1246).

11 S. O., July 25, 1630; May 7, 1822 (Coll., nn. 57, 771).

12 S. O., July 30, 1806 (Coll., n. 688).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si vero prudens dubium exsistat num revera vel num valide collata fuerint, sub conditione iterum conferantur.

The Sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders, which imprint a character, cannot be received twice — i. e., absolutely; — but if a prudent doubt exists whether they were in fact, or whether they were validly conferred, they may be repeated.

The general rule is that if the matter and form required for these three sacraments have been properly applied by the respective minister, they are supposed and presumed to have been conferred validly.

As to the intention of the minister, all that is necessary is that he intends to do what the Church does, no matter what he may personally think or believe about the Sacraments,[13] and that he connects matter and form in such a way that the form may be referred to the matter and both constitute a specific act.

With regard to Baptism it is the rule, always insisted upon by the Roman Congregation, that each single case must be investigated when Baptism is to be conferred at all, or conditionally.[14] If there is no doubt that Baptism was never conferred, the Sacrament must be administered absolutely with the usual form: "Ego te baptizo," etc. If the validity of a Baptism administered by non-Catholics is doubtful, the same rule must be followed. The rituals of the resp. sect should be examined and their customs observed, as stated under mixed marriages. Note that conditional Baptism is 13 Cfr. Decretum pro Armenis; S. C. P. F., June 23, 1830; S. O., Jan. 30, 1833 (Coll. P. F., nn. 814, 830). The schismatic minister in this case, out of hatred for the Catholic Church, had no intention to baptize the children of Catholic parents, yet did everything correctly according to his own rite.

14 S. O., Nov. 20, 1878 (Coll., n. 1504).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

more easily admissible if no marriage is involved. For here the rule baptismus est validus in ordine ad matrimonium does not hold good. Therefore the golden mean must be observed: not too lenient and not too strict.[15] As to the testimonies in favor of the fact or validity of Baptism, see can. 779.

Indiscriminate rebaptizing of non-Catholics is not founded on the law,[16] though it may perhaps be called a safe theory, especially in our country, where there are so many sects which have discarded the doctrine that Baptism is necessary for salvation. But this holds good only in cases where no marriage is involved.

It is noteworthy that our Code has no ruling as to irregularity being incurred by rebaptizing. Hence this irregularity may now be regarded as abolished.

Concerning Confirmation there is not so much necessity or temptation for useless repetition. There are some decisions on this point, which, however, all concern schismatic confirmation. This is intelligible, because most heretical sects have thrown this Sacrament overboard. The general tenor of all the decisions in casu is that persons once confirmed by schismatic priests are not to be reconfirmed, unless they intend to receive tonsure and holy orders, or if they themselves or their parents ask for it, in which case Confirmation must be administered secretly and conditionally.[17] One decision, how-

15 S. C. P. F., June 23, 1830 (Coll., n. 814).

16 The instruction just quoted mentions Calvinists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans, and apparently favors the validity of Calvinistic Baptism over that of the Anglicans and Presbyterians, who may therefore be more readily rebaptized.

17 S. O., July 5, 1853 (Coll. P. F., n. 1095). This decision enjoins bishops to inquire whence the converts hail; if from Bulgaria, Cyprus, the Maronites of Mount Lebanon, Italy or the adjoining islands, absolute Confirmation is required; if from Walachia, Moldavia, or Asia, acquiescent.— Cfr. also S. O., March 16, 1872; April 2, 1879; January 14, 1885 (Coll., nn. 1381, 1515, 1630).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ever, says that if Baptism was repeated conditionally, Confirmation should also be administered conditionally, to clergymen as well as laymen. The reason is, not that Confirmation is absolutely necessary, necessitate medii, but because the unconfirmed suffer a loss of perfection; although they would not be damned, unless perhaps by reason of contempt.[18]

As to Holy Orders, nothing need be said here, except that matter and form must be properly employed lest scruples arise and cases be proposed to the Holy Office, as we read of several.[19] The intention may be defective in the ordinandus. This happened in a certain seminarian, who had positively made up his mind not to be ordained, though he permitted the ceremonies to be performed over him. He had to be reordained privately and secretly.

RITES TO BE OBSERVED

CAN. 733

§ 1. In Sacramentis conficiendis, administrandis ac suscipiendis accurate serventur ritus et caeremoniae quae in libris ritualibus ab Ecclesia probatis praecipiuntur.

§ 2. Unusquisque autem ritum suum sequatur, salvo praescripto can. 851, § 2, 866.

In the celebration, administration, and reception of the Sacraments, the rites and ceremonies prescribed in the liturgical books approved by the Church must be accurately observed, and every one must follow his own rite, with due regard to canons 851, § 2, and 866.

18 S. O., June 20, 1866, ad Gallas, n. 40 (Coll., n. 1293).

19 S. O., Sept. 7, 1892; Jan. 14, July 6, 1898 (Coll., nn. 1811, 1988, 2008); see can. 1007.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Conficere sacramentum means to effect or produce a Sacrament, to cause it to exist. As Christ our Lord is the efficient cause of the Sacraments, the word here signifies to produce a sacrament instrumentally, and is applied in its proper sense to the Holy Eucharist alone, because all the other Sacraments are effected or produced when administered. What reception means requires no explanation.[20]

Rites are the prayers which must be observed in the celebration of Mass and the administration of the Sacraments, or the formulas to be used according to the prescribed rule. Ceremonies are the gestures, acts, or bodily movements and signs which accompany the prescribed prayers, or the things over or with which the words are pronounced, such as blessings, lights, incense, vestments, and so forth.

The rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Church must be so observed that nothing is taken, or omitted from, or added to them. For they were introduced into the Church in order that the external worship of God might be performed with due reverence, that the sublime mysteries should appear more venerable, and that the faithful might be edified and their devotion enhanced.[21] This, however, does not mean that common sense or lawful custom [22] must be set aside. All that is necessary is that the essentials be strictly observed. On the other hand, uniformity of ceremonies — also among Regulars — is certainly an edifying spectacle. This is easily brought 20 Trid., sess. 212, de missae sacrif., c. 5; S. C. P. F., June 30, 1830 (Coll., n. 817); Van der Stappen, Sacra Liturgia, 1898, t. 1, p. 3.

21 S. C. P. F., June 30, 1830 (l. c.).

22 Thus the S. Rit. C., Sept. 26, 1868 (Dec. Auth., n. 3185) permitted a stole to be worn while preaching, if "custom permits." Sometimes futile doubts are proposed, especially to the S. Rit. C., whence the famous answer that the S. Congregation was not established for the purpose of fostering scruples.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

about if all use and follow the liturgical books approved by the Church. These books, for the Latin Rite, are: (1) the Missal, which contains the rubrics for the proper celebration of Holy Mass; (2) the Roman Ritual, which contains the rites and prayers to be observed in the administration of the Sacraments and at other ecclesiastical functions; and (3) the Roman Pontifical, which contains the rites and prayers for episcopal functions. To the Latin Rite also belong the Ambrosian Liturgy, which is observed in some churches of the archdiocese of Milan, and the Mozarabic Liturgy, now observed only in one chapel of the Metropolitan Church of Toledo.[28]

§ 2 of canon 733 enacts that each one must follow his own rite. That the Roman Pontiffs were anxious to preserve the various rites is evident from the variety of Oriental liturgies. A variety of rites is not incompatible with unity of faith, nay it sheds new lustre and majesty upon the Church and proves her readiness to admit reasonable customs. The main Oriental Liturgies are:

(1) The Greek, based on the so-called liturgies of SS. Basil and John Chrysostom. It has two branches: the pure Greek, used at Athens and Constantinople and by Italian Greeks; the Greek Rumenian, the Greek Ruthenian, the Greek Bulgarian, and the Melchite, which latter is employed by the Patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans.

(2) The Syrian, which is the Syrian translation of the Antiochene and is used by the Syrian Patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans, by the Syro-Chaldæan Patriarch of Babylon and his suffragans, by the Syro-Maronite Patriarch of Antioch, and the adherents of the Malabar or Syro-Sorian Rite.

28 Van der Stappen, l. c., p. 20 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(3) The Armenian, chiefly borrowed from the Greek and in use among the Armenians of Cilicia, Alexandria, Artum in Russia, and Lemberg in Galicia.

(4) The Coptic, which is in vogue in Egypt (Coptic-Egyptian) and Abyssinia (Coptic-Ethiopian).[24]

Some decisions may here find a place. If children of both rites are to be baptized in the same church, the Greek priest may validly baptize his subjects with water blessed according to the Greek rite, nor is he to be molested if he does not use water blessed according to the Latin rite. But the Ordinaries should see to it that baptismal water is kept in all churches blessed according to the Latin rite, and the Latin priests must use this water when baptizing their subjects, except in case of necessity.[25]

An Armenian or a Maronite priest may distribute Holy Communion which has been consecrated in unleavened bread, but he must use the language and ceremonies of his own (Armenian or Maronite) rite.[26] (Cfr. also can. 866.)

Priests of the Oriental Rite must make use of their own formulas and language in absolving faithful of the Latin Rite.[27]

THE HOLY OILS

CAN. 734

§ 1. Sacra olea quae quibusdam Sacramentis administrandis inserviunt, debent esse ab Episcopo benedicta feria V in Coena Domini proxime superiore; neque adhibeantur vetera, nisi necessitas urgeat.

24 Van der Stappen, l. c., I, 18 f.

25 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § II, n. VI.

26 S. C. P. F., April 30, 1866 (Coll., n. 1288); cfr. can. 851, § 2.

27 S. O., Sept. 6, 1865 (Coll., n. 1275). The form of the Greek Rite is either the subjunctive or the optative (forma deprecatoria), but never the indicative mood.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 2. Mox deficienti oleo benedicto aliud oleum de olivis non benedictum adiiciatur, etiam iterato, minore tamen copia.

CAN. 735

Parochus olea sacra a suo Ordinario petere debet et in ecclesia in tuta ac decenti custodia sub clavi diligenter asservare; nec ea domi retineat, nisi propter necessitatem aliamve rationabilem causam, accedente Ordinarii licentia.

The Holy Oils to be used in the administration of the Sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, Extreme Unction, and Holy Orders, must be blessed by the bishop on Holy Thursday of each year, and old ones may not be used except in case of urgent necessity. Should the blessed oil be about to give out, other olive oil that is not blessed may be added, even repeatedly, but in smaller quantities than the holy oil.

Each pastor must ask his Ordinary for the holy oils and keep them in a safe and becoming place under lock and key in church. He may not keep them in his house except in case of necessity, or for some other plausible reason, and only by special consent of the Ordinary.

The custom of renewing the holy oils and chrism is ancient, even if we prescind from the spurious document which Gratian[28] (or rather Pseudo-Isidore) ascribes to Pope Fabian (236–250). The text of our canon is taken from the Roman Pontifical and Ritual. Cases in which the use of old oils is permitted, according to Benedict XIV, are: if there be no Catholic bishop near at hand, because priests are not allowed to receive the holy oils from a schismatic bishop; if the distance be so great [28] C. 18, Dist. 3, de cons.; cfr. c. 12, X, III, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the oils can not arrive in time; or if there be any other impediment.[29] As to distance, one decision declares that a month's waiting would be sufficient.[30] This may happen in turbulent times, or when a serious strike interrupts communication. In future no special indult[31] is required for using the old oils if the case of necessity is verified. The law itself grants the right.

The renewal of the holy oils must be understood of the blessing, not of the oils themselves, as if the oils would have to be of the same year in which the blessing is given. It is the mystery that is to be renewed, not the oil.[32] Should it happen that a priest has not received the holy oils and must administer Baptism, he may use the old oils; he must not omit the anointment in order to supply that ceremony later with the oils recently received.[33]

§ 2 of can. 734 is plain enough. The addition of unblessed olive oil is permitted only in case of necessity. It is not permitted to bless part of the oil on Holy Thursday and mix this with unblessed oil immediately after.[34] The mixture should not exceed the proportion of 3:2, i. e., only one-third of common olive oil may be added.

Can. 735 rules that the pastors must obtain the Holy Oils from their own Ordinary. This is an acknowledgment of the Ordinary's jurisdiction and their own dependence and shows the organization of the diocese. The old canons[35] already insisted upon this rule. Benedict XIV enjoined the Greek priests to receive the Holy 29 "Anno vertente," June 19, 1750, § 5.

30 S. C. P. F., July 5, 1841 (Coll., n. 924).

31 S. C. P. F., Sept. 27, 1835 (Coll., n. 840) mentions an indult.

32 S. C. P. F., Aug. 13, 1669 (Coll., n. 183); S. Rit. C., March 22, 1862, ad V (Dec. Auth., n. 3114).

33 S. Rit. C., Sept. 23, 1837 (Dec. Auth., n. 2773).

34 S. Rit. C., Dec. 7, 1844 (Dec. Auth., n. 2882).

35 C. 122, Dist. 4, de cons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Oils from their own, not from a schismatic, bishop, or from the Latin Ordinary under whose jurisdiction they are placed.[36]

As to the keeping of the Holy Oils, in our country the custom of keeping them in the rectory is rather widespread. It is safe to assert, however, that the S. Cong. of Rites would not approve of this custom, except where there are special reasons for it. Such a reason would be great distance between church and parsonage.[37] But the mere fact that the church is separated from the rectory has never been acknowledged as a sufficient reason.[38] The custom, however, is not formally reprobated in our text. If the Holy Oils are kept in the house, it goes without saying that a decent and becoming place must be set aside for the purpose.[39]

NO UNLAWFUL EXACTIONS PERMITTED

CAN. 736

Pro administratione Sacramentorum minister nihil quavis de causa vel occasione sive directe sive indirecte exigat aut petat, praeter oblationes de quibus in can. 1507, § 1.

What is here stated must be taken in the light of what has been said concerning simony, and be compared with can. 1507, § 1, which provides that the stole fees should be regulated by a provincial council or meeting of the bishops, whose enactments are to be submitted to the Holy See. Besides the fees thus established, says the present canon, the minister of a Sacrament is not allowed 36 "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § IV.

37 S. Rit. C., Dec. 16, 1826 (Dec. Auth., n. 2650).

38 S. Rit. C., June 23, 1892 (Dec. Auth., n. 3779) and passim.

39 S. Rit. C., Dec. 16, 1826 (Dec. Auth., n. 2650).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to charge or demand anything, for whatever motive or on whatsoever occasion, either directly by exaction, or indirectly by insinuation, for the administration of a Sacrament.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE I

BAPTISM

CAN. 737

§ 1. Baptismus, Sacramentorum ianua ac fundamentum, omnibus in re vel saltem in voto necessarius ad salutem, valide non confertur, nisi per ablutionem aquae verae et naturalis cum praescripta verborum forma.

§ 2. Cum ministratur servatis omnibus ritibus et caeremoniis quae in ritualibus libris praecipiuntur, appellatur sollemnis; secus, non sollemnis seu privatus.

Baptism is called the gate to, and the foundation of, the other Sacraments, because without it no other Sacrament can be validly received. The Church has ever taught that Baptism is absolutely necessary for salvation, — either really or by desire [1] — and that consequently no other sacrament can be validly received without it. Thus ordination would be invalid and imprint no indelible character if the ordinandus had not been baptized.[2] This necessity of Baptism is called necessitas medii, necessity of means, because without it salvation cannot be obtained. The reason for this absolute necessity [3] lies in the words of Our Lord, John III, 5. Either in re or in voto signifies that the baptismus fluminis or flaminis or sanguinis is sufficient.

1 C. 3, C. 15, q. 1; cfr. Dist. 4, de cons.

2 Cc. 1, 3, X, III, 43.

3 "Lamentabili," July 4, 1907, prop. damn., n. 42.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Baptism is validly conferred, the text further says, by ablution with true and natural water combined with the prescribed form of words. Here matter and form are clearly stated. The matter is true and natural water.[4] Water is true if no doubt exists as to its aqueous quality. A very thin liquor, the sap of trees, water made of rose leaves, etc., would be dubious. Natural water is that taken from wells, cisterns, ponds, rivers, or gained from ice, snow, drizzle, also mineral water.[5] Water mixed with ingredients that change its nature cannot be validly used.[6] A mixture of one part of chloride of mercury with two parts of natural water may be validly, and, in case of necessity, especially to spare a mother pains, licitly employed.[7]

The water must be applied in the form of an ablution, which is called the proximate matter. This is done either by pouring the water over the head or forehead of the one to be baptized, or by immersing him in the water (pond or river), or by sprinkling (aspersio) his head. In the Catholic Church pouring (infusio) is more common, at least in our country, although immersion and aspersion, too, are perfectly legitimate.[8] The water must touch the skin, not the hair only, of the head. If the head cannot be reached, some other principal part of the body,— chest, neck, hand or arm,— must be touched. In case of extreme necessity a wet sponge or rag may be used.[9]

The essential thing in the application of the matter is 4 Decretum pro Armen. (Denzinger, n. 591); Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 1, n. 3.

5 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 58 f.

6 S. O., Nov. 8, 1770; July 9, 1779 (Coll., nn. 480, 536).

7 S. O., Aug. 21, 1901 (Coll., n. 2121).

8 Rit. Rom., l. c. n. 10.

9 S. O., Nov. 8, 1770; July 9, 1779 (Coll., nn. 480, 536); to apply the water in the form of a drink renders baptism invalid; ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the ablution is verified and signified. This may be done with a greater or lesser quantity of water, though one drop could hardly be said to express ablution.

The form of baptism is: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." These words must be pronounced simultaneously with the application of the water, without repetition or mutilation,[10] in the present tense indicative, though the imperative form is also valid; for instance, "Baptizetur," or "Baptizare talis," or "Baptizet manus mea in nomine," etc. But to use the perfect tense in order to signify a present action ("Baptizatus est talis") would render the ceremony invalid, unless the minister would not be aware of using the wrong tense, or if the language of the respective nation would permit the use of the perfect tense to signify a present action.[11] Mere slips of the tongue do not render the formula invalid. The forms: "I will administer unto thee the sacrament of baptism of sins in the name, etc.," [12] has been declared invalid. Also the form: "Ego te lavo nomine Patris, et Primogeniti, et Spiritus Sancti." The form: "Ego te lavo in nomine Patris, et Filii et Spiritus Sancti," [13] on the contrary, is valid, as is also the form which substitutes for "Spiritus Sancti," "Spiritus boni" or "sacri." [14]

§ 2 defines solemn and private or non-solemn Baptism. The former is administered with all the rites and ceremonies prescribed in the liturgical books. Where these are not employed, the Baptism is called private. The essential form remains the same, but there is a difference

10 Prop. dam. ab Alex. VIII, Dec. 7, 1690, n. 27 (Denz., n. 1184).

11 S. O., Sept. 8, 1633; S. C. P. F., March 27, 1631 (Coll., nn. 74, 68).

12 S. O., June 23, 1840 (Coll., n. 901).

13 S. O., Feb. 17, 1897 (Coll., n. 1959).

14 S. O., April 30, 1904 (Coll., n. 2191); for Japanese forms, see Coll., n. 1323.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the matter, in as much as for solemn baptism water especially blessed either on Holy Saturday or the Saturday preceding Whitsunday must be used.

Note that if a baptismal font can be kept neither in church nor in a private house, and no baptismal water can be gotten, natural water must be used rather than holy water.[15] Should the baptismal water have become putrid, natural (not holy) water should be used, although Baptism conferred with putrid water would be valid.[16]

[15] S. O., April 6, 1741; S. C. P. F., April 17, 1758 (Coll., nn. 325, 411).

[16] S. O., April 17, 1839 (Coll., n. 885).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE MINISTER OF BAPTISM

THE ORDINARY MINISTER

CAN. 738

§ 1. Minister ordinarius baptismi sollemnis est sacerdos; sed eius collatio reservatur parocho vel alii sacerdoti de eiusdem parochi vel Ordinarii loci licentia, quae in casu necessitatis legitime praesumitur.

§ 2. Etiam peregrinus a parocho proprio in sua paroecia sollemniter baptizetur, si id facile et sine mora fieri potest; secus peregrinum quilibet parochus in suo territorio potest sollemniter baptizare.

CAN. 739

In alieno territorio nemini licet, sine debita licentia, baptismum sollemnem conferre ne sui quidem loci incolis.

CAN. 740

Ubi paroeciae aut quasi-paroeciae nondum sunt constitutae, statutorum peculiarium et receptarum consuetudinum ratio habenda est, ut constet cuinam sacerdoti, praeter Ordinarium, in universo territorio vel in eius parte ius insit baptizandi.

These three canons treat of the ordinary minister of the Sacrament of Baptism. He is, can. 738 says, the priest, with regard to solemn Baptism. The reason is that by virtue of ordination the priest has received the power to confer this Sacrament.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

But, continues the text, the right of baptizing is reserved to the pastor or another priest commissioned either by him or by the local Ordinary. In a case where the canons of a cathedral church had obtained from their Ordinary permission to baptize, the custom was declared legitimate, provided the stole fees were turned over to the Archpriest.[1] The Vicar-General may baptize without the consent of his Ordinary, provided the latter has not limited that power.[2] The Roman Congregations have insisted that Ordinaries should but rarely and only for urgent reasons give permission to priests who are not pastors to baptize,[3] because this is a strictly parochial right. Yet our canon says that in case of necessity permission may be lawfully presumed. A case of necessity — not convenience or friendship or relationship — would exist if a child were ill, if the priest visited a mission only at long intervals, if the distance from the parish house amounted to several miles, etc. But attention must be drawn to can. 463, § 3, concerning the duty of refunding the stole fee.

§ 2 concerns the case of peregrini, i. e., persons who reside outside their own domicile or quasi-domicile, without, however, having given it up.[4] Such a person should be solemnly baptized by his own pastor in his own parish, if it can be easily and conveniently done; if not, any other pastor may solemnly baptize such a peregrinus in his own parochial district. If the peregrinus is a baby,

1 S. Rit. C., May 9, 1606 (Dec. Auth., n. 213).

2 S. Rit. C., April 16, 1639 (Dec. Auth., n. 672).

3 S. C. C., Sept. 27, 1687; Feb. 21, 1888; S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 21, 1580; Dec. 14, 1604.

4 Can. 91.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the domicile or quasi-domicile of the father, or in case of an illegitimate or a posthumous child, that of the mother is decisive.[5] Hence a child born outside the parish in which his father or mother have their domicile or quasi-domicile, should be brought to the pastor of the father's or mother's parish, but only in case it can be done easily and without delay. Easily may be taken to mean without expense or conveniently. A distance of three leagues, or about thirteen miles, some[6] say, would excuse. However, now-a-days an automobile may easily be had, and travels smoothly, at least over good roads. The physical condition of the child, too, must be considered. Sine mora, without delay, must be understood according to can. 770, which says: quam primum, as soon as possible.

Can. 739 rules that neither the pastor nor another priest may solemnly baptize, even his own parishioners or subjects, in a district not his own, unless he has obtained proper permission. To do so would be setting aside all local organization. Of course the Ordinary and his vicar general may baptize anywhere in the diocese, but if he wishes to baptize one living outside his diocese, he needs the permission of the respective local Ordinary. This permission is required also when one of his diocesan subjects gives birth to a child in another diocese. The same rule applies to pastors and other priests who, when outside their own district, are asked to baptize one belonging to that district by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile.

Can. 740 provides for parishes or quasi-parishes not yet established. In such cases special statutes and prevailing customs must be observed, in order to make sure which priest, besides the Ordinary, is entitled to baptize either in the whole territory or in a particular district

[5] Can. 90, § 1.

[6] Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 66.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

thereof. We could find no diocesan regulations[7] on this head by either the Baltimore Councils or any other American council or synod. The text is plain enough, alluding as it does to can. 216 on the establishment of regular parishes or quasi-parishes; where there are no diocesan statutes regulating the matter, custom must be followed, and the custom is that the sacerdos excurrens baptizes the children of his station or mission and is entitled to the fees.

But what about linguistically distinguished parishes? If the children belong to parents who are members of a, say German or Italian parish, there is no doubt as to the right of the pastor of that parish to baptize them. But there are doubtful cases, such as this: A couple moves into a parish, and before they have decided what parish to join, a baby is born to them. The Italian pastor is asked to baptize the child, because the mother is an Italian and would rather belong to the Italian congregation, whereas the father, though also of Italian descent, cares for no parish at all. In that case, we believe, the Italian pastor would be entitled to baptize the child and keep the fee. The pastor of the English speaking congregation could not claim the mother, nor could he insist upon territorial rights, because we suppose that the Italian parish lies within the limits of the English speaking congregation. But suppose an Italian mother comes to the pastor of a German speaking congregation, which is within the boundaries of an English speaking congregation, and begs the German pastor to baptize her child, either because he speaks Italian or is personally known to the family. Is the German pastor bound to refuse her request? We hardly think so, because, by reason of the 7 At least the Collectio Lacensis, which we perused, seems to contain no such regulations.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

territory or parochial district, he may claim as much right as the English pastor, and as far as pastoral rights go, he is as much entitled to perform the ceremony as the English pastor. However, if an Italian congregation is near, the English as well as the German pastor should tell the woman to go to the Italian pastor.

What about a convert who has been instructed by the pastor of a German congregation? He is an American of other than German ancestry, while his wife belongs to the German nationality. Or perhaps he is not yet married. In both cases we believe that, in justice, the pastor who instructed the convert is also entitled to baptize him, no matter whether he has a wife of German descent or is unmarried, because the pastor of the English speaking congregation cannot claim anyone as his subject before Baptism. This we say conditionally, i. e., provided there are no diocesan regulations or lawful customs to the contrary.

EXTRAORDINARY MINISTERS

CAN. 741

Extraordinarius baptismi sollemnis minister est diaconus; qui tamen sua potestate ne utatur sine loci Ordinarii vel parochi licentia, iusta de causa concedenda, quae, ubi necessitas urgeat, legitime praesumitur.

CAN. 742

§ 1. Baptismus non sollemnis, de quo in can. 759, § 1, potest a quovis ministrari, servata debita materia, forma et intentione; quatenus vero fieri potest, adhibeantur duo testes, vel saltem unus, quibus baptismi collatio probari possit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si tamen adsit sacerdos, diacono praeferatur, diaconus subdiacono, clericus laico et vir feminae, nisi pudoris gratia deceat feminam potius quam virum baptizare, vel nisi femina noverit melius formam et modum baptizandi.

§ 3. Patri aut matri suam prolem baptizare non licet, praeterquam in mortis periculo, quando alius praesto non est, qui baptizet.

The deacon is the extraordinary minister of solemn baptism, but he should not use this power without the permission of the local Ordinary or pastor, to be granted for a just reason; in case of necessity this permission may be lawfully presumed.

Hence a deacon, by virtue of his ordination,[8] may employ all the ceremonies and rites prescribed for the administration of Baptism by the Roman Ritual. However, as ecclesiastical legislation[9] has reserved this right to the pastor, the deacon is not the ordinary minister of the Sacrament of Baptism, but needs the permission of the Ordinary in whose diocese, or of the pastor in whose parish, he wishes to baptize. In case of necessity this permission need not be asked for. A case in point occurs in the Decree of Gratian,[10] where the "necessity" arose through absence of, or long distance from, the bishop or priest. The reasons mentioned in can. 738 would also be sufficient.

Can. 742, § 1, rules that, in case of danger of death, private baptism may be administered by anyone, provided he or she uses the proper matter and form and has the 8 Pontif. Rom., "De ordinatione diaconi:" "Oportet ergo diaconum . . . baptizare," with a reference to Acts VIII, 12.

9 C. 13, Dist. 93; c. 19, Dist. 4, de cons.

10 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

right intention. Wherever possible, two witnesses should be called, or at least one, to testify to the act.

The first part of this paragraph embodies an article of faith,[11] and consequently binds the Greek as well as the Latin Church.[12]

The rite to be observed in administering Baptism privately consists in pouring natural water (not blessed) over the head of the subject, simultaneously pronouncing the words: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The intention must be to "do what the Church does," no matter what one may believe about the Church. A superstitious intent or purpose does not necessarily exclude the right intention.[13] In the way described anyone may baptize, but only in case of necessity, or danger of death, as can. 759, § 1, explains. The phrase "danger of death" may be taken in a pretty wide sense, for several decisions of the Roman Court have approved the custom of baptizing privately if the missionary is absent for more than eight days,[14] or if there is danger that a baby may be smothered because placed in the same bed with his parents.[15]

§ 2 determines the order of precedence to be followed according to the Roman Ritual.[16] If a priest is present, he should be preferred to a deacon; a deacon to a subdeacon; a clergyman to a layman; a man to a woman (unless decency would demand preference for the woman or unless the woman knows the form and manner of baptizing better than the man).

11 Trid., Sess. 7, can. 4, de bapt.

12 Benedict XIV, "Nuper ad nos," March 16, 1743, § 6: Forma professionis Maronitis praescripta.

13 S. O., Sept. 19, 1671 (Coll. P. F., n. 201). A mother was told by another woman to baptize her child in order to avoid future pregnancy.

14 S. C. P. F., Jan. 16, 1804; Sept. 11, 1841 (Coll., nn. 674, 939).

15 S. C. P. F., Jan. 21, 1788 (Coll., n. 593).

16 Tit. II, c. 1, n. 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A suspended or interdicted priest may never baptize solemnly, but only privately.[17] But since the question here turns about private baptism, even a suspended priest would have to be preferred to a deacon, etc. Schismatic monks may privately baptize only when there is no Catholic person at hand.[18]

§ 3 provides that father or mother are not allowed to baptize their own child except there be case of danger of death and no one else is at hand who could baptize (qui baptizet), i. e., who is capable and willing to baptize. Incapable would be, e. g., a bigotted Baptist who does not believe in infant baptism and, moreover, flatly refuses to perform the ceremony.

Can. 743

Curet parochus ut fideles, praesertim obstetrices, medici et chirurgi, rectum baptizandi modum pro casu necessitatis probe ediscant.

The pastor shall take care that the faithful, especially midwives, physicians, and surgeons, are thoroughly instructed in the manner of administering Baptism in cases of emergency.[19] For this purpose some special lectures would be helpful. The subject may also be mentioned at retreats.

BAPTISM OF ADULTS

Can. 744

Adultorum baptismus, ubi commode fieri possit, ad loci Ordinarium deferatur, ut, si voluerit, ab eo vel ab eius delegato sollemnius conferatur.

17 S. C. P. F., Jan. 21, 1789 (Coll., n. 598).

18 S. O., Aug. 20, 1671 (Coll., n. 198).

19 S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1841 (Coll., n. 939): especially intelligent laymen and catechists.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

When adults are to be baptized, the local Ordinary should be notified, if it can be done conveniently, in order that, if he so desires, he himself or a priest delegated by him may administer the Sacrament more solemnly. No strict obligation can be read into this canon, as is evident from the term deferatur as well as from the subjunctive form employed.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE SUBJECT OF BAPTISM

CAN. 745

§ 1. Subiectum capax baptismi est omnis et solus homo viator, nondum baptizatus.

§ 2. Cum agitur de baptismo:

1.° Parvulorum seu infantium nomine veniunt, ad normam can. 88, § 3, qui nondum rationis usum adepti sunt, eisdemque accensentur amentes ab infantia, in quavis aetate constituti;

2.° Adulti autem censentur, qui rationis usu fruuntur, idque satis est ut suo quisque animi motu baptismum petat et ad illum admittatur.

Three conditions are required for the valid reception of Baptism: the subject must be a human being living and in the wayfaring state, and not previously baptized (nondum baptizatus). If these three conditions are verified, it matters nothing whether the subject be male or female, white, black or red, young or old, rich or poor, high or low (omnis homo). The reason is the absolute necessity of Baptism for wiping away original sin.[1] The limitation expressed in "solus" is based upon the same doctrine, but has a wider scope, inasmuch as there may be a doubt concerning deformed or doubtful human creatures, as will be seen in the following.

1 C. 3, Majores, X, III, 42; Trid., sess. 5, can. 3, de peccato orig.; sess. 7, can. 12 f., de baptismo.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 2 of can. 745 says that with regard to Baptism, parvuli or infantes (infants) are those who have not yet attained the use of reason,[2] and also those who have been insane from infancy, of whatsoever age they may be; whereas the term adulti (adults) comprises all who enjoy the use of reason; which qualification is sufficient to enable them to ask for Baptism of their own accord and to be admitted to it. Infancy, as a rule, is completed after the seventh year has been reached.[3] However this age limit must not be urged with regard to Baptism. It is no more than a guiding norm which permits presuming the use of reason. If this is attained earlier the child may be baptized even against the will of his parents.[4] If, on the other hand, the use of reason has not been attained after the seventh year, the subject must be treated as an infant. Generally speaking, however, the use of reason may be presumed after the seventh year unless certain signs point to its absence or there is at least room for a solid doubt.

On the same level with infants are those who have been insane from infancy (see canon 754). Medical authorities[5] say that insanity is a common condition, but it has not been satisfactorily defined. It supposes an appreciable unsoundness of the will, memory, and understanding, or of any one or two of these faculties. Where shall the line be drawn between the weak but responsible will and the insane will? What degree of opacity between intellect and cosmos separates the ignorant man from the lunatic? The extremes of both sanity and insanity are readily recognizable, but the intermediate de-

2 Can. 88, § 3.

3 S. O. Sept. 3, 1877; S. C. P. F., March 3, 1703 (Coll., nn. 1480, 255).

4 Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, n. 32.

5 Cfr. O'Malley-Walsh, Essays in Pastoral Medicine, 1911, pp. 106, 212 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

grees are often hard to perceive. There is no rule that may be applied to all cases; each must be diagnosed from its peculiar symptoms. The symptoms of idiopathic insanity — a phrase which medical men use to conceal their ignorance of the cause of the disease — are not readily recognizable unless looked for especially. Besides almost any form of mania is likely to recur. We are told that among a thousand cases of acute mania only one was observed in which the symptoms did not recur. These professional statements may give the priest a hint as to the treatment of such unfortunate patients. Concerning Baptism we shall see under can. 754 an Instruction of the S. C. Propaganda, which is in keeping with these statements.

Adults is here simply used to designate those who enjoy the actual and habitual use of reason, without regard to a fixed age limit. All such persons, if they ask for Baptism of their own accord, may be baptized, even against the will of their parents, because the divine does not depend on the human law.[6]

THE WAYFARING STATE

CAN. 746

§ 1. Nemo in utero matris clausus baptizetur, donec probabilis spes sit ut rite editus baptizari possit.

§ 2. Si infans caput emiserit et periculum mortis immineat, baptizetur in capite; nec postea, si vivus evaserit, est iterum sub conditione baptizandus.

§ 3. Si aliud membrum emiserit, in illo, si periculum immineat, baptizetur sub conditione; at tunc, si natus vixerit, est rursus sub conditione baptizandus.

§ 4. Si mater praegnans mortua fuerit, fetus ab iis

[6] Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," n. 32.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ad quos spectat extractus, si certo vivat, baptizetur absolute; si dubie, sub conditione.

§ 5. Fetus, in utero baptizatus, post ortum denuo sub conditione baptizari debet.

CAN. 747

Curandum ut omnes fetus abortivi, quovis tempore editi, si certo vivant, baptizentur absolute; si dubie, sub conditione.

CAN. 748

Monstra et ostenta semper baptizentur saltem sub conditione; in dubio autem unusne an plures sint homines, unus absolute baptizetur, ceteri sub conditione.

One essential condition for the administration of Baptism is that the subject be born,[7] not only conceived, i. e., an individual subsisting by itself and no longer enclosed in the womb. No one enclosed in the maternal womb can be baptized, as long as there is a probable hope that he may be properly brought forth and then baptized. The decisions referred to by Cardinal Gasparri merely state that a baby, no part of whose body has been brought forth, and which was conditionally baptized with a syringe, must be rebaptized conditionally.[8] There is no word about rite editus, but about "reserato materni uteri ostio," in which case conditional Baptism would have to be conferred.

§ 2 says that if the infant puts forth his head, he may

[7] John 3, 5: "nisi quis renatus fuerit."

[8] S. C. C., July 12, 1797, referred to by S. C. C., March 16, 1897, reads: "Servetur decretum S. C. Concilii diei 12 Julii 1794, viz: Si reserato materni uteri ostio, infans cujus corpusculi nulla pars adhuc in lucem prodivit, per siphunculum piaculari lavacro sub conditione fuerit tinctus, postquam ille natus fuerit, Baptismus erit sub conditione iterandus." (Cfr. Coll. P. F., n. 1962).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be baptized on the head, and shall not be rebaptized conditionally if he survives.

§ 3 provides that if he puts forth some other limb than the head, he may be conditionally baptized on this limb if there be danger; but in that case he must be rebaptized conditionally if he survives.

According to § 4, if a mother dies in pregnancy, the fetus, after being extracted by those who are obliged to perform that act, should be baptized absolutely if certainly alive, conditionally if there are only doubtful signs of life.

§ 5 declares that a fetus baptized in the mother's womb must be rebaptized conditionally after birth.

The last two sections call for some medico-pastoral remarks. The duration of pregnancy, from the fertilization of the ovum to full-term delivery is 280 days. This period is divided either into 10 months of twenty-eight days each — a lunar month — or into nine calendar months. During the first week the ovum remains in the Fallopian tube. Having entered the upper part of the tube and become impregnated, it slowly moves down, meanwhile beginning a process of repeated division or cleavage, known as the "segmentation of the ovum." After the sixth week the name fetus is applied to what was before called embryo, because after the sixth week the form is distinctly human. The greatest danger of miscarriage occurs at three months. In the course of the fourth month the sex can readily be distinguished. A fetus born at the termination of the sixth month may breathe feebly, but will die within a few hours.[9] When does animation take place? At the moment when the [9] Crusius, A. M., M. D., The Antikamnia Foetation and Parturition Chart; Kirke, Handbook of Physiology, 8th Am. edit., 1914, p. 747 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pronucleus of the spermatozoon fuses with the pronucleus of the ovum in the Fallopian tube and makes the segmentation nucleus, the soul of the child enters, and personality exists as absolutely as it does after birth.[10] This, as we have said above, happens during the first week of pregnancy. It may be added that the fact that a fetus does not breathe is no proof it is dead. It is not unusual for a full-term child not to breathe for an hour or longer after birth.[11] These are valuable hints for those concerned. Who are they? After the mother's death, when the Cæsarean section is not only permissible, but required in order to baptize the child or fetus, a surgeon is to be called in to perform the operation. He should not be easily believed if he asserts that the child is dead. In that case any one else who has the skill and courage to extract the fetus may be invited, provided it is not against the law.[12] Whether the fetus is certainly alive can be discovered by diagnosis in the earlier stages of pregnancy, and by breathing in the later stages, although, as stated above, non-breathing is not an absolute proof of death. At any rate, as long as putrefaction has not set in, conditional baptism is to be administered.

We have deliberately abstained from passing judgment on the vexed question of the licitness of the Cæsarian section, as § 4 of can. 746 simply takes for granted the fact of the mother's death, and therefore leaves the controversy in statu quo.[13]

Can. 747 declares that all abortive human fetuses, if certainly alive, should be baptized absolutely; if it is doubtful whether they are alive or dead, Baptism should be administered conditionally.

10 O'Malley-Walsh, l. c., p. 3.
11 Ibid., p. 11.
12 Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 75.
13 Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 9; Lehmkuhl, l. c., I, n. 844, 849; O'Malley-Walsh, l. c., p. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 748 lays down the rule concerning the treatment of monsters, i. e., misshaped human terata or products of erroneous development. Of such there are various kinds. Some of the autositic monstra show a strong resemblance to lower animals, but there is no record that could claim to be scientific of a hybrid between a human being and a lower animal. The omphalisitic single monsters are either dead when born, or die as soon as the placental circulation is cut off. The composite monsters, or species of twins, have various types according to the various combinations of the limbs: double-faced, double-headed, two-armed, etc.[14]

Such monstra, says the text, should always be baptized, at least conditionally. When there is doubt whether there are one or several persons, one must be baptized absolutely, the others conditionally.

There is no difficulty as to hermaphrodites, because sex does not affect the validity of Baptism.

CAN. 749

Infantes expositi et inventi nisi, re diligenter investigata, de eorum baptismo constet, sub conditione baptizentur.

Infants that have been abandoned and found should be baptized conditionally, unless careful research makes it evident that the Sacrament has already been administered to them. One trustworthy witness, man or woman, especially the baptized subject himself, is sufficient to give evidence of Baptism having been conferred.[15] A slip of paper appended to the neck of the child is not 14 O'Malley-Walsh, l. c., p. 69 ff.

15 S. C. C., Dec. 18, 1723; Jan. 15, 1724; Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, n. 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google sufficient proof if the writer is unknown or hidden,[16] and when there is no other evidence, conditional baptism must be administered.

CHILDREN OF INFIDELS

CAN. 750

§ 1. Infans infidelium, etiam invitis parentibus, licite baptizatur, cum in eo versatur vitae discrimine, ut prudenter praevideatur moriturus, antequam usum rationis attingat.

§ 2. Extra mortis periculum, dummodo catholicae eius educationi cautum sit, licite baptizatur:

1.° Si parentes vel tutores, aut saltem unus eorum, consentiant;

2.° Si parentes, idest pater, mater, avus, avia, vel tutores desint, aut ius in eum amiserint, vel illud exercere nullo pacto queant.

The Church has always insisted upon the necessity of Baptism and the fulfillment of the baptismal vows, which require an education that is in keeping with the principles of the Christian religion. On the other hand she wishes to uphold and recognize the natural rights of parents, and hence she does not permit Baptism to be indiscriminately administered to infants.

§ 1 of our canon repeats what Benedict XIV pointed out so clearly, that the children of infidels may be lawfully baptized against the will of their parents only when they are in danger of death. This danger must be such that there is little or no hope of their surviving to the age of discretion. Thus a nurse may baptize the dying child of Hebrew parents, a missionary acting as a physician may baptize a child in the same condition.[17] If the illness is so grave that the physician judges the child will not live, there is sufficient reason for administering Baptism. On the other hand, the Holy Office has decided that a great mortality among children,— as in China, where two-thirds die from various causes — does not warrant the administration of Baptism, unless the children can be withdrawn from parental control.[18]

[16] S. O., Jan. 5, 1724 (Coll. P. F., n. 299).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 rules that, even when there is no danger of death, children of infidels may be lawfully baptized, provided their Catholic education is guaranteed, in the following two cases:

(1) If the parents or guardians, or at least one of them, consent to the baptism; (2) If there are no parents, i. e., no father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, or guardians, or if they have forfeited the right to keep the child or are unable to exercise that right.

This rule is taken in the main from Benedict XIV's Constitution, "Postremo mense," of Feb. 20, 1747. It is based upon the favor fidei, which dictates that the supernatural right should prevail[19] over the natural. Hence if one of the parents consents, Baptism may be lawfully administered.

The same rule applies to guardians, because the parental power is supposed to devolve[20] upon them. However it is a necessary condition that the children be brought up in the Catholic religion, and that the hope of Christian education be well-founded.[21] The Holy Office decided that the children of the nomadic tribe of the Goayiros

17 S. O., July 18, 1894 (Coll. P. F., n. 1877).

18 S. O., July 6, 1898; July 22, 1840; May 4, 1853; S. C. P. F., Jan. 13, 1783 (Coll., nn. 2007, 902, 1090, 558).

19 Benedict XIV, l. c., n. 16.

20 Ibid., n. 14.

21 S. O., Feb. 13, 1867 (Coll., n. 1302).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(Colombia) might be baptized if there were any hope that they would be instructed in the Catholic religion [22] later on, or a well-founded expectation that the parents, who had expressed the desire of Baptism, would afterwards receive it.[23]

When Catholic godparents offer a child of infidel parents for Baptism, the Sacrament can be administered only if there is a solid hope that he will receive a Christian education.[24] How, if the grandparents give this promise? These are expressly mentioned under n. 2, but not under n. 1. Benedict XIV vindicated this right to the grandfather and grandmother if the parents were unwilling. But we hardly think that the legislator wishes to extend it to the grandparents when the parents are opposed to the child's Baptism, else the grandparents would be mentioned also under n. 1. N. 2 obviously supposes that there are neither parents, nor grandparents, nor guardians, or else that they have forfeited their claim to the child. This happens when children are exposed or forsaken by inhuman parents, who by such conduct lose their rights. Vagrant or rambling children should not, as a rule, be baptized without the consent of their parents.[25] The parents' right in the matter is practically lost when they are unable to claim it, e. g., on account of insanity, utter destitution [26] or imprisonment for life.

22 S. O., Sept. 6, 1899 (Coll., n. 2068).

23 S. O., Dec. 11, 1850, n. 4 (Coll., n. 1054).

24 S. O., Nov. 29, 1764 (Coll., n. 457).

25 Benedict XIV, l. c., n. 9 f.

26 S. C. P. F., April 17, 1777 (Coll., n. 522, n. VII, VIII).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHILDREN OF NON-CATHOLICS

CAN. 751

Circa baptismum infantium duorum haereticorum aut schismaticorum, aut duorum catholicorum qui in apostasiam vel haeresim vel schisma prolapsi sint, generatim serventur normae in superiore canone constitutae.

The same general rules apply to the children of heretics, schismatics, and fallen-away Catholics, on account of the danger of perversion and profanation,[27] which is almost certain if both parents are non-Catholics. Hence if parents, relatives or friends should offer for Baptism a child that belongs to heretics, schismatics or apostate Catholics, the priest must gently but firmly decline to baptize it, unless he is morally certain that it will be educated in the Catholic religion,[28] for instance, in a Catholic college or academy, or by Catholic relatives. Concerning the children of apostates the Holy Office has decided [29] that Baptism may be administered to them only if there is a well-founded hope that they will be separated from their unworthy progenitors and entrusted to Catholics, as to which probability the minister must inquire. If one of the parents is a Catholic and the other a Protestant, the Catholic party must be seriously admonished to tell the non-Catholic that Baptism was conferred and the child must be given a Catholic education.[30] When

27 S. O., Jan. 21, 1767 (Coll., n. 465): "cum manifesto profanationis periculo."

28 S. O., March 6, 1844, Americ. Sept. (Coll., n. 986); Aug. 26, 1885 (Coll., n. 1643). If the parents refuse to assume any obligation to that effect, Baptism may not be administered.

29 Jan. 28, 1637 (Coll., n. 90).

30 S. O., Nov. 29, 1672; Nov. 18, 1745 (Coll., nn. 205, 353); Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

children of non-Catholic parents are baptized at home, no ceremonies are to be used.[31]

BAPTISM OF ADULTS

CAN. 752

§ 1. Adultus, nisi sciens et volens probeque instructus, ne baptizetur; insuper admonendus ut de peccatis suis doleat.

§ 2. In mortis autem periculo, si nequeat in praecipuis fidei mysteriis diligentius instrui, satis est, ad baptismum conferendum, ut aliquo modo ostendat se eisdem assentire serioque promittat se christianae religionis mandata servaturum.

§ 3. Quod si baptismum ne petere quidem queat, sed vel antea vel in praesenti statu manifestaverit aliquo probabili modo intentionem illum suscipiendi, baptizandus est sub conditione; si deinde convaluerit et dubium de valore baptismi collati permaneat, sub conditione baptismus rursus conferatur.

Adults who are physically and mentally normal, cannot be baptized except with their own knowledge and free will and after having been duly instructed and exhorted to be sorry for their sins. This law is based upon the necessity of coöperation in the work of salvation.[32] The Popes have frequently admonished missionaries to instruct candidates before Baptism, if need be by native ministers, and not to admit anyone to this Sacrament unless he were well instructed and imbued with Christian manners.[33] This rule applies to all, including negroes and

31 S. O., Jan. 21, 1767 (Coll., n. 465).

32 Trid., sess. 6, de justif., c. 6; sess. 14, de poenit., c. 1.

33 Alexander VII, "Sacrosancti," Jan. 18, 1658; Clement IX, "In excelsa," Sept. 13, 1669; Clement XII, "Compertum," Aug. 24,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other infidels who are capable of embracing the Christian religion. No one is to be baptized or abandoned after Baptism has been administered before he knows the truths necessary for salvation.[34] Old people whose memory is failing may be baptized if they give assurance of their belief and profess it.[35] Savages and nomads may be baptized if their mode of life does not conflict with religion or morality.[36] Deaf-mutes may be baptized if they give some signs of religious knowledge.[37] Now-a-days there are adequate means of instructing these unfortunates, and conclusive methods of ascertaining a person's religious training.

Concerning the extent of this instruction, the Roman Ritual [38] demands that neophytes "be carefully instructed in the Christian faith and holy manners." By Christian faith are to be understood the principal mysteries, i. e., those which must be believed necessitate medii, viz.: the Blessed Trinity and the Incarnation. Express belief in our Lord Jesus Christ is specifically mentioned in one decision of the Holy Office.[39] The Apostles' Creed, which is enjoined in an Instruction of the S. C. Prop. Fide,[40] contains the principal mysteries of the faith. The Holy Office (l. c.) also urges instruction regarding the Holy Eucharist, unless the priest deems it better, for a prudent motive, to postpone this truth till after Baptism. Furthermore the "Our Father," the effects of Baptism, and the acts of faith, hope, and charity, are to be incul-1734; "Concredita Nobis," May 13, 1739; Benedict XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., nn. 129, 187, 347, 114).

34 S. O., March 20, 1686 (Coll., n. 230).

35 S. O., March 8, 1770, n. 2 (Coll., n. 477).

36 S. O., Sept. 18, 1850 (Coll., n. 1050).

37 S. O., Dec. 11, 1850 (Coll., n. 1054).

38 Tit. II, c. 3, n. 1.

39 S. O., May 10, 1703, ad 2; Jan. 25, 1703 (Coll., nn. 256, 254).

40 Oct. 18, 1883 (Coll., n. 1606, n. XVII).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cated, and an act of contrition, or at least attrition, is required.[41]

Concerning Christian morality the aforesaid decision of the Holy Office insists upon all the divine precepts which, according to the Instruction of the S. C. Prop. mentioned, are included in the Decalogue. The last-named Instruction also demands the teaching of the precepts of the Church.[42] This insistence may cause some embarrassment, especially in cases of polygamy. For if one has many wives, he must dismiss all but the one with whom he has contracted a valid marriage. If he married all at one time, either as wives or concubines, he must dismiss all except one, with whom he must contract anew by renewing the matrimonial consent.[43] A girl of Catholic parents who is engaged to a pagan cannot be baptized unless she is ready to break off the engagement if no dispensation can be obtained.[44] Girls not yet betrothed to pagans may, however, be baptized,[45] even though there is danger that they will marry gentiles.

§ 2 of our canon deals with the Baptism of adults in danger of death. Such as cannot be carefully instructed in the principal mysteries of the faith, may be baptized if in any shape or form they show their readiness to assent to the truths of the Catholic religion and promise to observe its precepts. A noteworthy Instruction of the Holy Office[46] says, that adults in danger of 41 S. C. P. F., ibid.; S. O., May 10, 1703, ad 5 (Coll., n. 256).

42 S. C. P. F., Oct. 18, 1883; another instruction, Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., n. 114) prescribes that they be enlightened on idol and devil worship, the cult of ancestors, the necessity of restitution, the abuse of opium, and polygamy.

43 S. O., May 10, 1703, ad 6 (Coll., n. 256).

44 S. O., June 12, 1769 (Coll., n. 472).

45 S. O., June 20, 1866, ad 10 (Coll., n. 1293). These rules must evidently be applied to concubinage and other scandalous conduct, until signs of repentance are given and a promise of reform is made.

46 S. O., Aug. 3, 1860 (Coll., n. 1198).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

death may be baptized if they have faith, repentance, and the intention of receiving the Sacrament. Faith and repentance alone are necessary for the licit administration of Baptism, whilst an (at least habitual) intention is required for its valid administration. Hence, in case of doubt as to whether a dying person is sufficiently instructed in the mysteries of the faith, or whether he has the required attrition, the Sacrament may be administered absolutely; but if there is a doubt as to the intention, Baptism must be given conditionally. Concerning doubts as to sufficient instruction, or faith, or repentance, or amendment of life, the Holy Office [47] has declared that if the priest is morally certain that the patient answers his questions only to avoid contradicting his interrogator, or to please him, Baptism may not licitly be administered even sub conditione. But if the priest is morally certain of the patient's belief and the seriousness of his repentance, Baptism must be administered absolutely. In case of prudent doubt, when no time is left for further instruction, Baptism must be given conditionally. Signs (e. g. nodding of the head) or a simple "yes" are sufficient, especially if the patient had expressed a desire of being baptized before the danger of death supervened.[48] Old people who have given up the practice of idolatry and are in danger of death may be licitly baptized, even though their defective memory will not permit of proper instruction.[49]

From this may be easily understood the rule laid down in § 3, that if an adult can no longer ask for Baptism, but has, either previously or in his present state, in some probable way expressed his intention of receiving Bap-

47 S. O., May 10, 1703, ad 1 (Coll., n. 256).

48 S. O., Sept., 1850; March 8, 1770 (Coll., nn. 1050, 477).

49 S. O., Dec. 11, 1850, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1054).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tism, the Sacrament should be administered conditionally. If he recovers and there is a doubt as to the validity of the Baptism conferred, he must be rebaptized conditionally, i. e., the minister must use some such words as: "If thou art capable, i. e., if sincerely thou wilt be baptized, I baptize thee in the name, etc."

When baptisms thus conditionally administered are to be investigated, inquiry must be made regarding the presence of the right intention, of faith, and attrition. If all three of these dispositions were wanting, Baptism must be conferred absolutely; if there is doubt, the subject must be rebaptized conditionally.[50]

DISPOSITION FOR BAPTISM

CAN. 753

§ 1. Tam sacerdotem qui adultos baptizaturus est, quam ipsos adultos qui sani sint, decet esse ieiunos.

§ 2. Nisi graves urgentesque causae obsint, adultus baptizatus statim Missae sacrificio assistat et sacram communionem percipiat.

It is becoming that a priest who baptizes an adult, as well as the adult himself, if he be in good physical condition, should be fasting.[51] This condition supposes that Baptism of adults should, if possible and convenient, be administered in the morning, as § 2 confirms when it says that, except when grave and urgent reasons excuse, the baptized adult should immediately assist at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and receive Communion.[52]

50 S. O., Aug. 3, 1860; March 30, 1898, ad 3 (Coll., nn. 1198, 1993).

51 Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 3, nn. 8, 9.

52 Ibid., tit. II, c. 4, n. 51 (Pustet's ed., 1913, p. 37): "Si hora congruens fuerit, celebratur Missa, cui neophyti intersunt, et SSm. Eucharistiam suscipiunt." But no grievous obligation can be read into either this text or the Code. Custom may dispense from the obligation here inculcated.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

BAPTISM OF INSANE PERSONS

CAN. 754

§ 1. Amentes et furiosi ne baptizentur, nisi tales a nativitate vel ante adeptum rationis usum fuerint; et tunc baptizandi sunt ut infantes.

§ 2. Si autem dilucida habeant intervalla, dum mentis compotes sunt, baptizentur, si velint.

§ 3. Baptizentur quoque, imminente periculo mortis, si, antequam insanirent, suscipiendi baptismi desiderium ostenderint.

§ 4. Qui lethargo aut phrenesi laborat, vigilans tantum et volens baptizetur; at si periculum mortis impendeat, servetur praescriptum § 3.

Insane persons and maniacs should not be baptized unless they have been so afflicted from birth or before they attained the use of reason, in which case they are to be baptized like infants.

If they have lucid intervals, they may, if they wish, be baptized in the course of one of these intervals, i. e., while they enjoy the possession of reason.

They may also be baptized when in imminent danger of death, if they have expressed a desire for Baptism before they became insane.

Amentes is a general name for every form of insanity, mild or severe, temporary or permanent. Furiosi, properly speaking, are such as are frantic or violent, while amentes may be merely suffering from melancholia. "Originally, of course, mania meant any form of madness. Then it became gradually limited to those forms of insanity which differ from melancholia. Now it has come to mean an acute attack of mental exaltation.[53] § 3

[53] O'Malley-Walsh, l. c., p. 222.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of our canon embraces all kinds of habitual madness. The insane, as St. Thomas says,[54] must be treated like infants because they are in the same state of danger. Therefore, when a physician says there is no hope of recovery, they must be baptized like children — formâ parvulorum — provided they were born in this condition or at least have suffered from the disease since their infancy,[55] i. e., in round figures, before the seventh year of age, which limit admits of presumption.

Besides amentia proper there may be distinguished different degrees of mental dullness or feebleness, which may exist in an almost normally developed body. An adult who is incapable of distinguishing between good and evil must be treated like an infant, but may be baptized only in case of danger. When he is in no danger further development should be awaited, because such persons often outgrow their mental debility. A weak-minded adult who is capable of forming moral judgments must be treated like any normal person. When there is doubt as to a person's mental condition, the priest may judge in favor of Baptism.[56]

§ 2 says that insane adults who enjoy occasional lucid intervals, may be baptized during one of these, if they so desire. When in that state of mind they are supposed to possess will-power. However, too rigid a rule should not be applied to such unfortunates on account of the freakish nature of the malady.

§ 3 needs no explanation, except the remark that the intention of receiving Baptism is supposed to have been expressed before, and not retracted after melancholia or mania set in.[57]

54 Summa Theol., III, q. 68, a. 12 (suppl.).

55 S. C. P. F., April, 1777, ad I, 1 (Coll., n. 522).

56 Ibid., n. II.

57 C. 3, X, III, 42; Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," n. 46.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4 mentions two diseases: lethargia and phrenesis. The former is the sleeping sickness prevalent around Lake Victoria, in Africa,[58] and elsewhere. It is often fatal. Phrenesis (phrenitis) is brain fever or wild delirium (frenzy). Persons suffering from these diseases may be baptized only when they are awake and desire to receive the Sacrament, except when in danger of death; then they may be baptized even when not awake, provided only that they expressed a desire for Baptism before the attack.[59]

58 It is caused by the Tsetse fly; see Scientific American Supplement, Aug. 16, 1913, p. 104 ff. A similar disease (hook-worm) has lately stirred the medical authorities in our own country.

59 C. 3, X, III, 42; Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 3, nn. 11–13.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

RITES AND CEREMONIES OF BAPTISM

CAN. 755

§ 1. Baptismus sollemniter conferatur, salvo praescripto can. 759.

§ 2. Loci Ordinarius potest gravi et rationabili de causa indulgere ut caeremoniae praescriptae pro baptismo infantium adhibeantur in baptismo adultorum.

Baptism should be solemnly administered in all cases except the one mentioned in can. 759. But the local Ordinary may, for weighty and plausible reasons, permit the ceremonies prescribed for infant Baptism to be used in the Baptism of adults.

The Popes and the Roman Congregations have always enjoined the use of solemn ceremonies in the administration of Baptism because it would betray grievous negligence to omit the ancient and imposing rites of this Sacrament without cause.[1] For weighty reasons, however, Paul III granted to the missionaries of the West Indies permission to shorten the baptismal ceremonies, e. g., because of too great fatigue or lack of time.[2] Leo XIII, in 1897, gave to the Ordinaries of Latin America the faculty of using the short or infant formula.[3] Furthermore it has been a custom, at least tolerated, in our country to use the short formula also at baptisms of

1 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, n. 19: "Ne leves sint aut inanes causae pro omittendis caeremoniis praescriptis."

2 "Altitudo," June 1, 1537.

3 "Trans Oceanum," April 18, 1897, n. VI.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

adults. Now the legislator grants the Ordinaries power by law to employ this form whenever there is a grave and solid reason. Long-standing custom may be called such a reason.[4] Ordinarily the long formula must be used in baptizing adults, i. e., all who have attained the use of reason, even if baptism is conferred at home,[5] provided there is no danger of death. A grave reason would be, as stated above, fatigue or lack of time, or great anxiety, especially on the part of scrupulous persons.

RITE

CAN. 756

§ 1. Proles ritu parentum baptizari debet.

§ 2. Si alter parentum pertineat ad ritum latinum, alter ad orientalem, proles ritu patris baptizetur, nisi aliud iure speciali cautum sit.

§ 3. Si unus tantum sit catholicus, proles huius ritu baptizanda est.

This canon merely applies can. 98 to the particular case of Baptism. Children must be baptized according to the rite of the parents, either Latin or Oriental. If one of the parents belongs to the Latin and the other to the Oriental rite, the rite of the father is decisive, unless a special law provides otherwise, but if only one of the parties is Catholic, the child must be baptized according to the rite of the Catholic party.

This, in substance, has been the Roman practice since Benedict XIV laid down with great prudence and justice

4 It would not be amiss if synodal or provincial statutes would insert this permission.

5 S. Rit. C., Jan. 17, 23, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 32, 75). The archbishop of Paris had obtained permission to baptize boy neophytes who were admitted to Catholic schools with the short formula. S. O., May 19, 1879 (Coll. P. F., n. 1520).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the rules here codified.[6] A special provision was made by S. C. Prop. Fide[7] for the ecclesiastical province of Leopolis (Lemberg). We do not know of any special provisions having been made for the United States,[8] wherefore the general law must be followed here.

BAPTISMAL WATER

CAN. 757

§ 1. In baptismo sollemni adhibenda est aqua ad hoc benedicta.

§ 2. Si aqua benedicta in baptisterio adeo sit imminuta, ut minus videatur sufficere, alia non benedicta admisceatur, etiam iterato, minore tamen copia.

§ 3. Si vero corrupta fuerit, aut effluxerit, aut quovis modo defecerit, parochus in fontem, bene mundatum ac nitidum, recentem aquam infundat ac proprio ritu in suis liturgicis libris praescripto benedicat.

§ 1. In administering solemn Baptism water especially blessed for the purpose must be used. This is the so-called baptismal water, which is blessed with special ceremonies on Holy Saturday and the Vigil of Pentecost. It should be kept in a neat and clean font, and the remainder poured into the sacrarium (waste-hole) when new water has been blessed.[9] Of course, Baptism would be valid even if other water were used.[10] Where there is danger that the baptismal font may be profaned, the baptismal water may be kept in any decent movable vessel.[11] In one case the Holy Office allowed the use of common

6 "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § II, nn. VI, VIII; "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743, § 3.

7 Oct. 6, 1863 (Coll., n. 1243).

8 S. C. P. F., April 11, 1894, ruled as per above text; the decrees on the Ruthenians offer nothing special.

9 Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 1, n. 4.

10 S. O., April 6, 1741 (Coll., n. 325).

11 S. C. P. F., Feb. 23, 1660 (Coll., n. 139).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

instead of baptismal water because the people whom the missionaries had been sent to baptize held the superstitious belief that the baptismal water was the cause of their children's death.[12]

Water for baptismal purposes must be blessed not only on Holy Saturday, but also on the Vigil of Pentecost, and the custom, no matter how inveterate, of blessing water on Holy Saturday only has been condemned as an abuse.[13]

Should it happen that the Holy Oils do not arrive in time for the blessing on Holy Saturday, they may be privately and separately poured into the blessed water when they are received.[14] If for some reason the Holy Oils can not be blessed or obtained in any year, the Holy Oils blessed the previous year may be used for the blessing of the baptismal font; in that case the baptismal water thus blessed with the old Oils should not be poured into the sacrarium when the new Oils arrive.[15] The following decision may be quoted as useful: A bishop requested that the priests of his diocese be permitted to use the Holy Oils blessed the year before, because their presence was needed in their parishes at the time when the Holy Oils were ready for delivery. The S. Congregation answered that each pastor should send a priest or cleric (if possible in sacris) to fetch the Holy Oils, and if this should prove impossible, the pastor or another priest in his name might bless the baptismal font without the Holy Oils, which should be poured into the water privately and separately afterwards. If it became nec-

12 S. O., May 14, 1851 (Coll., n. 1060).

13 S. Rit. C., Dec. 7, 1844; April 13, 1874 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2878, 3331).

14 S. Rit. C., April 12, 1755, ad 3 (Dec. Auth., n. 2436). If the new oils arrive in time, these, not the old ones, must be used; S. Rit. C., April 19, 1890 (Dec. Auth., n. 3724).

15 S. Rit. C., Sept. 23, 1837 (Dec. Auth., n. 2773); the occasion of this dubium and its answer were the troublesome times in Spain; the ruling may be applied to Mexico.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

essary meanwhile to administer Baptism, the old oils might be used for the solemn blessing of the water.[16]

§ 2. If the water in the baptismal font is so diminished that it appears to be insufficient for baptizing, ordinary water may be mixed with it again and again, but in steadily decreasing proportion.

§ 3. If the baptismal water becomes putrid (rotten) or runs out of the font, or disappears in some other way, the pastor shall cleanse the font and pour new water into it, which he shall bless with the proper rite as prescribed in the liturgical books. The formula for the blessing of baptismal water — which is permitted only in case of necessity [17]— will be found in the Roman Ritual.[18] We may add that, in case this blessing can not be performed, and no other baptismal water is available, natural water (not holy water) should be used for baptizing.[19]

METHOD OF BAPTIZING

CAN. 758

Licet baptismus conferri valide possit aut per infusionem, aut per immersionem, aut per aspersionem, primus tamen vel secundus modus, aut mixtus ex utroque, qui magis sit in usu, retineatur, secundum probatos diversarum Ecclesiarum rituales libros.

Baptism may be validly conferred by infusion, (pouring water over the head), by immersion, and by aspersion (or sprinkling). Where infusion, or immersion, or a combination of both methods is customary, the one most 16 S. Rit. C., Jan. 31, 1896 (Dec. Auth., n. 3879).

17 S. O., Jan. 30, 1765 (Coll., n. 459).

18 Rit. Rom., tit. 2, c. 7 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 59 ff).

19 S. O., April 17, 1839; June 20, 1883 (Coll., nn. 889, 1598).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google commonly used should be retained, according to the approved rituals of the different churches.

These three methods or rites of baptizing are thus "canonized" by the Church, though immersion and aspersion are more ancient than infusion, which came into use only in the thirteenth century. The Greek Church still practices immersion and aspersion, whereas in the Latin Church infusion is more common.[20] The essential feature of all three methods is that the act of ablution be duly expressed, and hence, if possible, the water should flow.[21] This symbolism, however, may also be expressed by the use of a wet sponge or rag.[22]

A very doubtful, nay invalid manner was used by a certain pastor who was accustomed to baptize children by dipping his thumb into the baptismal water and anointing (!) the forehead of the child — per modum unctionis — with the thumb. The Holy Office declared that all who had been thus baptized should be rebaptized with water and the prescribed formula, but without other ceremonies, and that the bishop should take care to ascertain who of them had been promoted to sacred orders.[23]

PRIVATE BAPTISM

CAN. 759

§ 1. In mortis periculo baptismum privatim conferre licet; et, si conferatur a ministro qui nec sacerdos sit nec diaconus, ea tantum ponantur, quae sunt ad baptismi validitatem necessaria; si a sacerdote vel dia-

20 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § II, n. II; S. O., June 14, 1741 (Coll., n. 326). Infusio should rather be called affusio or pouring on.

21 S. O., Nov. 8, 1770; July 9, 1779 (Coll., nn. 480, 536).

22 S. O. Nov. 8, 1770; S. C. P. F., Jan. 21, 1789 (Coll., nn. 480, 597).

23 S. O., Dec. 14, 1898 (Coll., n. 2028): "Sñs adprobarit."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cono, serventur quoque, si tempus adsit, caeremoniae quae baptismum sequuntur.

§ 2. Extra mortis periculum baptismum privatum loci Ordinarius permittere nequit, nisi agatur de haereticis qui in adulta aetate sub conditione baptizentur.

§ 3. Caeremoniae autem quae in baptismi collatione praetermissae quavis ratione fuerint, quamprimum in ecclesia suppleantur; nisi in casu de quo in § 2.

In danger of death Baptism may be privately administered. Two different cases are distinguished:

§ 1. If the Sacrament is conferred privately by one who is neither a priest nor a deacon, then no ceremonies or rites should be used, but only what strictly belongs to validity. In that case the person baptizing takes natural (not holy) water, pours it over the head of the one to be baptized,— whether once or three times does not matter [24]— and says: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." (2) If the person who baptizes privately, for instance, at the home of the person baptized, is a priest or a deacon, he must administer the Sacrament with the prescribed ceremonies and rites, unless there should be no time to apply all the ceremonies, or the parents would stubbornly oppose them, or the Holy Oils, chrism or salt could not conveniently be had. In these cases the priest or deacon would be permitted to omit the ceremonies.[25] Otherwise there is a grave obligation to apply them even if Baptism is conferred privately.[26]

Hence § 2 rules that, outside the case of danger of death, the Ordinary may not permit private baptism to 24 Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 2, n. 28.

25 S. C. P. F., Aug. 30, 1775; Jan. 21, 1789, ad 1 (Coll., nn. 510, 598).
26 S. O., Feb. 28, 1663; Nov. 8, 1770; Sept. 5, 1877 (Coll., nn. 151, 480, 1480).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be conferred, except on non-Catholic adults who are baptized conditionally. This explains the serious obligation spoken of in the preceding section. The text does not limit the episcopal permission to individual cases, and hence Ordinaries may impart this faculty habitually.

§ 3. The ceremonies omitted for any reason in the administration of Baptism must as soon as possible be supplied in church, except in the case mentioned in can. 759, § 2. These supplementary ceremonies must be gone through in the church or oratory, to which the infant must be brought as soon as time and occasion are favorable.[27] It is hardly necessary to add that this is a grievous obligation, from which only the reason mentioned under § 2 excuses.[28] It is becoming that the ceremonies be supplied before sacramental confession, if this should be required.[29] When it is necessary to omit anything in private Baptism, all the ceremonies preceding the act of Baptism should be left out and no anointment with the Holy Oils (O. C.) performed,[30] because all these things must be supplied according to the form prescribed in the Ritual.[31]

Can. 760

Cum baptismus sub conditione iteratur, caeremoniae, si quidem in priore baptismo omissae fuerunt, suppleantur, salvo praescripto can. 759, § 3; sin autem in priore baptismo adhibitae sunt, repeti in altero aut omitti possunt.

If Baptism is repeated sub conditione, the ceremonies

27 S. C. P. F., Aug. 30, 1775; Nov. 28, 1785 (Coll., nn. 570, 582).

28 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 19.

29 S. C. P. F., July 19, 1838 (Coll., n. 871).

30 S. Rit. C., Sept. 23, 1820 (Dec. Auth., n. 2607).

31 Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 5 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 38 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

must be supplied if they were omitted in the former Baptism, except in the case of adult non-Catholics (can. 759, § 2); but if the ceremonies were used in the first baptism, they may or may not be repeated in the second. A curious case was decided by the Holy Office.[32] In 1681 Scottish Protestants approached a priest with the request either to be rebaptized or at least to have the ceremonies repeated, because they were harassed by demons and felt relieved by conditional Baptism or the use of the customary baptismal ceremonies. The Holy Office allowed the practice, especially for non-Catholics, provided that conditional baptism was not administered for futile reasons. Concerning parvuli or infants of non-Catholics who are to be rebaptized conditionally, the Holy Office informed[33] the Bishop of Nottingham that such conditional baptism in casu should be administered secretly, but with the ceremonies prescribed in the Ritual.

As to adults, can. 759 § 2, says the ceremonies may be omitted or applied ad libitum. If applied, the ceremonies prescribed pro adultorum baptisma must be used,[34] unless, of course, where can. 755, § 2, may be made use of.

CHRISTIAN NAMES

CAN. 761

Curent parochi ut ei qui baptizatur, christianum imponatur nomen; quod si id consequi non poterunt, nomini a parentibus imposito addant nomen alicuius Sancti et in libro baptizatorum utrumque nomen perscribant.

32 S. O., Sept. 17, 1681 (Coll., n. 225).

33 S. O., April 2, 1879 (Coll., n. 1516).

34 S. Rit. C., Aug. 27, 1836 (Dec Auth., n. 2743).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pastors should see to it that a Christian name is given to all whom they baptize. If they can not obtain this, they shall add to the name given by the parents the name of some saint and enter both in the baptismal record.

The Church has always insisted[35] upon this pious custom, and priests must now obey the law and may no longer be accused of "cranky notions" when they do so. The name of his patron saint should remind the faithful Catholic of the example he is to imitate and of the protection he may expect through the intercession of the patron.[36]

Here we may describe the manner of receiving non-Catholics into the Church, according to the instruction given to the Bishop of Philadelphia, July 20, 1859:

1. When Baptism is to be conferred absolutely, no abjuration of heresy or absolution is required, because Baptism wipes out all sins.

2. When Baptism is to be administered conditionally, the modus procedendi is as follows:

a) Abjuration of heresy or profession of faith;

b) Conditional Baptism;

c) Sacramental confession with conditional absolution.

The instruction adds the formula of abjuration and advises the clergy to comply with the wish of converts who desire to have the Catholic ceremonies supplied.[37]

35 Clement XII, "Compertum," Aug. 24, 1734, ad II, dub.; Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 3. Pagan names are to be excluded entirely.

36 S. C. Sacr., March 13, 1910, ad 9, n. 1 (A. Ap. S., II, 195).

37 Coll. P. F., n. 1178.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

GODPARENTS OR SPONSORS

CAN. 762

§ 1. Ex vetustissimo Ecclesiae more nemo sollemniter baptizetur, nisi suum habeat, quatenus fieri possit, patrinum.

§ 2. Etiam in baptismo privato patrinus, si facile haberi queat, adhibeatur; si non interfuerit, adhibeatur in supplendis baptismi caeremoniis, sed hoc in casu nullam contrahit spiritualem cognationem.

That the custom of having sponsors at solemn baptism is very ancient is borne out by historical documents.[1] The name sponsores occurs in Tertullian's treatise on Baptism.[2] Other names, used especially in connection with spiritual relationship, were compatres or commatres spirituales,[3] and patrini. They were employed not only at the Baptism of grown persons, but also of children when infant baptism became more general in the fifth century, as may be seen from synodal acts. Monks and nuns were forbidden to act as godfathers and godmothers.[4] The reason for this prohibition is not far to seek. Their secluded life seemed to debar them from assuming the duties of sponsors, which are to instruct the godchildren and to exhort them to lead a Christian life, especially if the parents should die or neglect their

1 Cfr. Martène, De Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus, l. I, c. 1, art. 16, n. 11.
2 Cap. 18 (Migne 1, col. 1221).
3 Archiv für K.-R., 1906, 688 ff.
4 C. 104, Dist. 4, de cons.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obligations.[5] It must be added, however, that the authentic collections contain no text forbidding religious to become godparents. Our Code has a mitigated prohibition to that effect.

§ 1, then, enjoins the observance of the venerable custom of having godparents at solemn baptism, if possible.[6] If sponsors, as described in the Code, cannot be had, except with difficulty, Baptism may be conferred without them;[7] but if religious are present, they may and should be admitted as sponsors.[8]

§ 2. Also at private Baptism a sponsor should be employed if possible; if none was present, one should be called when the ceremonies are supplied; but in that case no spiritual relationship is contracted, and therefore relatives, too, may be admitted.[9]

SPONSORS AT CONDITIONAL BAPTISM

CAN. 763

§ 1. Cum baptismus iteratur sub conditione, idem patrinus, quatenus fieri possit, adhibeatur, qui in priore baptismo forte adfuit; extra hunc casum in baptismo conditionato patrinus non est necessarius.

§ 2. Iterato baptismo sub conditione, neque patrinus qui priori baptismo adfuit, neque qui posteriori, cognationem spiritualem contrahit, nisi idem patrinus in utroque baptismo adhibitus fuerit.

When Baptism is repeated sub conditione, if possible the same sponsor should be employed who was present

5 S. Thomas, S. Th., III, q. 68, a. 7; S. O., Dec. 9, 1745 (Coll., n. 355).

6 Trid., sess. 24, c. 2, de ref.

7 S. C. P. F., April 1, 1816, Louisville, Ky. (Coll., n. 709).

8 S. Rit. C., Feb. 15, 1887 (Coll., n. 1667).

9 S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1779 (Coll., n. 537).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the first time; but if this is not possible — and it would not be possible if he had not the qualities negatively described in can. 765 — no sponsor is required for conditional Baptism. No spiritual relationship is contracted, unless the same qualified sponsor acts as such on both occasions.

NUMBER OF SPONSORS

CAN. 764

Patrinus unus tantum, licet diversi sexus a baptizando, vel ad summum unus et una adhibeantur.

There should be only one sponsor, but he may be of different sex than the one to be baptized; at most two may be employed, viz., a man and a woman. This ruling[10] is evidently inspired by the desire to diminish spiritual relationship, which seems to have been the delight of older canonists and glossators.

REQUISITES OF LEGAL SPONSORSHIP

CAN. 765

Ut quis sit patrinus, oportet:

1.° Sit baptizatus, rationis usum assecutus et intentionem habeat id munus gerendi;

2.° Ad nullam pertineat haereticam aut schismaticam sectam, nec sententia condemnatoria vel declaratoria sit excommunicatus aut infamis infamia iuris aut exclusus ab actibus legitimis, nec sit clericus depositus vel degradatus;

3.° Nec sit pater vel mater vel coniux baptizandi;

10 Cc. 100 f., Dist. 4, de cons.; c. 3, X, IV, 3; Trid., sess. 24, c. 2, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4.° Ab ipso baptizando eiusve parentibus vel tutoribus aut, his deficientibus, a ministro sit designatus;

5.° Baptizandum in actu baptismi per se vel per procuratorem physice teneat aut tangat vel statim levet seu suscipiat de sacro fonte aut de manibus baptizantis.

We call the following legal requisites, because the term "valid" hardly covers them all:

(1) The sponsor must be baptized, have attained the age of discretion, and have the intention of taking the office of sponsor upon himself.

(2) He or she must belong to no heretical or schismatical sect, nor be excommunicated by either a condemnatory or a declaratory sentence, nor be infamous by law, nor be excluded from legal acts, nor be a deposed or degraded clergyman.

(3) He or she must be neither the father nor the mother nor the consort of the one to be baptized.

(4) He or she must be appointed either by the one to be baptized, or by the latter's parents or guardians, or, if these (three classes) be wanting, by the minister of the Sacrament.

(5) The sponsor must either personally or by proxy take upon himself the sponsorship by a physical act indicative of sponsorship according to custom.

Concerning n. 1, it is evident that sponsorship must be a human act, and as Christian Baptism is implied, it is required, besides, that the sponsor be himself initiated, i. e., a member, like in any knighthood or society.

With regard to heretics or schismatics it has been the constant and uniform practice of the Church to refuse to admit as sponsors all persons who are not of the faith, since a sponsor assumes the duty of instructing his godchild in Christian doctrine.[11] It makes no difference whether such persons appear themselves or are represented by a Catholic proxy.[12] Neither is friendship, or blood relationship, or any other natural tie sufficient to break these rules.[13] From the fact that a notoriously censured Catholic may legally be a sponsor, it has been inferred that a non-Catholic might just as well be admitted. This conclusion is not justified[14] because of the implied office of teaching and of the position the Church has always maintained towards heresy and schism.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The code also draws a distinction between a condemned or declared excommunicatus and one notoriously excommunicated, as per can. 766, n. 2. By committing a crime to which the Code attaches the penalty of excommunication, one may be notoriously excommunicated, though no judge has declared him such or condemned him to that penalty.

What legitimate acts (not actions) are, is stated under can. 2256; one of them is precisely that of acting as sponsor.

No. 3 excludes father and mother and consort (husband or wife) of the one to be baptized from sponsorship. If any of these persons should act as sponsors, no spiritual relationship is contracted.[15]

No. 4 rules that appointment or designation is required for sponsorship. This must be made before Baptism. Post factum approval or ratification is insufficient, though 11 S. O., Oct. 14, 1676; Dec. 9, 1745; Jan. 1763; S. C. P. F., Sept. 8, 1869, n. 47 (Coll., nn. 211, 355, 447, 1346); the admission of such persons is styled abusus.

12 S. O., June 30, July 7, 1864; Jan. 3. 1871 (Coll., nn. 1257, 1362).

13 S. O., Oct. 14, 1676 (Coll., n. 211).

14 S. O., May 3, 1893 (Coll., n. 1831).

15 S. O., Sept. 15, 1869 (Coll., n. 1347). This holds even if they have become sponsors by fraud or out of levity, and hence they neither lose the right to demand or the duty to render the debitum coniugale.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the parents may presume consent. The reason for this law is that the sponsor must have the formal intention and will to accept and perform the duties attached to sponsorship.[16]

No. 5 speaks of a physical act and enumerates four terms, which are used to signify sponsorship, viz.: tenere, i. e., to hold the child in the act of Baptism, when the water is poured on the head; tangere, to touch the child on the arm or any part of the body whilst another holds it over the baptismal font; levare, which is derived from immersion, and means to lift or raise out of the water, lake or pond; suscipere, to receive from the baptismal font or the hands of the minister. Concerning tenere, to hold, a decision has been given to the effect that it is sufficient that the sponsor put his or her arm in that of the person who holds the child, or touch that person, v. g., nurse or midwife, and accompany him or her to the baptismal font. It is not required that the sponsor personally offer the child for Baptism.[17] Whence it may be concluded that mediate physical contact is sufficient.

All the above-mentioned acts may be performed by proxy. The proxy must come in physical touch with the subject. Whilst there are decisions debarring non-Catholics from acting as sponsors, either personally or through a Catholic proctor, we can find no decision excluding them from acting as proctors for Catholic sponsors. However, as can. 2256, 2°, excludes them from legal acts, even those peculiar to a procurator, it would not be safe to employ them in Baptism. This does not mean, of course, that a non-Catholic may not act as a mere witness or nominal sponsor together with a Catholic sponsor.[18]

16 S. O., Sept. 15, 1869 (Coll., n. 1347); cfr. can. 1079.

17 S. C. P. F., Jan. 21, 1856 (Coll., n. 1119).

18 The baptizing minister in such cases should gently insinuate that only the Catholic party is sponsor. S. O., Jan., 1763 (Coll., n. 447).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 766

Ut autem quis licite patrinus admittatur, oportet:

1.° Decimum quartum suae aetatis annum attigerit, nisi aliud iusta de causa ministro videatur;

2.° Non sit propter notorium delictum excommunicatus vel exclusus ab actibus legitimis vel infamis infamia iuris, quin tamen sententia intercesserit, nec sit interdictus aut alias publice criminosus vel infamis infamia facti;

3.° Fidei rudimenta noverit;

4.° In nulla religione sit novitius vel professus, nisi necessitas urgeat et expressa habeatur venia Superioris saltem localis:

5.° In sacris ordinibus non sit constitutus, nisi accedat expressa Ordinarii proprii licentia.

That one may be licitly admitted to sponsorship, it is required:

1°. That the sponsor have reached (not completed) the fourteenth year of age, unless the minister, for a just cause, sees fit to admit a younger person. A just cause may be the moral or intellectual qualities of the person admitted; local or rather climatic conditions (in Southern countries maturity sets in sooner); family traditions, or particular circumstances.

2°. That the sponsor be not excommunicated for a notorious crime; or excluded from legal acts; or rendered infamous by law, without a sentence having been issued to that effect; or interdicted; or a public criminal; or infamous in fact. Evidently the Code wishes to debar from sponsorship all whose moral character and reputation do not guarantee fitness to raise a Catholic child, which, as sponsor, one would be expected to do in case of necessity. Besides, sponsorship is an honor and should not be conferred on unworthy persons. The former reason is alleged in an instruction of the Holy Office with regard to Freemasons. These, if their membership in the Order is notorious, are not to be admitted as sponsors.[19] The other points noted in the text must be interpreted according to Book V. Stress is to be laid on notoriety, as the text itself explains.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3°. That the sponsor know the rudiments of faith, which requirement is as stringent for sponsors as for adults who desire to be baptized (see can. 752).

4°. That the sponsor be neither a novice nor a professed member of any religious institute. However, in urgent cases, and with the express (not presumed) permission of at least the local superior, religious may be admitted to sponsorship.[20] An urgent case would be if Baptism would otherwise have to be conferred without sponsors.[21] In hospitals and other asylums Sisters are sometimes called upon to act as sponsors; they may do so with the permission of the superioress.

5°. That the sponsor be not a cleric in higher orders, for such may act as sponsors only with the express permission of the Ordinary. This includes subdeacons. An Ordinary, whether bishop or prelate regular, may grant himself permission, and therefore act as sponsor without consulting any one else.

19 S. O., July 5, 1878, ad ordin. Brasil. (Coll., n. 1495).

20 Cfr. c. 8, C. 16, q. 1; c. 103 f., Dist. 4, de cons.

21 S. Rit. C., Feb. 15, 1887 (Coll. P. F., n. 1667). Custom might also be alleged. Thus it is customary that the Abbot of Engelberg, Switzerland, acts as godfather to every firstborn boy in the village, and the S. Cong. did not wish to abolish this custom.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 767

In dubio utrum quis valide vel licite admitti possit, necne, ad patrini munus, parochus, si tempus suppetat, consulat Ordinarium.

When in doubt as to whether any one may be legally or licitly admitted to sponsorship, the pastor should consult the Ordinary if time permits.

SPIRITUAL RELATIONSHIP

CAN. 768

Ex baptismo spiritualem cognationem contrahunt tantum cum baptizato baptizans et patrinus.

Spiritual relationship is contracted only between the minister and the one baptized, and between the sponsor and his godchild. Of this more under can. 1079.

DUTIES OF SPONSORS

CAN. 769

Patrinorum est, ex suscepto munere, spiritualem filium perpetuo sibi commendatum habere, atque in iis quae ad christianae vitae institutionem spectant, curare diligenter ut ille talem in tota vita se praebeat, qualem futurum sollemni caeremonia spoponderunt.

It is the duty of godparents, arising from sponsorship, to regard their spiritual children as their perpetual charges and to instruct them carefully in the obligations of the Christian life, in order that they may prove themselves such as they solemnly promised by their baptismal vows to be. The obligation exists even if the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sponsors think they are not bound by it. It binds chiefly when the parents neglect their duty.[22]

22 S. O., Dec. 9, 1745 (Coll., n. 355): "Aliud est quod patrini non curent, aliud quod non teneantur curare. Tenentur etiam hodie ad id praestandum, si carnales parentes id facere negligant, uti docet D. Thomas, III, q. 67, a. 8."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER V

TIME AND PLACE OF BAPTISM

CAN. 770

Infantes quamprimum baptizentur; et parochi ac concionatores frequenter fideles de hac gravi eorum obligatione commoneant.

CAN. 771

Baptismus privatus, urgente necessitate, quovis tempore et loco administrandus est.

The first of these two canons confirms the old practice of having infants baptized as soon as possible. To admonish the faithful of their grave obligation to comply with this law is the office of pastors and preachers.

Private baptism, according to can. 771, in case of urgent necessity may be administered at any time and in any place.

The reason for the important law embodied in can. 770 is the necessity of Baptism for eternal salvation. Leo XIII justly called the practice of delaying Baptism a detestable and impious abuse.[1] An instruction of the Holy Office enjoined the Coptic missionaries to tell mothers that they are guilty of cruelty to their offspring if they delay Baptism for fear of temporal death while exposing them to eternal death.[2] The term quamprimum, as soon as possible, is assumed to signify three, or, at 1 "Gratae," July 22, 1899 (Coll. P. F., n. 2060).

2 S. O., June 14, 1741 (Coll., n. 326).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

most, eight days from the birth of the child.[3] An urgens necessitas would exist, e. g., a) if the distance from church were great,[4] say more than three leagues; b) if the parents stubbornly objected to having the child brought to church. In these and similar cases private baptism without ceremonies and rites may be administered, but the latter must be supplied when the parents give their consent or the child can be brought to church.[5] When a child is so feeble that there is danger of death, the midwife may baptize him, provided the danger is quite positive.[6]

When Baptism, private or solemn, is administered at home, the faithful should be instructed that it is valid and not a mere ceremony.[7]

SOLEMN BAPTISM

CAN. 772

Etiam sollemnis baptismus qualibet die administrari potest; decet tamen adultorum baptismum, secundum antiquissimum Ecclesiae ritum, conferri, si fieri commode queat, in pervigilio Paschatis et Pentecostes, praecipue in metropolitanis aut cathedralibus ecclesiis.

Solemn Baptism, too, may be administered at any time; but it is becoming, if it can be done conveniently, that adults be baptized on the vigils of Easter and Pentecost, according to the ancient liturgies, especially in metropolitan and cathedral churches.

3 S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1841 (Coll., n. 939).

4 S. C. P. F., Nov. 28, 1785 (Coll., n. 582).

5 S. C. P. F., Aug. 30, 1775 (Coll., n. 510).

6 S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1779; S. O., Jan. 11, 1899 (Coll., nn. 537, 2033).

7 This was the idea of the Nestorians; S. C. P. F., July 31, 1902 (Coll., n. 2149).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The ancient custom was vindicated by Pope Siricius (384–398) and has been observed from time immemorial,[8] more especially with regard to grown persons, who were first received into the ranks of the catechumens and had to undergo a long trial and pass the scrutinia in Lent. On Holy Saturday they were mustered and marched into the baptistery, whilst the faithful in church attended the reading of the prophecies.[9] That the ceremony was impressive and an occasion of joy for the bishop goes without saying. The Church, in her truly conservative spirit, wishes to preserve the old tradition as much as modern circumstances permit. But, as the text says, according to the ancient ritual,[10] this custom should be observed only when adults are to be baptized, because it might be dangerous and fatiguing to delay Baptism or to attend such an extended ceremony for children.[11]

PLACE OF BAPTISM

CAN. 773

Proprius baptismi sollemnis administrandi locus est baptisterium in ecclesia vel oratorio publico.

The proper place for administering solemn baptism is the baptistery of a church or public oratory. The sacristy is not the proper place, unless there be a reasonable cause for using it. This cause must be submitted to the Ordinary.[12] A valid reason would be repair work going on in church, and, we believe, coldness of the 8 Cfr. cc. 11, 15, Dist. 4, de cons.

9 This is the origin of those prophecies being read in church.

10 Tit. II, c. 1, n. 27; c. 3, nn. 4–6.

11 The provincial Synod of Benevento, 1693, held by the later Benedict XIII, allowed children to wait fourteen days; tit. 36, c. 8 (Coll. Lac., I, 70).

12 S. Rit. C., March 14, 1861, ad IX (Dec. Auth., n. 3104).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google church on a winter day when the whole church cannot be heated on account of a baptism occurring on a week-day.

Solemn Baptism may not be administered in the private oratories (for an exception see can. 776, § 1, 1°) of private persons.[13] Neither are semi-public oratories, for instance, Sisters' chapels or hospital oratories, the proper place to baptize, because the text plainly says "public oratories."

Baptism may, by way of exception, be conferred at a special altar, on account of a particular devotion to the Saint to whom the altar is dedicated;[14] but this altar must be in the church, not in a private chapel or semi-public oratory.

A BAPTISMAL FONT IN EVERY PARISH CHURCH

CAN. 774

§ 1. Quaelibet paroecialis ecclesia, revocato ac reprobato quovis contrario statuto vel privilegio vel consuetudine, baptismalem habeat fontem, salvo legitimo iure cumulativo aliis ecclesiis iam quaesito.

§ 2. Loci Ordinarius potest pro fidelium commoditate permittere vel iubere ut fons baptismalis ponatur etiam in alia ecclesia vel publico oratorio intra paroeciae fines.

The characteristic sign of a parish church has always been the baptismal font, though some canonists thought it was not essential to a parish church.[15]

13 C. un., Clem. III, 15; Benedict XIV, "Magno cum," June 2, 1751, § 19; Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 1, nn. 28, 30; c. 3, n. 7.

14 S. Rit. C., Sept 1, 1888 (Dec. Auth., n. 3695); with the approval of the Ordinary.

15 Cfr. S. C., EE. et RR., June 9, 1848 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 562 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1 of our canon revokes and reprobates every statute, custom or privilege which would prevent the erection of a baptismal font in every parish church, and commands that every parish church should have its own baptismal font.[16] This, of course, implies that the blessing of the baptismal water on the vigils of Easter and Pentecost must be performed in each and every parish church according to the Roman Ritual. The pastor is not allowed to put this ceremony off to another day.[17] From the above rule it follows that if a cathedral church is not a parish church, it is not entitled to a baptismal font,[18] unless, of course, the bishop should make use of § 2, can. 774. But the Ordinary is not empowered to erect in a cathedral church which is not a parish church a temporary baptismal font, or to allow a portable font and bless water without the mixture of the Holy Oils, for the two Saturdays mentioned.[19]

The meaning of the clause: "with due regard to the legitimate cumulative right acquired by another church" (salvo legitimo iure cumulativo aliis ecclesiis iam quaesito) may be illustrated by quoting a decision of the S. Rit. C. In the diocese of Spalato, Dalmatia, the baptismal font was blessed only in the cathedral, pro-cathedral, collegiate and in some principal parochial churches; the other churches got their baptismal water from the former. The S. Congregation decided that this custom was no longer to be tolerated, with due regard, however, to the special and determined rights of the mother churches. The churches which received their baptismal water from the others were most probably daughters or branches.[20] 16 S. C. C., Feb. 10, 1748, denied the right of having a baptismal font to a collegiate church (Richter, Trid., p. 118, n. 12).

17 S. Rit. C., Jan. 13, 1899 (Dec. Auth., n. 4005).

18 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1872 (Dec. Auth., n. 3272).

19 S. Rit. C., Jan. 13, 1899 (Dec. Auth., n. 4005).

20 S. Rit. C., June 7, 1892 (Dec. Auth., n. 3776).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What the special rights of the mother churches were is not stated in the decision. They probably consisted in a certain deference or respect which took the form of a tithe or tribute, or perhaps mere precedence.[21] Sometimes, in such cases, express stipulations existed, allowing the parishioners of the branch churches to bring their children to the mother church for Baptism.[22]

In our country no such rights should be reserved because it would only cause confusion and curtail parochial rights.

§ 2 rules that the local Ordinary may, for the convenience of the faithful, permit or command that another baptismal font be placed in some other church or public oratory within the boundaries of a parish. This new [23] law gives the Ordinary the right of erecting baptismal fonts in other than parish churches, e. g., public oratories or chapels of ease, but not in semi-public or private oratories. This will be very convenient for missionary stations or missions attached to a quasi-mother church. It seems logical that the blessing of the baptismal font on the vigils of Easter and Pentecost should be performed in these churches or public oratories.[24] Yet the wording ponatur, be placed, would seem to admit of another practice, viz.: that of receiving the baptismal water from the parish church and putting it in the baptismal font. We believe this practice could not be called unlawful.[25]

21 S. C. C., Aug. 3, Dec. 14, 1748 (Richter, Trid., p. 118, n. 10).

22 S. C. C., June 22, 1720 (Richter. l. c., n. 11).

23 S. C. C., Aug. 17, 1626; Sept. 22, 1742 (Richter, Trid., n. 8) would not permit this, but rather recommends the erection of a new parish.

24 S. Rit. C., June 7, 1892 (Dec. Auth., n. 3776) would seem to favor this assumption.

25 S. C. P. F., Sept., 1779; Aug. 23, 1852 (Coll., nn. 537, 1079).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 775

Si ad ecclesiam paroecialem, aut ad aliam quae iure fontis gaudeat, baptizandus, propter locorum distantiam aliave adiuncta, sine gravi incommodo aut periculo, accedere aut transferri nequeat, baptismus sollemnis a parocho conferri potest et debet in proxima ecclesia aut oratorio publico intra paroeciae fines, licet haec baptismali fonte careant.

The Church to-day is even more condescending than formerly, and permits the administration of solemn Baptism in any church or public oratory situated within the parish boundaries, even though it be destitute of a baptismal font. However, there must be a reason for making use of this permission. A sufficient reason is if the one to be baptized, whether infant or adult, cannot, without great inconvenience or danger, be brought or go to a church which has a baptismal font, whether it be a parish or some other church. In that case the parish priest may and should confer Baptism in the nearest church or public oratory within the parish boundaries. A serious inconvenience may arise from distance, or expense, or a contagious disease.

SOLEMN BAPTISM IN PRIVATE HOUSES

CAN. 776

§ 1. In domibus autem privatis baptismus sollemnis administrari non debet, nisi hisce in adiunctis:

1.° Si baptizandi sint filii aut nepotes eorum qui supremum actu tenent populorum principatum vel ius habent succedendi in thronum, quoties isti id rite poposcerint;

2.° Si loci Ordinarius, pro suo prudenti arbitrio et

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conscientia, iusta ac rationabili de causa, in casu aliquo extraordinario id concedendum censuerit.

§ 2. In memoratis casibus baptismus conferendus est in sacello domus aut saltem in alio decenti loco, et aqua baptismali de more benedicta.

§ 1. Solemn Baptism may not be administered in private houses except in the following circumstances—apart from cases of necessity [26]:

1°. If those to be baptized are the sons or grandsons of actual rulers, or of their prospective successors to the throne. If this privilege is desired, petition must be made for it either directly to the Ordinary, or to the parish priest, both of whom are entitled to perform the rite;

2°. If the local Ordinary, after prudent and conscientious deliberation, judges that there is a just and plausible cause for granting the permission in some extraordinary case. Such cases would be: if Catholics would demand to have their children baptized in the house of a Catholic consul, which may happen among foreigners; [27] if the distance from the church would be very considerable, say ten geographical miles.[28] But solemn baptism may never be administered in the houses of non-Catholics, not even in case of necessity or danger of death.[29]

§ 2 enjoins the minister to confer baptism, in the cases mentioned under § 1, in the oratory or some other decent place, and with baptismal water, i. e., water blessed on the vigils of Easter and Pentecost, or accord-

[26] S. C. Sacr., Dec. 23, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 725).

[27] S. O., Jan., 1763 (Coll., n. 447). This may certainly be extended to the palaces of Catholic ambassadors who enjoy exterioriality and immunity, whilst the consuls are destitute of these privileges; cfr. Westlake, International Law, P. I, Peace, 1910, p. 288 f.

[28] S. Rit. C., Feb. 10, 1871, ad III (Dec. Auth., n. 3234).

[29] S. O., Jan. 21, 1767 (Coll., n. 465).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing to the formula prescribed for supplementing it when the supply is exhausted; — except, of course, in urgent cases, which admit of the shortest possible form.[30]

30 S. Rit. C., Jan. 17, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 32); Rit. Rom., tit. II, c. 1, n. 29; c. 7 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 59).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER VI

BAPTISMAL RECORD AND PROOF

CAN. 777

§ 1. Parochi debent nomina baptizatorum, mentione facta de ministro, parentibus ac patrinis, de loco ac die collati baptismi, in baptismali libro sedulo et sine ulla mora referre.

§ 2. Ubi vero de illegitimis filiis agatur, matris nomen est inserendum, si publice eius maternitas constet, vel ipsa sponte sua scripto vel coram duobus testibus id petat; item nomen patris, dummodo ipse sponte sua a parocho vel scripto vel coram duobus testibus id requirat, vel ex publico authentico documento sit notus; in ceteris casibus inscribatur natus tanquam filius patris ignoti vel ignotorum parentum.

CAN. 778

Si baptismus nec a proprio parocho nec eo praesente administratus fuerit, minister de ipso collato quamprimum proprium ratione domicilii parochum baptizati certiorem reddat.

Parish priests must enter in the baptismal record the names of the baptized, the minister, the parents and godparents, the place and date of Baptism. This record must be made carefully and without delay.

In the case of an illegitimate child the mother's name must be put down if she is publicly known to be the mother, or if, of her own accord, she demands it in writing or before two witnesses. The name of the father must be recorded only if he, of his own accord, demands it of the pastor either in writing or in the presence of two witnesses, or if he is known to be the child's father by an authentic public document. In all other cases the one baptized must be recorded as the offspring of an unknown father or unknown parents.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the Baptism was not administered by the pastor, nor in his presence, the minister shall notify the pastor as soon as possible of the fact. It is hardly necessary to call attention to the grave obligation of keeping proper baptismal records, on which authentic testimonies depend.[1] Benedict XIV called upon the Ordinaries to examine the baptismal records at each canonical visit.[2] The Code enjoins recording without delay (sine mora), which means the same day the Baptism was conferred, unless the book were not at hand, as may happen with missionaries, who cannot carry the baptismal books from place to place. The term sedulo (diligently) includes whatever is necessary for clear, legible, and neat bookkeeping. The priest should if necessary, keep a separate record for children of another, (for instance, the Ruthenian) rite.[3]

PROOF OF BAPTISM

CAN. 779

Ad collatum baptismum comprobandum, si nemini fiat praeiudicium, satis est unus testis omni exceptione maior, vel ipsius baptizati iusiurandum, si ipse in adulta aetate baptismum receperit.

1 Trid., sess. 24, c. 2, de ref. mat.; S. O., Dec. 9, 1745 (Coll., n. 345). Instr. S. C. P. F., June 25, 1791 (Coll., n. 605).

2 "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 9.

3 S. C. P. F., Oct. 6, 1863, C. a. (Coll., n. 1241): in libro separato.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If no prejudice is involved to a third person, one absolutely trustworthy witness is sufficient to prove that Baptism was conferred; the sworn statement of the one baptized is also admissible, if baptism was conferred on him as an adult. The reason why one witness suffices must be sought in the danger of incurring ecclesiastical penalties if one should baptize a child against the will of the parents. Hence no one is supposed to testify against himself, and therefore his testimony is admitted.[4] Thus the statement of a catechist, if he has a good reputation, would be sufficient.[5] We also think that a physician's or midwife's testimony may be admitted under the same condition.

The text says, if no prejudice arises to a third person. When a material advantage, for instance, a legacy, or a spiritual benefit (preferment) would be involved against the claim of another, two witnesses would be required. The statement of the baptized subject is admitted and affords full proof only if it is given under oath and the Baptism was conferred after the subject had attained the age of discretion (about the seventh year). No distinction is made between the testimonies of men and women.[6]

4 Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, n. 31; cc. 110, 112, 113, Dist. 4, de cons; Glossa ad c. 51, X, II, 20, s. v. "nisi iuratus."

5 S. C. P. F., Sept. 8, 1869 (Coll., n. 1346).

6 Benedict XIV, "Postremo mense," nn. 35, 31, 55.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE II

CONFIRMATION

MATTER AND FORM

CAN. 780

Sacramentum confirmationis conferri debet per manus impositionem cum unctione chrismatis in fronte et per verba in pontificalibus libris ab Ecclesia probatis praescripta.

CAN. 781

§ 1. Chrisma, in sacramento confirmationis adhibendum, debet esse ab Episcopo consecratum, etiamsi sacramentum a presbytero, ex iure vel ex apostolico indulto, ministretur.

§ 2. Unctio autem ne fiat aliquo instrumento, sed ipsa ministri manu capiti confirmandi rite imposita.

The Sacrament of Confirmation must be administered by laying on hands, and anointing the forehead with chrism, and pronouncing the words prescribed in the pontifical books approved by the Church.

The chrism to be used in the administration of this Sacrament must be blessed by a bishop, even though a priest may administer it, either by law or in virtue of an apostolic indult.

The anointing is not to be performed with an instrument, but with the minister's hand, placed upon the head of the subject to be confirmed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The Sacrament of strength or of zeal is distinct from Baptism, the indelible character of which it enlarges or deepens. Confirmation confers a grace distinct from the baptismal grace. It is pre-eminently the Sacrament of the Holy Ghost.[1] Being essentially distinguished from the Sacrament of Baptism, it requires a distinct matter and form.

1. The remote matter is chrism, which is composed of balsam and olive oil. The latter is essential for the validity of the Sacrament. Balsam, too, must be said to belong to the essence of the matter, at least according to the Decree for the Armenians and the ancient Greek Euchologia.[2] The validity of the matter is, however, not affected by mingling other aromatics with the balsam.[3] The blessing or consecration of the matter must be performed by a bishop. Whether a priest, with the permission of the Pope, could consecrate chrism is a speculative question. The affirmative view is certainly tenable.[4] Licit administration requires that the consecration be performed by a Catholic bishop, and hence priests are never allowed to receive chrism from a heretical or schismatic bishop.[5] The vicar-general, although he may be a bishop, cannot lawfully bless the chrism.[6] Lastly, the chrism must be blessed the same year in which it is used, counting from Holy Thursday to Holy Thursday. It is not allowed to use chrism blessed the year before, except in case of necessity.[7]

1 Trid., sess. 7, c. 1, de sacram. in genere; cc. 1, 2, de confirm.; Professio fidei Waldensibus praescripta; Decretum pro Arm. (Denzinger, nn. 370, 592); Pius X, Syllabus, 1907, n. 44.

2 Benedict XIV, "Ex quo," March 1, 1756, § 49; the testimonies of the early Church see in M. O'Dwyer, Confirmation, 1915, p. 49 ff.

3 Benedict XIV, l. c.

4 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VIII, 1, 4.

5 S. C. P. F., May 4, 1774 (Coll., n. 553).

6 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., II, 8, 2–7.

7 Benedict XIV, "Anno vertente, June 19, 1750, § 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The proximate matter of Confirmation is the anointing. This is done by placing three or four fingers upon the forehead and using the thumb dipped in the holy chrism to anoint the same. The sign of the cross in the act of anointing is essential.[8]

§ 2, of can. 781 strictly forbids the use of any instrument (brush or cotton) in the act of Confirmation. The Holy Office has declared that the use of an instrument endangers the validity of the Sacrament and ordered secret and conditional repetition of Confirmation in casu.[9]

The form is that prescribed by the Roman Pontifical: "Signo te signo crucis, et confirmo te chrismate salutis, in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti," the act of pronouncing the three Holy Names being accompanied by the triple sign of the cross.[10]

8 S. Rit. C., May 7, 1853, ad II (Dec. Auth., n. 3012).

9 S. O., Jan. 14, 1885 (Coll., n. 1630).

10 S. Rit. C., May 7, 1853 (l. c.). However the triple sign of the cross is not required for validity.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

THE MINISTER OF CONFIRMATION

CAN. 782

§ 1. Ordinarius confirmationis minister est solus Episcopus.

§ 2. Extraordinarius minister est presbyter, cui vel iure communi vel peculiari Sedis Apostolicae indulto ea facultas concessa sit.

§ 3. Hac facultate ipso iure gaudent, praeter S. R. E. Cardinales ad normam can 239, § 1, n. 23, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, Vicarius et Praefectus Apostolicus, qui tamen ea valide uti nequeunt, nisi intra fines sui territorii et durante munere tantum.

§ 4. Presbyter latini ritus cui, vi indulti, haec facultas competat, confirmationem valide confert solis fidelibus sui ritus, nisi in indulto aliud expresse cautum fuerit.

§ 5. Nefas est presbyteris ritus orientalis, qui facultate vel privilegio gaudent confirmationem una cum baptismo infantibus sui ritus conferendi, eandem ministrare infantibus latini ritus.

§ 1 and 2.— The ordinary minister of Confirmation is the bishop, but a priest may act as extraordinary minister if he has received this power either by law or by a special indult of the Apostolic See.

The bishop and he alone is the ordinary minister of Confirmation in the Latin Church. The Greek Church permits priests to confer Confirmation immediately after Baptism. St. Gregory the Great, upon the remonstrances of the Sardinians, allowed priests to confirm where no bishops were available;[1] but this concession was a unique one in the Occidental Church, whereas the Eastern Church with the permission, and we dare say, approval, of the Apostolic See, retained the custom mentioned.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Even a heretical or schismatic bishop can confirm validly. This at least we would infer from certain decisions of the Holy Office, though they mention only Confirmation conferred by a schismatic priest; for all of them seem to admit at least the conditional validity of Confirmation administered by such a priest. Only when there were among the confirmandi some who wished to be promoted to tonsure or sacred Orders, was the repetition of Confirmation imposed, "conditionally and secretly."[2]

The text adds that a simple priest may administer the Sacrament of Confirmation, provided he has received that faculty either by law or by a special indult of the Apostolic See. Who receive that faculty by law is stated in § 3. They are the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, according to the privileges enumerated under can. 239, § 1, n. 23. Cardinals, therefore, may administer Confirmation anywhere and to anyone, for no distinction is made in the text. The only obligation mentioned is that they record the fact in the book especially reserved for recording Confirmations (can. 798). Others who may administer the Sacrament of Confirmation by law are abbots nullius or prelates nullius, vicars Apostolic and prefects Apostolic. But these three kinds of ecclesiastics

1 Cfr. Reg. Greg. M., ed. Ewald-Hartmann, 1891, Vol. I, 241, 261 (Sept. 593, May 594).

2 S. O., July 5, 1853; March 16, 1872; April 2, 1879; Jan. 14, 1885 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1095, 1381, 1515, 1630).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can make valid use of this faculty only within the boundaries of their own territory and during their term of office. Hence, for instance, the Vicar-Apostolic of North Carolina may administer Confirmation validly only within his own territory. On the other hand, he may, within that territory also confirm validly such as are not his subjects by reason either of domicile or quasi-domicile, and may licitly confirm subjects of other dioceses if they show a letter of permission or other testimony from their own bishop or parish priest.[3] By a special indult the Guardian (O. F. M.) of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem may confirm persons of the Latin Rite if no bishop of that rite residing in his own territory is at hand.[4]

The faculty to confirm is sometimes granted also to missionaries who preside over vast provinces. Thus it was given for China and Chile.[5] The condition is always added that they must use chrism blessed by a Catholic bishop.[6] In the instruction which they receive together with the faculty, it is also added that whenever they administer this Sacrament they must mention the special faculty in virtue of which they do so. But this is not required for the validity of the act.[7]

Vicars Apostolic have this faculty by law, yet their pro-vicars, during a vacancy, cannot confirm in virtue of their office, much less delegate other missionaries to administer Confirmation. Any attempt to do so would be invalid, and the Sacrament would have to be re-administered.[8] The very same decision, however, says that the

[3] S. C. EE. et RR., March 30, 1855 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 637 f.); Dec. 11, 1897; can. 784.

[4] Benedict XIV, "Cum ad," Jan. 9, 1741; "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743, § 14.

[5] S. C. P. F., July 29, 1841; March 4, 1903 (Coll., nn. 933, 2161).

[6] S. C. P. F., May 4, 1774 (Coll., n. 503).

[7] S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1841 (Coll., n. 940).

[8] S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1821 (Coll., n. 766). This must, a fortiori, be applied to pro-prefects.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pontiff may grant the faculty of delegating others. The faculty of subdelegating a priest ("benevisum sacerdotem") was given to the bishop of Concepcion, Chile.[9] A decision of the S. C. Propaganda, with the special approval of the Sovereign Pontiff granted the faculty of administering Confirmation to the Superior internus, or the vicar general, or the Vicar Apostolic-elect while not yet consecrated; this faculty included the power of subdelegating a priest of the vacant vicariate or diocese for giving Confirmation.[10] Now a Vicar-Apostolic-elect, who has received his letters of appointment, according to can. 294, § 2, may administer Confirmation, and therefore no longer needs a special faculty for this purpose.

§ 4. A priest of the Latin rite, who enjoys this faculty by virtue of an indult, can administer Confirmation validly only to the faithful of his own rite, unless the indult expressly grants him larger powers.

§ 5. Priests of the Oriental rite who are entitled by virtue either of a faculty or of a privilege tc confirm children of their own rite immediately after Baptism, may not lawfully confer Confirmation on children of the Latin rite.

§ 4 is taken from an Instruction of the Propaganda, issued in 1774, and extended in 1888 by the Holy Office to all priests who have the Apostolic indult for administering Confirmation. But nothing is said therein of the validity or invalidity of Confirmation administered by a Latin priest to a person of the Greek rite. The S. Congregation desired information to be gathered with regard to the following points: To what Oriental rite the confirmandi belonged; by whom they were confirmed, whether by their own bishop or by priests of their own

[9] S. O., March 4, 1903 (Coll., n.2161).
[10] July 29, 1841 (Coll., n. 933).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nation; whether they asked for Confirmation of their own accord; whether they could conveniently receive the Sacrament from their own bishops; whether, finally, Confirmation was to be administered in a diocese where there resides an Oriental bishop who is the Ordinary of the confirmandus.[11] Our text briefly declares that Confirmation can not be validly administered by a priest of the Latin rite to a Catholic, whether infant or adult, of an Oriental rite.

§ 5 strictly forbids Oriental priests to confirm infants of the Latin rite; that Confirmation thus unlawfully administered would be invalid, cannot be inferred either from the text itself or from the quotation given in Cardinal Gasparri's edition. On the contrary, the validity seems to be assured. Nefas is a strong term, but it cannot be stretched so as to involve invalidity.

Ruthenian priests of the Oriental rite would incur suspension a divinis ipso facto,[12] but this supposes only an illicit, not an invalid act. When the question was proposed to Rome, whether Oriental priests who are authorized to baptize babies of the Latin rite, may also administer Confirmation to the same, the answer was, negative et ad mentem. The mind of the Apostolic See was that the Oriental bishops should restrain their priests from such unlawful administration, which had been often and strictly forbidden by the Holy See. To the further question whether Confirmation thus administered should be conditionally repeated, the answer was, non expedire, except in the case of those who are to be promoted to tonsure or sacred orders, and then only conditionally and secretly.[13] Whether the priests of the Greek-Ruthenian

11 S. C. P. F., May 4, 1774 (Coll., n. 503).

12 S. C. P. F., July 5, 1886 ad 1 (Coll., n. 1660).

13 S. O., Jan. 14, 1885 (Coll., n. 1630).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rite residing in the United States can validly administer Confirmation to the faithful of their own rite, seems doubtful. The decree "Ea semper" of Pius X[14] expressly denies the validity of such a Confirmation. The decree of Aug. 17, 1914, does not touch this subject, nor is there any such clause to be found in the decree of Aug. 18, 1913, for the Ruthenian Bishop in Canada. Hence we hesitate to deny the validity, as the later decree contains nothing to the effect.[15] The Greek priests of Italy were "expressly forbidden" (expresse interdictum) to administer Confirmation even to the infants of their own rite, as this power was reserved to the bishops of the Latin rite, under whose jurisdiction they lived.[16]

This, then, is the canonical status of the minister of Confirmation. The underlying theological question is a rather vexed one and would demand a more elaborate investigation. For the question would have to be solved: Does the power of conferring Confirmation emanate from the power of Holy Orders, or from jurisdiction? What does the priest receive by delegation? Is it a new power of Order, or is it power of jurisdiction? It cannot be an extension of the priestly character, making it episcopal for the time, because the episcopal character is conferred by ordination, not by a mere papal letter.[17] Benedict XIV, who devoted much study to this controversy,[18] supposes tacit or express reservation or limitation of the power of confirming made by the Apostolic See in favor of bishops, and continues: Although to confirm is an act of the episcopal order, the validity of which does not depend on the will of the Pontiff, yet to delegate to a 14 June 14, 1907, art. 4.

15 Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 37, 516 ff.; Vol. 51, 586 ff.; Vol. 49, 593 ff.

16 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § III, 1.

17 O'Dwyer, l. c., p. 65 f.

18 Cfr. De Syn. Dioec., l. VII, 8, 7; IDEM, "Ex tuis precibus," Nov. 16, 1748, § 9 to Abbot Engelbert of Kempten, who received the faculty of confirming his own subjects and those of the abbey church.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

simple priest the power of performing such an act belongs to jurisdiction rather than to order. The jurisdiction of the bishop is subject to the Supreme Pontiff in such a manner that the latter may, by his authority and command, limit or take it away for a just reason. This, he says, is clearly the opinion of St. Thomas, who says that, as far as the real body of Christ (viz., the Holy Eucharist) is concerned, priests have equal power with bishops, whereas in regard to His mystic body bishops are superior to priests; and since the plenitude of power resides in the Supreme Pontiff, he may confer a power belonging to a higher rank on clergymen of inferior rank.[19] It would be difficult to assign the time when such a reservation of power was made concerning the Greek priests. With regard to the Latin clergy Benedict XIV could point to the letter of Innocent I (401–417) to Decentius of Gubbio. But as Gregory I reversed that general prohibition, it seems more natural to assume that the limitation or withdrawal of this restriction[20] was first introduced by custom and only at a later time determined by positive law for the Western Church, while in the Eastern Church, where children were confirmed immediately after baptism, no limitation was made, except in regard to subjects of the Latin rite. If it be asked, What does the delegation by the Pope to a simple priest of the power of conferring Confirmation imply? we answer: Not the conferring of a special dignity,[21] but merely an extension of the power, or faculty, or authority[22] of confirming. This delegation, however, is 19 Lib. IV, Dist. 7, q. 3, art. 1, gla. 3; Summa Theol., III, q. 72, art. 11.

20 O'Dwyer, l. c., p. 172.

21 Thus Lehmkuhl, Theol. Moral., II, n. 99. But this is hard to understand, because dignity results primarily from jurisdiction, and therefore the highest dignity is that of the Pope, in whom resides the plenitude of power, which chiefly indicates and signifies jurisdiction.

22 All these terms occur in the documents.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

limited either territorially, as for vicars-Apostolic, prefects Apostolic, prelates nullius, or personally as regards Latin priests with respect to persons of the Oriental Rite. If a curious reader would ask: Whence the difference? we should answer: The powers given to bishops and priests up to the beginning of the third century were not precisely determined, as the example of the chorepiscopi shows. The final answer, of course, must be sought in the theory of St. Thomas, that the power of confirming concerns the mystic rather than the real body of Christ, in other words, is directly connected with jurisdiction and rests fundamentally on the power of the priesthood. To us no other solution seems acceptable, especially in consideration of the fact that Rome has granted to bishops the faculty of subdelegating or delegating any priest they choose to administer Confirmation.

THE BISHOP'S POWER

CAN. 783

§ 1. Episcopus in sua dioecesi hoc sacramentum etiam extraneis legitime ministrat, nisi obstet expressa proprii eorum Ordinarii prohibitio.

§ 2. In aliena dioecesi indiget licentia Ordinarii loci saltem rationabiliter praesumpta, nisi agatur de propriis subditis quibus confirmationem conferat privatim ac sine baculo et mitra.

§ 1. A bishop may lawfully administer the sacrament of Confirmation in his own diocese, even to such as are not his subjects, unless their Ordinary has issued a special prohibition to the contrary.

§ 2. To confirm in a strange diocese he needs the at least reasonably presumed permission of the local Ordinary, unless he confirms his own subjects, in which case he is not allowed to use the pastoral staff or mitre.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Staff and mitre are the insignia of pontifical jurisdiction which no bishop may employ in another bishop's diocese without the other's permission.[23] The Vicar-Capitular must ask a bishop to confer Confirmation. This would offer an occasion for a presumed permission, viz., if the administrator would call on a bishop to confer orders on the clerics of a vacant diocese, the bishop thus called for ordination could also licitly confirm. Absence and sickness would also be presumed reasons. If, however, a bishop would publicly declare that he would confirm only his own subjects to the exclusion of strangers in or outside his diocese, Confirmation bestowed on such non-subjects who presented themselves stealthily would be invalid.[24]

It may be added that a metropolitan is not entitled to administer Confirmation in the dioceses of his suffragan bishops without their special permission.[25]

Can. 784

Presbytero quoque licet, si apostolico locali privilegio sit munitus, in designato sibi territorio confirmare etiam extraneos, nisi id ipsorum Ordinarii expresse vetuerint.

A priest who has an Apostolic local privilege empowering him to administer Confirmation may licitly confirm subjects not his own in the territory assigned to him, 23 S. Rit. C., April 14, 1877 (Dec. Auth., n. 3416); S. C. C., Aug. 2, 1596.

24 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug., 1682 (Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Confirmatio," art. II, n. 14), because of lack of the necessary intention the S. Cong. decided negatively.

25 S. C. EE. et RR., April 18, 1599 (Ferraris, l. c., art. II, n. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

provided the Ordinaries of the respective confirmandi have not expressly forbidden it. Hence, as already stated, such priests should procure testimonial letters from the Ordinaries whose subjects they confirm.[26] Note the words, "locali privilegio." A local privilege is an indult given for a certain territory or district, whether large or small. Sometimes such a privilege is attached not to a territory, but to persons. Thus, for instance, an abbot received from Pope Benedict XIV the privilege to confer Confirmation on "the subjects of the aforesaid abbey and on the parishioners of the abbey-church." This was a personal privilege, restricted to the persons named and could not validly be extended to others who were not subject to the abbot.[27]

DUTY OF THE BISHOP

CAN. 785

§ 1. Episcopus obligatione tenetur sacramentum hoc subditis rite et rationabiliter petentibus conferendi, praesertim tempore visitationis dioecesis.

§ 2. Eadem obligatione tenetur presbyter, privilegio apostolico donatus, erga illos quorum in favorem est concessa facultas.

§ 3. Ordinarius, legitima causa impeditus aut potestate confirmandi carens, debet, quoad fieri possit, saltem intra quodlibet quinquennium providere ut suis subditis hoc sacramentum administretur.

§ 4. Si graviter neglexerit sacramentum confirmationis suis subditis per se vel per alium ministrare, servetur praescriptum can. 274, n. 4.

26 S. C. EE. et RR., March 30, 1855 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 636 f.).

27 "Suprema," April 26, 1749, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Every bishop is in duty bound to administer this Sacrament to those of his subjects who becomingly and reasonably ask for it, especially at the time of the canonical visitation. Priests who are endowed with an Apostolic privilege have the same duty towards those in whose favor the faculty was granted. This canon must be compared with Canons 786–788, which deal with the subject of Confirmation. Those ask for Confirmation "rite et rationabiliter" who are endowed with the qualities mentioned in said canons; for duty and right are correlative terms.

The question whether a bishop or priest who is empowered to administer Confirmation is bound in conscience to confirm such as suffer from a contagious disease, was answered by Benedict XIV, who says it would be difficult to prove such an obligation, since this sacrament is not absolutely necessary for salvation, and the example of St. Charles Borromeo was a heroic one, from which no strict obligation can be deduced. But he adds that if Confirmation were administered to such unfortunates, there would be no reason for using an instrument, brush, sponge or cotton, because the act is very short.[28]

The time for administering Confirmation is the canonical visitation, on which occasion the bishop is obliged to confirm.[29]

§ 3 says that an Ordinary who is lawfully prevented from, or does not enjoy the power of, administering Confirmation, should, as far as possible, take care that this Sacrament is conferred at least every five years. Should he, continues § 4, grievously neglect this duty of confirming his subjects, either personally or through another, the [28] De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 19, nn. 6, 12.

[29] S. C. C., July 18, 1699 (Richter, Trid., p. 47, n. 3). Of course, if no one asks for Confirmation, or if Confirmation was administered a short time before, there would be no obligation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

metropolitan should see to it that this matter is attended to and inform the Holy See. Legitimate causes preventing a bishop from administering Confirmation within the term of five years, would be protracted illness, exile, and detention by higher superiors. The vicar-capitular has not the power to confirm, but should invite an outside bishop if this Sacrament has not been administered in the diocese for a long time.[30] If grievous neglect has crept into a suffragan's diocese, the metropolitan may compel or admonish the Ordinary of the same to comply with the law, but he may not administer Confirmation without the suffragan's permission because this case is not mentioned among those in which the metropolitan is authorized to supply the negligence of his suffragans.[31] However, if the canonical visitation would, upon request of the Holy See, be performed by the archbishop, we believe that Confirmation would also be mentioned in the causa probata.

30 S. Rit. C., April, 1877 (Dec. Auth., n. 3416).

31 Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. I., tit. 4, nn. 12, 43; glossa ad c. 2, Clem. V, 7, s. v. "Etiam celebrare."

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE SUBJECT OF CONFIRMATION

CAN. 786

Aquis baptismi non ablutus valide confirmari nequit; praeterea, ut quis licite et fructuose confirmetur, debet esse in statu gratiae constitutus et, si usu rationis polleat, sufficienter instructus.

CAN. 787

Quanquam hoc sacramentum non est de necessitate medii ad salutem, nemini tamen licet, oblata occasione, illud negligere; imo parochi curent ut fideles ad illud opportuno tempore accedant.

CAN. 788

Licet sacramenti confirmationis administratio convenienter in Ecclesia Latina differatur ad septimum circiter aetatis annum, nihilominus etiam antea conferri potest, si infans in mortis periculo sit constitutus, vel ministro id expedire ob iustas et graves causas videatur.

CAN. 789

Confirmandi, si plures sint, adsint primae manuum impositioni seu extensioni, nec nisi expleto ritu discedant.

The first of these four canons embodies a deduction from can. 737, § 1, which calls Baptism the door to the other Sacraments. One who is not yet baptized cannot be validly confirmed because he is not yet initiated into the Christian mysteries or incorporated in the mystic body of Christ, which initiation or incorporation confers the right to receive the other Sacraments. Besides, in order to receive this Sacrament licitly and profitably, one must be in the state of grace. For though the indelible character is impressed even if one is not in the state of sanctifying grace, the sacramental grace, or, as a text of the Decretum Gratiani says, the sevenfold grace of the Holy Ghost with the plenitude of holiness and knowledge and strength does not descend in Confirmation if this Sacrament is received in the state of mortal sin.[1] Besides, one who has attained the age of discretion must be sufficiently instructed in the more important truths of faith as well as the nature and efficacy of Confirmation. The confirmandus should know the difference between Baptism and Confirmation, which resembles the difference between generation and growth and the distinction between enrolling in the army of Christ and training for active service.[2] Should it happen that an adult, especially an elderly person, has not even the intention of receiving strength for his soul through Confirmation, the Sacrament should not be administered.[3]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Can. 787 says that Confirmation is relatively, not absolutely necessary for salvation, and therefore must not be neglected. A canon of Gratian[4] declares that no one is a Christian unless he has been confirmed by the bishop

1 C. 5, Dist. 5, de cons. Hence confession should precede Confirmation; cfr. Pontificale Rom., tit. De Confirmandis; S. O., Dec. 11, 1850 (Coll., n. 1054). As soon as the obex (state of grievous sin) is removed, the sacramental grace revives.

2 Benedict XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 9; "Eo quamvis tempore, May 4, 1745, § 6.

3 S. O., April 10, 1860 (Coll., n. 1213).

4 C. 6, Dist. 5, de cons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with chrism. This is an exaggeration, but it indicates the danger to which, in the opinion of the early Church, one exposed himself by wilfully neglecting this great Sacrament. Those who were suspected of being imbued with the errors of Wiclif and Huss were asked whether they believed that one who spurned the Sacrament of Confirmation committed a grievous sin.[5] Our text says that, although this Sacrament is not absolutely necessary for salvation, no one may lawfully neglect to receive it if offered the opportunity.[6] For this reason pastors should take care that the faithful receive Confirmation at the proper time. An Instruction of the S. C. Propaganda enjoined the missionaries of Mesopotamia to instruct the Nestorians, bishops as well as priests, to receive this Sacrament.[7] Every pastor is in duty bound to teach the faithful under his care not only the necessity of this Sacrament, but also how to receive it worthily.

Can. 788 mentions the custom of the Latin Church, which differs from that of the Greek, to defer Confirmation to the age of discretion, i. e., about the seventh year.[8] This custom, the text says, is quite proper, but the Sacrament may be administered at an earlier age if the child is in danger of death or the minister judges that there are other just and weighty reasons. Such reasons would be, e. g., great distance preventing one from reaching a place within the time limit of five years,— surely a rare thing.[9]

It may not be amiss to add what Lehmkuhl says,[10] that 5 Prop. 19 (Denzinger, n. 563).

6 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § III, 4: "Gravis peccati reatu teneri."

7 Instr., July 31, 1902 (Coll., n. 2149).

8 Benedict XIV, 'Eo quamvis tempore," May 4, 1745, § 6: "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 22.

9 S. O., Dec. 11, 1850, n. 12 (Coll., n. 1054); S. C. C., March 12, April 23, 1774 (Richter, Trid., p. 47, n. 1).

10 Theol. Moral., II, n. 100.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if the bishop would be obliged to administer Confirmation to the dying, he would have to do so to all or none, else there would be partiality and scandal; and if he had to confer the Sacrament on all the sick, there would be a great burden thrown upon him. An Oriental priest who enjoys the faculty of administering Confirmation together with Baptism may apply this faculty not only to his own people, but also to Catholics of another rite, provided the tacit privilege of administering both Sacraments is in vogue in that rite.[11]

Can. 789 provides that the confirmandi, if there are a number of them, should be present at the first imposition or extension of the hands, and not leave before the whole rite or ceremony is completed.[12] This is not, however, a condition affecting validity.[13]

11 S. O., April 22, 1896 (Coll., n. 1926).

12 Pontificale Rom., tit. De Confirmandis.

13 S. O., April 17, 1872 (Coll., n. 1383).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

TIME AND PLACE OF ADMINISTERING CONFIRMATION

CAN. 790

Hoc sacramentum quovis tempore conferri potest; maxime autem decet illud administrari in hebdomada Pentecostes.

CAN. 791

Licet proprius confirmationis administrandae locus ecclesia sit, ex causa tamen quam minister iustam ac rationabilem iudicaverit, potest hoc sacramentum in quolibet alio decenti loco conferri.

CAN. 792

Episcopo ius est intra fines suae dioecesis confirmationem administrandi in locis quoque exemptis.

This Sacrament may be conferred at any time, but it is most fittingly administered in the week after Pentecost. Whilst the Cardinal Vicar of Rome or his vicegerente may administer this Sacrament on any day or at any time in the Lateran Basilica, the Cardinal Archpriest of the Vatican Basilica may do so only during the Octave of the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul in St. Peter's.[1] The text designates the Octave of Pentecost as the most appropriate season. This praiseworthy custom may be conveniently observed especially in cathedral churches.

1 Benedict XIV, "Ad honorandum," March 27, 1752, § 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Can. 791. Although the proper place for administering confirmation is the church, it may also be conferred in any other decent place, provided the minister has a just and plausible reason for so doing. Hence Confirmation may be administered in any private or semi-public oratory, and even in private houses if they are neat and properly kept; also, during the time of an interdict, in an interdicted place.[2]

Can. 792. Every bishop has the right to administer Confirmation within the boundaries of his diocese also in exempt places. When certain exempt regulars, insisting on their privileges, contended that the bishop was not entitled to administer Confirmation in their (parochial or non-parochial) churches, the S. Congregation decided in favor of the bishop, and Benedict XIV fully ratified the respective decisions.[3]

When confirming the bishop may make use of throne and baldachino and pontifical regalia.

Exempt places here are monasteries, convents, academies, colleges, churches and chapels (such as are pleno iure incorporated) of exempt religious, or other exempt persons; but not the exempt territories of prelates or abbots nullius, because these prelates are entitled to administer Confirmation in their own districts.

2 C. 43, X, V, 39; c. 19, 6°, V, 11.
3 "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

SPONSORS

CAN. 793

Ex vetustissimo Ecclesiae more, ut in baptismo, ita etiam in confirmatione adhibendus est patrinus, si haberi possit.

CAN. 794

§ 1. Patrinus unum tantum confirmandum aut duos praesentet, nisi aliud iusta de causa ministro videatur.

§ 2. Unus quoque pro singulis confirmandis sit patrinus.

A most ancient ecclesiastical custom demands that, as at Baptism, so also at Confirmation, a sponsor be employed if possible. He should not stand for more than one or two confirmandi, unless the minister deems it prudent to deviate from that rule for a just cause. Each confirmandus should have but one sponsor.

The custom of employing sponsors at Confirmation would be very venerable indeed if a certain text of Gratian[1] could be ascribed to Pope Hyginus (136–140). Doubtless the practice was universal at the beginning of the Middle Ages. Ancient also is the custom that one sponsor, either a man or a woman,[2] stands for each confirmandus. That at least one sponsor should be employed at Confirmation is a grave obligation, unless weighty and urgent reasons excuse.[3] But the Roman Court will not, — except for reasons of strict necessity (praecisa necessitas) — tolerate the custom that one man stands for all the confirmandi, and one woman for all the confirmandae.

1 C. 100, Dist. 4, de cons. 2 C. 100 f., ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

It is left to the minister of Confirmation to decide whether there is such a strict necessity.[4] If only Sisters are at hand, they may be employed as sponsors for the confirmandae.[5] Now-a-days when spiritual relationship is no longer contracted as an impediment to marriage, the necessity of using only one sponsor for a whole class of males and females respectively seems to have abated. On the other hand, the rule that each confirmandus should have but one sponsor must be obeyed.[6]

REQUISITES OF SPONSORSHIP

CAN. 795

Ut quis sit patrinus, oportet:

1.° Sit ipse quoque confirmatus, rationis usum assecutus et intentionem habeat id munus gerendi;

2.° Nulli haereticae aut schismaticae sectae sit adscriptus, nec ulla ex poenis de quibus in can. 765, n. 2 per sententiam declaratoriam aut condemnatoriam notatus;

3.° Non sit pater, mater, coniux confirmandi;

4.° A confirmando eiusve parentibus vel tutoribus vel, hi si desint aut renuant, a ministro vel a parocho sit designatus;

[3] S. O., Dec. 11, 1850; Sept. 5, 1877; S. C. P. F., May 4, 1774 (Coll., n. 1054, 1480, 503).

[4] S. O., Nov. 20, 1873 (Coll., n. 1408); S. C. C., June 14, July 12, 1823 (Richter, Trid., p. 47, n. 2).

[5] S. Rit. C., Feb. 15, 1887 (Dec. Auth., n. 3670); these religious, however, should have the permission of their superiors and Ordinary. S. O., Sept. 3, 1871 (Coll., n. 198).

[6] C. 3, 6° IV, 3; S. O., Nov. 26, 1873 (Coll n. 1408).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° Confirmandum in ipso confirmationis actu per se vel per procuratorem physice tangat.

To be able to serve as sponsor:

1.° One must be confirmed, have the use of reason and the intention to assume the office of sponsor.

2.° He or she must belong to no heretical or schismatic sect, nor be under any of the penalties mentioned in can. 765, n. 2.

3.° He or she must be neither the father nor the mother nor the consort of the one to be confirmed.

4.° He must be appointed sponsor either by the confirmandus, his parents or guardians, or, if these should fail or refuse to appoint a sponsor, he is to be designated by the minister or pastor.

5.° The sponsor must physically touch the confirmandus in the act of confirmation, either personally or by proxy.

It is unnecessary to dwell on these requisites, which are about the same as explained under can. 765. The act the sponsor is called upon to perform is sometimes called ligare, to bind,[7] because he was supposed to tie a band around the forehead of the confirmandus after he had been anointed with chrism. However the proper act of sponsorship is laying the right hand on the right shoulder of the confirmandus. It is not necessary to put one's foot upon that of the godchild.[8] The act may be done by proxy, says the text. Thus, if the bishop who confirms a child wishes to be at the same time his godfather, he must appoint another to represent him, not confirm 7 Hence the verse: "Ligans, ligatus, ligatique parentes," which expresses the relationship between the sponsor, the god-child, and the latter's parents.

8 S. Rit. C., Sept. 20, 1749, ad 6 (Dec. Auth., n. 2404).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

him with one hand, and hold him with the other.[9] It may be added that the custom of choosing the name of a Saint other than the baptismal one at Confirmation is permissible, but by no means necessary.[10]

REQUISITES OF LICIT SPONSORSHIP

CAN. 796

Ut quis licite ad patrini munus admittatur, oportet:

1.° Sit alius a patrino baptismi, nisi rationabilis causa, iudicio ministri, aliud suadeat, aut statim post baptismum legitime confirmatio conferatur;

2.° Sit eiusdem sexus ac confirmandus, nisi aliud ministro in casibus particularibus ex rationabili causa videatur;

3.° Serventur praeterea praescripta can. 766.

To be licitly admitted to sponsorship at Confirmation:

1.° One must be different from the baptismal sponsor, unless there be a plausible reason to disregard this rule, or Confirmation is legitimately administered immediately after Baptism.

2.° The sponsor must be of the same sex as the one to be confirmed, unless the minister has a good reason to depart from this regulation in an individual case.

3.° The other rules mentioned in can. 766 must be observed.

What was said under can. 766 will suffice on this subject. Let us cite one decision of the S. C. C. Certain pastors having complained to the bishop that they had vainly endeavored to eradicate the custom of having the 9 This seems to have been the custom in a certain diocese; S. Rit. C., June 14, 1873, ad III (Dec. Auth., n. 3305).

10 S. Rit. C., Sept. 20, 1749, ad 7 (Dec. Auth. n. 2404).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

same sponsors at Baptism and Confirmation, the bishop thought it best to tolerate the same. But the S. Congregation decided that, though it may be tolerated, this custom should be gradually abolished.[11] A plausible reason for which a man might be permitted to act as sponsor for a girl would be a special blood relationship, a happy coincidence, or the desire of the bishop to act by proxy as sponsor for a girl or young lady.[12]

SPIRITUAL RELATIONSHIP

CAP. 797

Etiam ex valida confirmatione oritur inter confirmatum et patrinum cognatio spiritualis, ex qua patrinus obligatione tenetur confirmatum perpetuo sibi commendatum habendi eiusque christianam educationem curandi.

Validly conferred Confirmation entails a spiritual relationship between the confirmed person and the sponsor, in virtue of which the latter is obliged to take a special and perpetual interest in the welfare of his godchild and to see to it that he or she receives a Christian education. However, according to can. 1079, this spiritual relationship no longer constitutes a matrimonial impediment and is therefore restricted to the merely spiritual part of education in case the parents fail to do their duty. That godparents, if able, may and should assist their spiritual children in case of need is a dictate of natural reason.[13]

11 S. C. C., Feb. 16, 1884 (Coll. P. F., n. 1612).

12 This seems implied in the decision of the S. Rit. C., June 14, 1873, ad III (Dec. Auth., n. 3305).

13 "Sibi commendatum habere" signifies a kind of protectorship, which must be understood according to the rules of charity. It is true charity, such as preached by Christ and His Church, yet often neglected, and now-a-days almost unknown, or at least not practised.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER V

RECORD AND PROOF OF CONFIRMATION

RECORD

CAN. 798

Nomina ministri, confirmatorum, parentum et patrinorum, diem ac locum confirmationis parochus inscribat in peculiari libro, praeter adnotationem in libro baptizatorum de qua in can. 470, § 2.

CAN. 799

Si proprius confirmati parochus praesens non fuerit, de collata confirmatione minister vel per se ipse vel per alium quamprimum eundem certiorem faciat.

The Rituale Romanum[1] prescribes that a Confirmation record be kept in every church in which this Sacrament is administered. This book, according to our canon, must contain the names of the minister, of the persons confirmed and their parents and sponsors, as well as the date of Confirmation. All these entries must be made by the pastor in a book specially set apart for the recording of Confirmations. Besides, he must also enter every Confirmation in the baptismal record.

Can. 799 enacts that if the parochus proprius of the confirmatus was not present at the Confirmation, he should be informed as soon as possible of the fact by the minister or by some other person.

1 Tit. X, c. 2, prescribes five books: for Baptisms, Confirmations, Marriages, Census, and Deaths. For the form of entering Confirmations see c. 4 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 328 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PROOF

CAN. 800

Ad collatam confirmationem probandam, modo nemini fiat praeiudicium, satis est unus testis omni exceptione maior, vel ipsius confirmati iusiurandum, nisi confirmatus fuerit in infantili aetate.

When no prejudice to others is involved, one trustworthy witness is sufficient to prove the fact of Confirmation. Thus the testimony of the official or authentic record kept in the diocesan archives would be entirely sufficient, as also the pastor's testimony, given under his signature and seal. Besides, says the text, the sworn statement of the one who was confirmed must be admitted as proof, unless he received the Sacrament before he reached the age of discretion.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE III

THE HOLY EUCHARIST

CAN. 801

In sanctissima Eucharistia sub speciebus panis et vini ipsemet Christus Dominus continetur, offertur, sumitur.

In the most Holy Eucharist Christ the Lord Himself is contained, offered, and received, under the species of bread and wine. This is an article of faith and as such properly belongs to dogmatic theology. The Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist has been the belief of the Catholic Church for nineteen hundred years, despite all calumnies, assaults, and blasphemies. The Code, according to the twofold aspect of this holy Sacrament, in fieri and in facto esse, treats of the Holy Eucharist as a Sacrifice and as a Sacrament instituted for the spiritual life of the faithful.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE HOLY SACRIFICE OF THE MASS

The seven Sacraments are intended for all the faithful, and the ancient adage: "Sacramenta propter homines" holds true with regard to all, at least in general. But the membership of the Church is essentially distinguished into clergy and laity, and hence the Church that sanctifies is distinct from the one that is sanctified (ecclesia sanctificans et sanctificata). This fact is most conspicuous in the Holy Eucharist, particularly in the Sacrifice of the Mass, where the hieratic character of the priesthood appears most obviously. Hence the Code naturally treats first of

ARTICLE I

THE CELEBRANT OF THE MASS

CAN. 802

Potestatem offerendi Missae sacrificium habent soli sacerdotes.

Priests alone have the power of offering the Sacrifice of the Mass.

It is not necessary to enter into the controversy regarding the universal priesthood of all the faithful.[1] The distinction between clergy and laity rests on a firm biblical and traditional basis. Only those may offer up gifts and sacrifices who are called by God and validly or-

1 I Pet. II, 9 is abused or wrongly interpreted.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dained,[2] and the fiction of an assembly of predestined or an invisible congregation has never had a place in the Church of Christ.[3] The phrase soli sacerdotes excludes the inferior clergy as well as laymen, who, should they attempt to say Mass sacrilegiously, would not only act invalidly, but also incur severe penalties.[4]

CONCELEBRATING FORBIDDEN

CAN. 803

Non licet pluribus sacerdotibus concelebrare, praeterquam in Missa ordinationis presbyterorum et in Missa consecrationis Episcoporum secundum Pontificale Romanum.

Concelebrating takes place if two or more priests consecrate the same bread and wine or, as at the consecration of bishops, two hosts and the same wine in one chalice. It is, therefore, not a mere recital of the same prayers in general, and of the formula of consecration in particular, but a distinct rite,[5] which was once common in both East and West and is still in vogue in the Orient in cities where there is but one church. All the priests gather around the bishop, with whom they recite the prayers of the Mass and receive the Holy Eucharist under both species.[6] In the Latin Church concelebration is allowed and prescribed only at the ordination of priests and the consecration of bishops according to the Roman Pontifical.[7] Under Innocent III (1198–1216) concelebration was cus-

2 Heb. V, 1.

3 Cf. Trid., sess. 22, De Sacrificio Missae, c. 1, 2; can. 2; sess. 23, De Ordine, c. 1.

4 The penalty is excommunication speciali modo reserved to the Holy See, Can. 2322.

5 Benedict XIV, De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 16, n. 5.

6 Ibid., n. 1; Cath. Encycl., Vol. IV, 190, s. v. "Concelebration."

7 Tit. De Ordinibus Conferendis; tit. De Ordinatione Presbyteri; tit. De Consecratione Electi in Episcopum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tomary on higher feasts, but now it is forbidden in the Latin Church (this canon does not concern the Oriental Rite) [8] except on the two occasions mentioned.

Benedict XIV gives some practical hints for newly ordained priests how to concelebrate with the bishop. He says that the Roman Pontifical prescribes that the bishop should recite the words of consecration "slowly and in a rather loud voice" so that the neomysts may follow, and adds that the latter should have the intention of consecrating the same bread and wine together with the bishop. This is sufficient, and they need not worry about the difficulties proposed by some authors. Those difficulties are absurd because the bishop is the main consecrator and the priests merely concur in the act as accessories; the form they employ is morally one with the form pronounced by the bishop, and consequently, even though they finish the words of consecration a little before or after the bishop, the consecration is valid.[9] The same Pontiff, who was a great canonist, also says that there is no reason for depriving a priest thus celebrating with his bishop of the right of accepting a stipend.[10]

THE CELEBRET

CAN. 804

§ 1. Sacerdos extraneus ecclesiae in qua celebrare postulat, exhibens authenticas et adhuc validas litteras commendatitias sui Ordinarii, si sit saecularis, vel sui Superioris, si religosus, vel Sacrae Congregationis pro Ecclesia Orientali, si sit ritus orientalis, ad Missae celebrationem admittatur, nisi interim aliquid eum com-

8 Benedict XIV, "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 38.

9 De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 16, n. 7.

10 Ibid., n. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

misisse constet, cur a Missae celebratione repelli debeat.

§ 2. Si iis litteris careat, sed rectori ecclesiae de eius probitate apprime constet, poterit admitti; si vero rectori sit ignotus, admitti adhuc potest semel vel bis, dummodo, ecclesiastica veste indutus, nihil ex celebratione ab ecclesia in qua litat, quovis titulo, percipiat, et nomen, officium suamque dioecesim in peculiari libro signet.

§ 3. Peculiares hac de re normae, salvis huius canonis praescriptis, ab Ordinario loci datae, servandae sunt ab omnibus, etiam religiosis exemptis, nisi agatur de admittendis ad celebrandum religiosis in ecclesia suae religionis.

The Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, forbade clergymen to minister in a strange district without letters of recommendation.[11] The Decretals demanded that the testimonies of five bishops should be asked of a clergyman who came from across the sea or was otherwise entirely unknown.[12] This is now reduced to what we call celebret or pastor bonus or litterae commendatitiae, which are given for the secular clergy by the Ordinary and for the religious by the religious superior. The celebret merely attests the bearer's rank in the hierarchy and his freedom from ecclesiastical censure. It must be per se demanded from any priest who wishes to celebrate in a church not his own (extraneus ecclesiae). If he belongs to the Oriental rite, he must show letters from the S. Congregation for the Oriental Church. This rule, we suppose, applies only when a priest of the Oriental rite wishes to say Mass in a church of a different rite and diocese, otherwise it would be difficult to understand 11 Cf. c. 7, Dist. 71.

12 C. 7, 1, X, I, 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

why priests of the Oriental Rite are treated more rigorously than others. The S. C. Propaganda only demands letters given by the respective bishop, or vicar, or prefect Apostolic.[13] Priests who come from an Eastern province to our country need letters from the S. Congregation for the Oriental Church. This was already laid down in the canons on incardination.[14]

Concerning Ruthenian Priests in the U. S. and Canada it seems that the celebret given them by the respective Ordinary or Ruthenian bishop suffices; at least this may be concluded from art. II of the decree of the S. C. Propaganda, Aug. 17, 1914, which says that the Ruthenian bishop may not grant permission to say Mass or perform sacred functions to a strange priest who was neither called by him or sent by the S. Congregation. A priest who was properly admitted by the Ruthenian Bishop, therefore, is under his jurisdiction in everything and needs a celebret only from him. This interpretation is not opposed to § I of can. 304, because the Ruthenian bishop is under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See.[15]

Secular priests receive their celebret either from the diocesan chancery or the vicar-general.[16].

Religious, of whatever denomination, with simple and solemn profession, must obtain a celebret from their own superiors.[17]

13 April 20, 1873 (Coll., n. 1400).

14 The documents concerning the Ruthenian Rite in the Amer. Ecc. Rev.: — Pius X, "Ea semper," June 14, 1907 (Vol. 37, 513 ff.); Letter of the Apost. Delegate, Aug. 25, 1913 (Vol. 49, 473 f.); Decree of S. C. P. F., Aug. 18, 1913, for Canada (Vol. 49, 593 ff.); Decree of S. C. P. F., Aug. 17, 1914, for the U. S. (Vol. 51, 586 ff.)

15 S. C. P. F., Aug. 17, 1914, art. 2 (Amer. Eccl. Rev., 51, 587).

16 Cf. Benedict XIV, Inst., 34, § 1, where he says that even rural deans may issue such a document. This may be accepted if the Ordinary grants him such power, otherwise the text excludes deans.

17 Cf. Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum Ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 6: "Quam Grave," Aug. 2, 1757.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Members of societies without vows, or only the one or other vow, who are not religious in the proper sense, must have a celebret from the local Ordinary.

A celebret is authentic if it is signed and sealed by the Ordinary or religious superior. All such are presumed to be genuine until the contrary is proved.[18] How long they remain valid, adhuc validae litterae, is not stated in our text. However, celebrets are generally issued for one year, but the Ordinary or superior may lengthen or shorten the term. A canonical impediment may be contracted within three or six months.[19] Hence the clause: "unless it has become known in the meantime that the bearer has committed an act which would render it necessary to debar him from saying Mass." Where this is the case, a priest should be refused permission to say Mass in spite of a celebret. Thus if the rector of the church where the priest desires to say Mass knows of a suspension or ecclesiastical penalty or irregularity incurred by that priest, he would have to refuse him permission. But he could not make use of knowledge acquired in confession.[20] This is expressed in the words, commisisse constet, which imply proof to be brought.

§ 2. If a priest has no celebret, either because he has forgotten or lost it, but is known to the rector of the Church where he wishes to say Mass as a priest in good standing, he may be permitted to say Mass. Even if a priest is unknown to the rector, he may be permitted to say Mass once or twice, provided he is dressed in the ecclesiastical garb, accepts nothing for saying Mass from the church in which he celebrates, and duly enters his § 12, which mentions only regulars, but a fortiori includes all other religious.

18 Can. 1813 f.

19 Can. 994, § 1.

20 S. O., Nov. 18, 1682, prop. proscripta (Denzinger, n. 1087).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

name, office and diocese in the book kept for that purpose.

This is a reminder that the ecclesiastical dress should be worn when demanding permission to celebrate Mass. The ecclesiastical dress here primarily means the cassock, but it may also signify the ecclesiastical travelling suit, inclusive of the Roman collar. A cassock may be had in the sacristy of almost any church.

§ 3. Any special diocesan statutes concerning this matter, which are in keeping with the present law, must be observed by all, including exempt religious, unless they wish to say Mass in a church of their own institute. This section extends to all religious, properly so-called, the privilege of saying Mass in a church of their own order or congregation without being bound by diocesan rules, which was formerly a prerogative of exempt religious only.[21] But if a religious wishes to say Mass in a church in charge of secular priests, or of religious of a different order or congregation, he is bound not only by the general law of the Church, but also by the particular laws of the diocese.[22] It is evident that the religious superior of the church where the religious wishes to say Mass is entitled to demand the celebret.[23]

THE OBLIGATION OF SAYING MASS

CAN. 805

Sacerdotes omnes obligatione tenentur Sacrum litandi pluries per annum; curet autem Episcopus vel Superior religiosus ut iidem saltem singulis diebus dominicis aliisque festis de praecepto divinis operentur.

21 S. C. C., July 27, 1626; S. C. P. F., July 28, 1626 (Coll., n. 25).
22 S. O., Aug. 11, 1649 (Coll., n. 118); Benedict XIV, "Quam grave," Aug. 2, 1757, § 12.
23 S. O., l. c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

All priests are obliged to say Mass several times a year. But the bishop as well as the religious superior ought to see to it that the priests subject to their jurisdiction celebrate the Sacred Mysteries at least on all Sundays and holy-days of obligation.

Innocent III complains woefully of some prelates who would not celebrate Holy Mass even four times a year.[24] His complaint led canonists and theologians to speculate how many Masses a priest would have to say every year to avoid grievous sin; for no canonical penalty is mentioned in Pope Innocent's canon. Benedict XIV did not settle the question, though as private author he held that it would be more in conformity with the decrees of Trent if priests said Mass on Sundays and holy-days of obligation, and whenever the Holy Viaticum had to be administered to a sick person.[25] The same Pontiff held that a superior may command his subjects to say Mass,[26] which no doubt is true if there be any outward reason for giving such a command, for instance, Mass for the community, or in time of calamity. But it would certainly exceed the power of a bishop or religious superior to command his subjects to say Mass every day. No canonist or theologian has ever defended such a universal and constant obligation.

Note that our text speaks only of priests as such. The case is different if the obligation of saying Mass arises from reasons of office or benefice. But not even pastors or beneficiaries can be obliged to say Mass every day.[27]

24 C. 9, X, III, 41. If we press the words of St. Thomas, Sent., IV, dist. 13, qu. 1, art. 2; Summa, III, q. 82, art. 10, three times: Christmas, Easter and Pentecost, would be sufficient.

25 De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 1.

26 De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 1, n. 8. The Carthusians said Mass only on Sundays. Ib., l. III, c. 2, n. 5.

27 S. C. C., Sept. 18, 1683; Benedict XIV, De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 3, n. 7 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

BINATING

CAN. 806

§ 1. Excepto die Nativitatis Domini et die Commemorationis omnium fidelium defunctorum, quibus facultas est ter offerendi Eucharisticum Sacrificium, non licet sacerdoti plures in die celebrare Missas, nisi ex apostolico indulto aut potestate facta a loci Ordinario.

§ 2. Hanc tamen facultatem impertiri nequit Ordinarius, nisi cum, prudenti ipsius iudicio, propter penuriam sacerdotum die festo de praecepto notabilis fidelium pars Missae adstare non possit; non est autem in eius potestate plures quam duas Missas eidem sacerdoti permittere.

With the exception of Christmas and all Souls' Day, on which every priest may, if he wishes, say three Masses, no priest is allowed to say more than one Mass a day unless a papal indult or faculty from the Ordinary permits him to do so.

The Ordinary cannot grant this faculty unless he prudently judges that there is such a lack of priests as to leave a considerable number of the faithful without Mass on a holyday of obligation.

No Ordinary can give permission to a priest to say more than two Masses on one day.

Alexander II (1061–73) gives the reasons for this prohibition. "It is no small thing," he says, "to say Mass, and happy is he who says one Mass worthily." To say several Masses a day for the sake of gain or to be flattered by the worldly, he adds, is to merit damnation.[28]

28 C. 53, Dist. 1, de cons.: "Qui vero pro pecuniis aut adulationibus saecularium una die praesumunt plures Missas non aestimo evadere damnationem." Cfr. c. 12, X, III, 41.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The custom of saying three Masses on Christmas is very old, as St. Gregory's homily for that feastday proves, and was acknowledged as lawful by the Decretals, which also permit the celebration of more than one Mass in case of necessity.[29]

The custom of saying three Masses on All Souls' Day was observed in Valencia and Catalonia since the pontificate of Julius III (1550–55), and Benedict XIV extended the privilege to the entire Spanish Kingdom and to Portugal.[30] His successor in the see of Bologna and St. Peter's Chair, our Holy Father Benedict XV, has now granted the same privilege to all priests of the universal Church [31] and embodied it in the Code. Priests who say three Masses on All Souls' Day may receive a stipend for one of them, but one of the two others must be applied pro defunctis and the other according to the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff. A priest who sings or says the conventual Mass may afterwards say two other Masses.[32]

There is no obligation of saying three Masses on Christmas Day. A priest may say one or two according to his good pleasure.[33] But if he says only one or two Masses he should say the Mass which corresponds to the hour of the day, viz., the midnight Mass, about midnight, the second, about daybreak, and the last, after dawn.[34] Those who have obtained a papal indult to say the Mass de Beata on account of poor eyesight are not allowed to 29 C. 3, X, III, 41. The custom is ascribed to Pope Telesphorus (125–136?).

30 Benedict XIV, De Sacr. Missae, l. III. c. 4, nn. 9 ff.; "Quod expensis," Aug. 26, 1748. The Greek liturgies do not mention three Masses; Benedict XIV, "In superiori," Dec. 29, 1755, § 2.

31 Benedict XV, "Incruentum," Aug. 10, 1915; S. R. I. C., Aug. 11, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 401, 422).

32 S. Rit. C., Aug. 11, 1888 (Dec. Auth., n. 3692).

33 S. Rit. C., June 19, 1875 (Dec. Auth., n. 3355).

34 S. Rit. C., June 19, 1875, Feb. 13, 1892, ad XXI. (Dec. Auth., nn. 3354, 3767).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

say three Masses on Christmas Day, but only one.[35] The prayers prescribed by Leo XIII and Pius X to be recited after Low Masses need not be said after each of these three Masses, if the priest does not leave the altar.[36]

These, then, are the two occasions on which each priest is allowed to say several Masses. The general rule is that only one Mass be said each day, unless a papal indult has been obtained or the Ordinary has given permission to binate. A papal indult is required if the Ordinary is not entitled to grant the faculty of binating. Thus a papal indult would be necessary for cloistered nuns who wish to have two Masses[37] and also for having two Masses said in a private Oratory, of which more anon.[38]

The Ordinary may grant — and this is now a power given by law, and not a mere faculty — permission to binate, if the conditions set forth in can. 806, § 2, are verified. These are (a) lack of priests, (b) convenience of the people, (c) a holyday of obligation.

(1) The penuria sacerdotum, or lack of priests, must be such that there is no other priest who could conveniently say the second Mass. There may perhaps be traveling priests,[39] but unknown or of uncertain standing or physical condition, in which case they must be looked upon as not present. On the other hand, if a priest is present who is still fasting and able to say Mass, he may be compelled by the Ordinary to say Mass in order to prevent bination. But in that case the pastor must furnish a stipend, and if he cannot do so, the people are 35 S. Rit. C., April 11, 1840; April 28, 1866; (Dec. Auth., 2802, 3146).

36 S. Rit. C., April 30, 1889 (Dec. Auth., n. 3705).

37 Cfr. Prümmer, O. P., Manuale Theol. Moralis, 1915, Vol. III, p. 200.

38 S. C. P. F., May 24, 1870, n. 6 (Coll., n. 1352).

39 Such was the case in a parish of Barcelona, a summer resort, where sacerdotes ambulantes were to be found, but sometimes they would come late, and sometimes not at all. Wherefore the S. C. C. (July 23, 1892) reasonably did not count them. (A. S. S., 25, 182 ff.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obliged to supply the deficiency, and if they are too poor, the Ordinary must procure the means.[40] Where there are sufficient priests bination is not permitted, because the case of necessity[41] is not verified, and other priests, as Benedict XIV says,[42] are bound to the people by virtue of sacred orders.

(2) The convenience or necessity of the people. Convenience it is to be understood relatively to the place or number of the faithful who would be deprived of Mass. For bination is permitted for the benefit of those who assist at, not of those who say, Mass. The favor is conditioned by distance or insufficiency of room, or the convenience of the people. Thus if a priest has to attend two parishes or missions, which are about half a league or two miles apart from each other, this circumstance suffices to permit bination.[43] The size of the church is also to be considered. If the parish is large and the church building comparatively small, there is sufficient reason for binating.[44] The convenience of the people, which falls under the heading of necessity established by law, but is included in the power of the Ordinary, chiefly depends on the number of the faithful. Our text says, "notabilis fidelium pars." What is "a considerable part of a congregation"? Benedict XIV once explained this term as meaning plures,[45] or several. But no general rule can be deduced from the various decisions of the Roman Congregations. Sometimes fifteen or twenty persons were considered insufficient to permit bination, whereas on other occasions it was left to the 40 Benedict XIV, "Declarasti," Mar. 16, 1746; S. C. P. F., May 24, 1870 n. 9 (Coll., n. 1352).

41 C. 3, X, III, 41.

42 "Declarasti"; S. C. C., May 10, 1897 (Anal. Eccl., t. V, 452).

43 S. C. P. F., May 24, 1870, n. 14 f. (Coll., n. 1352).

44 Ib., n. 10; Benedict XIV, "Declarasti."

45 "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"charity and conscience of the Prefect Apostolic" to grant the faculty of binating when only ten or fifteen servants (servi, slaves) were present. Hence no precise number can be laid down. But it is undoubtedly the mind of the Church that, on the one hand, there must be a real necessity and, on the other, the Ordinary should not be too scrupulous about granting the faculty, but provide for the spiritual welfare of the faithful, so that all may be enabled to comply easily with the precept of hearing Mass.[46] It follows that in large congregations with a small number of priests each may say two Masses on Sundays and holydays of obligation, in order to accommodate the people, some of whom have to stay at home until the others return from church, and so forth.

(3) The faculty of binating, being granted for reasons of necessity and convenience, cannot be made use of except on Sundays and holydays of obligation. Therefore bination on suppressed feasts is not permitted.[47] Nor can the Ordinary grant the faculty for merely devotional purposes, for instance, on the First Friday. The Holy Office has declined to permit bination two or three times a year to satisfy the pious desires of neophytes to receive Holy Communion, considering all the circumstances of time and person in Corea, a missionary country.[48] Such a permission would not lie within the power of the Ordinary, but would need an Apostolic indult.

Permission is never given to say more than two Masses.

The text says that the Ordinary grants the faculty, which signifies that he should grant it to all pastors or curates who may need it. Suppose a pastor or assistant has not received this faculty, and of two priests who are 46 S. C. P. F., May 24, 1870, n. 18.

47 Ibid., n. 5.

48 S. O., June 20, 1860, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1194).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

wont to say one Mass each on holydays of obligation, one is taken ill suddenly, and there is no time left to consult the Ordinary: may the priest who is well say two Masses? Yes, he not only may but should say both Masses,[49] and afterwards notify the Ordinary. But what if the priest has broken the fast? May he then, in order to avoid scandal, say a second Mass? Negative, says the Holy Office.[50]

In order to prevent as much as possible the danger of violating the fast, the S. C. Prop. has issued an instruction bearing on bination. One section concerns bination in different churches, while the other touches bination in the same church.

(a) After having consumed (sorbeat) the sacred blood, the celebrant places the chalice upon the corporal and covers it with the pall. Thereupon he recites the prayer, "Quod ore sumpsimus." Then he washes his fingers in a special bowl, meanwhile reciting the "Corpus tuum." After that he removes the pall from the chalice, covers it with the purificator, paten, pall and velum, and continues the Mass. After the last gospel he stands in the middle of the altar and uncovers the chalice in order to see whether a drop of the sacred Blood has gathered in the chalice.[51] If this is the case, he consumes it, then pours as much water into the chalice as there was wine, rinses the chalice, and pours the water into a special vessel, cleanses the chalice, covers it, and leaves the altar. The "ablution" may be preserved for the next day or 49 S. C. C., Feb. 3, 1884 (Coll. P. F., n. 1611). This decision was rendered in a case where bination took place in two parishes or congregations, but by analogy it may safely be applied to our case.

50 S. O., Dec. 2, 1874 (Coll., n. 1425). Concerning the stipends, see can. 824.

51 The Instruction says: This must not be omitted, because the sacrifice morally continues, and as long as some species of wine is present, it must by divine precept be accepted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

absorbed in cotton and burned or poured into the sacrarium.

(b) If he says the second Mass in the same church, the priest, after having carefully sipped the sacred Blood in the first Mass, shall leave the chalice covered with the pall upon the altar and recite the "Quod ore." Then he shall wash his fingers in a special bowl, say the "Corpus tuum," and cover the chalice with the velum, leaving it on the corporal. After Mass he shall carry the chalice into the sacristy, if there is one,[52] place it in a closed cupboard, and leave it there until the second Mass. At the Offertory of the second Mass he shall not remove the chalice from the corporal at the oblation of the bread, nor clean it with the purificator, nor wipe off the drops of wine inside the chalice, but take care, in pouring the wine into the chalice, that no drops adhere to the inside of the chalice.

MORAL DISPOSITION OF THE PRIEST

CAN. 807

Sacerdos sibi conscius peccati mortalis, quantumvis se contritum existimet, sine praemissa sacramentali confessione Missam celebrare ne audeat; quod si, deficiente copia confessarii et urgente necessitate, elicito tamen perfectae contritionis actu, celebraverit, quamprimum confiteatur.

What this canon prescribes concerning the state of grace required in the celebrant is the ancient doctrine of the Church,[53] and the teaching of moralists.[54] The Code

[52] If there is no sacristy, the chalice may be left on the altar. This is generally done, and we believe may be continued even if there is a sacristy, if the church is safe, and no irreverence to be feared.

[53] C. 7, X, III, 41; Trid., sess. 13, c. 7, de Euch.

[54] Cfr. Lehmkuhl, Theol. Moral.,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

follows the same teaching when it further says if no copia confessarii is at hand and the celebration of Mass is urgent, the priest should make an act of perfect contrition and say Mass, then go to confession as soon as possible, i. e., in about three days. The term "quam-primum" indicates not a mere counsel, but a precept,[55] provided, of course, there be a copia confessarii.

THE OBLIGATION OF FASTING BEFORE MASS

CAN. 808

Sacerdoti celebrare ne liceat, nisi ieiunio naturali a media nocte servato.

A priest is not allowed to celebrate Mass unless he has observed the natural fast from midnight on.

The natural fast before Mass was prescribed by the ancient Church,[56] and the African synods (not without reason, as some of St. Augustine's sermons testify), were very strict in enforcing this ecclesiastical law. The prohibition comprises the taking of anything that is swallowed in the form of nutritive and digestive food or drink, but not what enters the stomach by way of saliva or breathing.[57] Thus if a drop of water is mingled with the sputum when one cleanses his mouth or teeth, the law is not violated. Smoking, nay even chewing tobacco, if nothing is swallowed per modum cibi voluntarii, does not prevent one from saying Mass.[58] Pumping out the II, n. 153; Marc, Institutiones Morales Alphonsianae, ed. 9, n. 1547 ff.; Prümmer, Manuale Theol. Moralis, 1915, III, n. 194.

55 Propp. 38, 39 dam. ab Alex. VII, March 18, 1666 (Denzinger, n. 1009 f.).

56 C. 49, Dist. 1, de consec.; c. 16, C. 7, q. 1.

57 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 160; Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 199.

58 Benedict XIV, De Sacrificio Missae, Appendix IX, where the development of that custom is traced from being laid under excommunication until it was declared not unbecoming.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

stomach, although some water may be absorbed at first but is again given up, would not interfere with saying Mass.[59]

As to the time note that midnight is the starting point. Can. 33, as explained in Vol. I, pp. 177 f., permits us to follow any time, local, mean, or legal, and even where the public clock or time assumed by local custom is generally followed, there is no obligation to abide by it.[60] When several clocks or watches show a difference, one may securely follow the rules of probabilism.[61]

APPLICATION OF THE MASS

CAN. 809

Integrum est Missam applicare pro quibusvis tum vivis, tum etiam defunctis purgatorio igne admissa expiantibus, salvo praescripto can. 2262, § 2, n. 2.

A priest may apply the Mass for the living as well as the dead who expiate their faults in purgatory, with the exception of those mentioned in can. 2262, § 2, n. 2. What the priest is here said to apply is the so-called fructus specialis or ministerialis, i. e., the special fruit or benefit of the Mass offered in the name of Christ and of the Church for a determined end or person. Besides the general blessing which accrues to the Church and the world at large, and besides the personal benefit which the priest derives from the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, there is a special fruit which he may apply ad libitum. It is like a special prayer, which is more efficacious than a general prayer, and receives a particular value from 59 Prümmer, l. c., n. 199.

60 S. Poenit., June 18, 1873 (A. S. S., V, 399); Nov. 29, 1882 (Coll. P. F., n. 1580).

61 Lehmkuhl, II, n. 159. There is no "havoc" to be feared, as a somewhat confused critic observed concerning our interpretation of can. 33, if we follow the sound rules of interpretation and probabilism.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the efficacy of the unbloody Sacrifice itself.[62] Now it has been the constant and perpetual teaching of the Church that the unbloody Sacrifice of the altar benefits not only men living in this world, but also alleviates the sufferings of the souls in purgatory.[63] This it does not only by the general intention of the Church, but still more efficaciously by the application of the special fruit of the Mass by the sacrificing priest.[64]

The Code says that this fruit, whether expiatory or impetratory, may be applied (1) to the living, with the restriction mentioned in can. 2262, where the consequences of excommunication are set forth, among which is privation of spiritual favors and graces. Said canon says that the priest may, if no scandal is given, say Mass privately for an excommunicated person; but if the latter is vitandus, only for his conversion.

The question naturally arises whether Mass may be applied to non-Catholics, either Protestants or schismatics. This question reduces itself to another, viz.: whether Protestants and schismatics are vitandi or not. It cannot be doubted that, if they are formal heretics who pertinaciously deny an article of faith, they are excommunicated, but [65] they would be vitandi only if nominally excommunicated by the Apostolic See, publicly denounced as excommunicated, and expressly designated as vitandi.[66] This is not the case with ordinary Protestants or schismatics, though the latter are dealt with more severely, to 62 Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 173.

63 Trid., sess. 22, c. 2, De Sacrif. Missae, can. 3; sess. 25, de Purgat.; Decretum Unionis Graec., July 6, 1439 (Denzinger, n. 588); Benedict XV, "Incruentum," Aug. 10, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 401):

64 Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, prop. 30 (Denzinger n. 1393); cfr. Pohle-Preuss The Sacraments, 1916, II, p. 392.

65 S. O., July 25, 1865 (Coll., n. 1274).

66 Can. 2258; the only exception to this general rule is the case mentioned in can. 2343, when one maliciously lays hands on the person of the Roman Pontiff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

judge from a decision of the Holy Office,[67] which says, in reply to the question whether a priest may say Mass for, and receive a stipend from, a Greek schismatic, that this is not allowed unless it is manifest that the stipend is offered for his conversion. This decision is reversed by the Code, which clearly says that, unless he is a vitandus, Mass may be offered for him. Therefore, a priest may say Mass privately for any living non-Catholic as long as he does not give scandal, e. g., by announcing the fact publicly. But he is not allowed to sing High Mass for any non-Catholic, except for actual rulers, in which case the welfare of the country is the main purpose of the solemnity.[68]

The next question is whether Mass may be offered for infidels, i. e., unbaptized persons, such as Jews, Turks, etc. The answer is yes, because, on the one hand, they are not excommunicated, never having belonged to the Church, and, on the other, there is no positive prohibition rendering such application unlawful.[69] But the same decision of the Holy Office from which this statement is taken also admonishes priests to scrutinize the purpose for which infidels, especially Mohammedans, offer a Mass stipend. If their intention is evil, or superstitious, or erroneous, the priest should not accept the stipend unless he can correct their error or at least tell them that he will offer the Mass according to the will of God. There is no superstition if they ask for a Mass in order to be freed from sickness, or prison, or capital punishment.[70] Nor was it considered to be superstitious if Christian Chinese made the offering called Phan-huong-hoa, which is a

67 S. O., April 19, 1837 (Coll., n. 858).

68 Cfr. Gasparri, De Ssma Euch., 1897, n. 483; Aichner, Compendium Iuris Eccl., § 51, 2.

69 S. O., July 12, 1865; S. C. P. F., March 11, 1848 (Coll., nn. 1274, 1028); Gasparri, l. c., n. 486.

70 S. C. P. F., March 11, 1848 (Coll., n. 1028).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

burnt offering for the dead made by a last will, because thereby the Christians intended to have Masses said for their deceased relatives.[71] All superstitions or erroneous intentions must be discountenanced when non-Catholics offer a Mass stipend, because to let them go unchallenged would be tantamount to fostering or spreading superstition.[72]

(2) Concerning the dead, the general principle applies that with those with whom we have associated when living we may also associate when dead.[73] Hence for those who have died in union with the Church any kind of Mass, low or high, private or public, may be applied. On the other hand all those to whom ecclesiastical burial is denied are also deprived of the funeral Mass (Missa exequialis.).[74] Therefore no funeral Mass may be said for such as die unbaptized, unless they were catechumens who without their fault died before they received Baptism.[75] Heretics, too, and schismatics, as well as condemned Masons, are to be denied the funeral Mass. Neither are dead rulers or persons of royal blood who were not Catholics to have a funeral Mass.[76]. However the term funeral Mass must be interpreted strictly. It does not include a private Mass not connected with the funeral services. What if a relative offers a Mass stipend for the repose of a deceased non-Catholic? May the priest accept it? A decision of the Holy Office[77] would seem to forbid such acceptance, no

71 S. C. P. F., Aug. 6, 1840 (Coll., n. 910).

72 S. O., July 12, 1865 (Coll., n. 1274). It would be superstitious if one believed that the Mass is an infallible remedy for all kinds of troubles or a sure means of obtaining any grace or favor.

73 C. 1, C. 24, q. 2; c. 12, X, III, 28.

74 Can. 1239–1241.

75 For living and dead catechumens or converts in fieri, therefore, Mass may be said; cfr. c. 2, X, III, 43; Gasparri, l. c., n. 487.

76 Gregory XVI, Feb. 16, 1842.

77 S. O., April 7, 1875 (Coll., n. 1440).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

matter whether the application is publicly known or known only to the priest and the person who offers the stipend. Yet in spite of this decision some authors say the priest may accept the offering privately on condition that he expressly declares that he will say the Mass as far as he is allowed to do so and according to the will of God.[78] This seems a plausible theory if the non-Catholic in question was not a bigoted and prominent defender of his belief, and especially if he was kindly disposed towards the Catholic religion, or died with signs of repentance. For the above-named decision lays stress on "manifest heresy." Besides our Code (can. 1240) insists upon notorious heresy or schism, which rarely occurs in our country. As to dead infidels or non-baptized persons no decision is known to us that would either forbid or allow the application of a Mass for them. However, a funeral Mass is forbidden. Whether a private Mass is allowed must, we believe, be decided according to the rule laid down with regard to baptized non-Catholics.[79]

PREPARATION AND THANKSGIVING

CAN. 810

Sacerdos ne omittat ad Eucharistici Sacrificii oblationem sese piis precibus disponere, eoque expleto, gratias Deo pro tanto beneficio agere.

The priest should not omit to prepare himself for the [78] Lehmkuhl, l. c., n. 176; Gasparri, l. c.; n. 4091, says that the priest would be allowed to accept the offering, but would have to declare that the Mass would be applied for all the poor souls with the intention of succoring the particular person if it pleased God. Lehmkuhl, l. c., excludes a "Black" Mass with a special oration pro hoc defuncto acatholico. A "Black" Mass pro defunctis could be said if the rubrics permitted.

[79] Thus Gasparri, l. c., n. 489, but the decision which he quotes from S. C. P. F., April 18, 1757 (Coll., n. 405; ad 5) only speaks of schismatics.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

celebration of the Eucharistic Sacrifice by pious prayers and give thanks to God for this great grace after celebration.

It is understood that the celebration of the divine office, especially in choir, is a fitting preparation for Mass, because the liturgical office tends towards the Sacrifice as its center.

VESTMENTS FOR MASS

CAN. 811

§ 1. Sacerdos, Missam celebraturus, deferat vestem convenientem quae ad talos pertingat et sacra ornamenta a rubricis sui ritus praescripta.

§ 2. Abstineat autem a pileolo et annulo, nisi sit S. R. E. Cardinalis, Episcopus vel Abbas benedictus, aut nisi apostolicum indultum eorundem usum in Missa celebranda eidem permittat.

The priest, when saying Mass, shall wear the cassock (soutane) and the sacred vestments prescribed by his rite; but no ring or skullcap, unless he is a cardinal, a bishop, or a blessed abbot, or unless an Apostolic indult permits him to wear these insignia at Mass.

The rule laid down in § 1 is sufficiently known from the general and special rubrics. No departure from it is allowed without weighty reasons. Such a reason would be persecution. But even in times of persecution the Holy See would not be likely to grant a general permission to all the priests of the province or country involved, but only to some who might be expected to make a wise use of the privilege.[80] The term sui ritus implies that [80] S. C. P. F., Nov. 30, 1828 for China (Coll., n. 807). Bishops and Vicars Apostolic should wear the rochette, ring, and pectoral cross, unless there is a grave and urgent reason which excuses them.— S. C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Latin priests must observe the rules of the Latin rite as to the various vestments and their color, and that Oriental priests must follow the practice of their rite.

§ 2 enumerates the skullcap and the ring, which by law may be used only by Cardinals, bishops and abbots. No others are allowed to wear these insignia, though there seems to have been a special temptation to wear the ring. Rome has never allowed Cathedral and Collegiate Canons to wear a ring at sacred functions, not even when an immemorable or inveterate custom could be claimed.[81] Neither is a Commendatory Prior or Abbot, or the Provost of a Collegiate Chapter entitled to wear a ring.[82] Nor does the title of doctor give a claim to it, although it confers the right of wearing a ring outside the sacred functions.[83] The height of ambition was reached by some pastors, especially archpriests (arcipreti), of a Sicilian diocese, who claimed the right to pontificate or chant High Mass with ring and purple mantelletta and surrounded by four ministers in cope.[84] A papal indult was granted to the Protonotaries Apostolic de numero participantium to wear a ring and black skullcap at all sacred functions, and to supernumerary Protonotaries Apostolic to wear a black skullcap under the mitre at Pontifical Vespers, and the ring at all functions.[85] The Vicar-General and honorary Prothonotaries Apostolic are not allowed to wear either the ring or the skullcap at any function.[86] We may add that no

P. F., March 22, 1669 (Coll., n. 178 ad 1); on vestments see Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. I, c. 7.

81 S. Rit. C., Nov. 20, 1628; April 11, 1840; Aug. 20, 1870; March 9, 1844 (Dec. Auth., nn. 483, 2805, 3218, 3821).

82 S. Rit. C., April 12, 1704, ad 2; Aug. 4, 1657 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2130, 1032).

83 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1846; June 30, 1883 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2907, 3580).

84 S. Rit. C., July 28, 1876; Jan. 30, 1878 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3408, 3442).

85 Pius X, "Inter multiplices," Feb. 21, 1905, nn. 4, 9 (Am. Eccl. Rev., 32, 614).

86 Ibid., nn. 27, 28, 31, 47–49 (Am. Eccl. Rev., 32, 619 f.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google titular abbot is entitled to wear either ring or skullcap unless this privilege was especially granted to him, and that there is no obligation to wear a skullcap at sacred functions either for prelates [87] or for the others who are entitled to these insignia by privilege, unless perhaps for the reason of using the privilege. There is some significance in the ring, but very little in the skullcap.

NO ASSISTANT PRIEST ALLOWED AT MASS

CAN. 812

Nulli sacerdoti celebranti, praeter Episcopos aliosque praelatos usu pontificalium fruentes, licet, sola honoris aut sollemnitatis causa, habere presbyterum assistentem.

With the exception of bishops and prelates entitled to the use of pontificals, no priest is allowed to have an assistant priest in celebrating Mass merely for the sake of honor or solemnity.

The right of pontificating belongs by law to Cardinals outside of Rome. If they pontificate in cathedral churches, which they may do upon due notice to the Ordinary of the diocese, they may employ a presbyter assistens.[88] Bishops and archbishops are expressly mentioned as entitled to this privilege. Other prelates who enjoy it are abbates regiminis, after they have been blessed by the bishop, and abbots or prelates nullius.[89] The supernumerary Protonotaries Apostolic may also have a presbyter assistens if no bishop or prelate of higher rank than a bishop is present. Protonotaries Apostolic ad instar may employ an assistant priest only when they pontificate outside their church or in other [87] All the texts only say poterunt, they may.

[88] Can. 239, § 1, 15.

[89] Can. 325; can. 625.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

churches when no bishop or higher prelate is present.[90] Canons of Cathedral or Collegiate churches, although dignitaries, and provosts are not allowed to have a presbyter assistens.[91] Much less can the custom, even though immemorable, be tolerated that simple priests celebrate Mass with an assistant priest.[92] But what about the custom of employing a presbyter assistens at the first Holy Mass of a newly ordained priest? This question was placed before the Sacred Congregation, who answered: posse tolerari.[93] In itself this answer does not sound favorable, since it implies a mere negative toleration; yet we believe the Code does not mean to reprobate the custom, because a presbyter assistens is, on such an occasion, not employed for mere honor or pomp, but for the purpose of aiding the neopresbyter.

MASS WITHOUT A SERVER

CAN. 813

§ 1. Sacerdos Missam ne celebret sine ministro qui eidem inserviat et respondeat.

§ 2. Minister Missae inserviens ne sit mulier, nisi, deficiente viro, iusta de causa, eaque lege ut mulier ex longinquo respondeat nec ullo pacto ad altare accedat.

A priest shall not say Mass without a minister who serves and answers him. Women may not serve Mass unless no man is present and there is a just cause, and then they must answer from a distance and not approach the altar.

90 Pius X, "Inter multiplices," nn. 29, 47 (Am. Eccl. Rev., 32, 619, 623).

91 S. Rit. C., Aug. 7, 1628; April, 1666; Sept. 10, 1701; Sept. 19, 1883 (Dec. Auth., nn. 475, 1337, 2078, 3588).

92 S. Rit. C., July 28, 1876; Jan. 30, 1878 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3408, 3442).

93 S. Rit. C., Dec. 1, 1882 (Dec. Auth., n. 3564).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The obligation to have a server at Mass is per se grievous, as it is prescribed by the rubrics.[94] However, by reason of the faculties formerly granted to our Ordinaries and communicated by them to all their priests, we have become accustomed to say Mass without a server for reasons which really would not stand the canonical and moral test. Does custom even now excuse us from grievous transgression in this matter? Where normal conditions exist in a regularly established parish it would be difficult to excuse the old custom. But where missionary conditions still prevail we believe priests need not scruple to say Mass without a server, especially when there are some frequent communicants and the boys are in school or on vacation. For there can hardly be a doubt that the spiritual benefit is proportionately greater than the observance of a law which, if too strictly enforced, would diminish religious fervor. This is our view. For the rest, all authors[95] agree that Mass may be said without a server if the Viaticum has to be consecrated, or on holydays of obligation for the people as well as the priest, or if the server should leave after Mass is considerably advanced.[96] Attention may be called to the fact that in our country people are neither scandalized nor surprised to see a priest say Mass without a server.

As to women, Benedict XIV ruled that they shall not serve at the altar, but the sacred Congregation has since permitted girls in institutions or Sisters to answer the 94 C. 6, X, I,17; Conc. Basil., sess. 21, c. 8; Missale Rom., Ritus Servandus in Celebratione Missae; Gasparri, l. c., n. 645 ff. The server at low Mass should not open the missal, or mark the several parts of the prayers, as the S. Cong. has forbidden this. The prohibition also applies to prelates inferior to bishops when they say Mass privately; Gasparri, l. c., n. 648.

95 Cfr. Lehmkuhl, II, n. 244.

96 "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VI, n. XXI; "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 29 (referring to a Greek custom).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

priest from behind a railing in case of necessity.[97] It seems to us that it would be preferable, for reasons of mere devotion, to employ a woman server, than to say Mass without any server at all.[98] But the faculty granted in virtue of Form I, Art. 23, to say Mass without a minister can no longer be made use of.[99]

ARTICLE II

RITES AND CEREMONIES OF THE MASS

The Species

CAN. 814

Sacrosanctum Missae sacrificium offerri debet ex pane et vino, cui modicissima aqua miscenda est.

CAN. 815

§ 1. Panis debet esse mere triticeus et recenter confectus ita ut nullum sit periculum corruptionis.

§ 2. Vinum debet esse naturale de genimine vitis et non corruptum.

The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass must be offered in bread and wine, and to the latter must be mixed a few drops of water.

The bread must be of pure wheat and freshly baked, so that no corruption need be feared.

The wine must be natural wine made of the juice of the grape and uncorrupted.

Can. 814 embodies an article of faith.[1] The Armen-

97 S. Rit. C., Aug. 27, 1836; March 18, 1899 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2745, 4015).

98 Lehmkuhl, l. c.

99 S. C. Consist., April 25, 1918 (see Vol. II, p. 587); Putzer, Comment. in Facul. Ap., ed. 4, p. 277; Am. Eccl. Rev., 55, 314.

1 Trid., sess. 22, can. 9, de Sacrif. Missae.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ians, who were more or less inclined to Monophysitism, stubbornly refused to mix a little water with their wine. The Church, on the other hand, was just as tenacious in upholding the Apostolic or divine tradition and refused to deviate from it, though she freely acknowledges that the water does not belong to the essence of the sacrifice (de necessitate sacramenti).[2] Therefore converted Armenian priests must adopt the Catholic practice,[3] which is based on John 19, 34 and Apoc. 17, 1, 15, as the Council of Trent says.[4] Our text, following the rubrics of the Missal, says modicissima aqua, a very small quantity. This means about three to ten drops. If the water would exceed in quantity one-third of the wine, consecration would be doubtful.[5]

§ 1 of can. 815 requires pure wheaten bread for valid consecration. This excludes every other kind of grain, such as barley, rye, oats, maize (corn), rice or potato flour, as also an admixture of one or more of the aforesaid substances. The wheat used may be hard or soft, red or white, etc., just so it is really wheat. If spelt is considered a hard-grained variety of wheat, it is valid matter; but if it is taken as an intermediate product between wheat and barley it is not valid. This depends much on local nomenclature.

The wheat must be recently baked into bread, as bread is usually made,[6] that is mixed with water, not milk, or wine, or oil, or spices. Recenter confectus signifies, not that the flour must be freshly ground, but that the bread must be recently baked, i. e., it should not be older than

2 S. C. P. F., Jan. 30, 1635 (Coll., n. 81).

3 S. O., Aug. 7, 1704 (Coll., n. 267).

4 Sess. 22, c. 7, de Sac. Missae.

5 Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 173.

6 S. O., June 23, 1852 (Coll., n. 1076) permitted the custom of putting ground grain into water for several hours to solve it and then placing the mass on hot irons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fourteen days.[7] In summer as well as in moist weather or damp places the danger of corruption is especially great, and hence the frequent renewal of the bread under such conditions is not only advisable, but imperative. A late decree of the S. C. of Sac. says that altar bread should not be bought for two or three months ahead and that hosts more than two or three months old cannot be used for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and for Communion.[8]

As to the form of the bread, round hosts are used in the Latin Church, whereas the Oriental Church employs square hosts.[9] The size of the host for Holy Mass and exposition in the Ostensorium should be from two to three and of the particles for distribution about one inch. The altar breads should be neither too thick nor too thin.[10]

§ 2 describes the quality of the wine. It must be natural wine made from grapes. But no wild grapes may be used,[11] whilst wine obtained from pressed grapes, if it has the taste, smell and color of wine, is allowed.[12] The wine must be fermented, for this is a natural quality of wine, but it should not contain more than 12 per cent. of alcohol. If wine is very weak, so that it would suffer from transportation or be easily corrupted, an admixture with wine spirit (alcohol obtained from wine) is permissible. But the mixture is to be made in such a way that the alcoholic percentage of both the natural wine and the wine alcohol does not exceed 12 per cent., and when the wine is still young, after the first fermentation.[13]

7 S. Rit. C., Dec. 1826; Sept. 12, 1884 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2650, 3610).

8 S. C. Sacr., Dec. 7, 1918 (A. Ap. S., XI, 8).

9 Benedict XIV, De Sac. Missae, I, c. 6.

10 Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 171.

11 S. C. P. F., 1819 (Coll., n. 732); Gasparri, l. c., nn. 811 ff.

12 S. O., July 22, 1706; May 7, 1879 (Coll., nn. 270, 1518).

13 S. O., July 30, 1890 (Coll., n. 1735).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Spanish wines, being very sweet and easily liable to corruption, especially in transit, may be mixed with wine alcohol to such an extent that the whole alcoholic percentage would amount to 17 or 18 per cent.[14] If the wine does not contain sugar enough to preserve it, it is permitted to evaporate or boil the grapes recently pressed (must) so as to obtain a wine of 14 or 16 per cent. of alcohol. But this process is allowed only if it does not prevent the natural fermentation of the wine.[15] Not easily tolerated, or tolerated only for very special reasons and with the express approval of the Sovereign Pontiff, is the following: Ten pounds of sugar cane are mixed with 100 pounds of wine grapes, and both fermented until about sixty-seven pounds are left.[16]

These and other decisions show how careful the Church has been in procuring genuine bread and wine for the Holy Sacrifice, and how strictly she enjoins on Ordinaries to use great care in selecting wheat and wine dealers to supply the needs of the clergy.[17] A new obligation seems to arise for hierarchy and clergy from extreme prohibition. (For can. 816 see Appendix, pp. 572 sqq. infra.)

CAN. 817

Nefas est, urgente etiam extrema necessitate, alteram materiam sine altera, aut etiam utramque, extra Missae celebrationem, consecrare.

It is unlawful, even in case of extreme necessity, to consecrate one species without the other, or to consecrate both outside the Mass.

14 S. O., Aug. 5, 1896; May 22, 1901 (Coll., nn. 1950, 2113).

15 S. O., May 22, 1901 (Coll., n. 2113).

16 S. O., June 25, 1891 (Coll., n 1757).

17 S. O., July 9, 1881; Aug. 30, 1901 (Coll., nn. 1556, 2122).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first of these clauses touches the very essence of the Mass, which most probably consists in the consecration of both species. However, theologians [18] generally admit, following the Missale Romanum,[19] that the consecration of one species would be valid without the consecration of the other. This might happen if a priest would grow seriously ill after the consecration of one species, or if, by mistake, he would consecrate water and no wine would be at hand, or danger of death would immediately follow the consecration of one species. Yet all these are merely physical accidents. Intentionally to consecrate only one species is never allowed, not even to provide the Viaticum, although such consecration would be valid.[20]

To consecrate outside the Mass would not only be a sacrilege, but probably also an attempt at invalid consecration. The priest would certainly not perform that action in the person of Christ, nor according to the intention of the Church, which is restricted to the celebration of the Mass.[21]

OBSERVANCE OF RUBRICS AND RITES

CAN. 818

Reprobata quavis contraria consuetudine, sacerdos celebrans accurate ac devote servet rubricas suorum ritualium librorum, caveatque ne alias caeremonias aut preces proprio arbitrio adiungat.

18 Cfr. Noldin, Summa Theol. Moralis, 1912, De Sacram., n. 102.
19 De Defectibus, c. IV, nn. 5, 8.
20 Noldin, l. c., and n. 104.
21 Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 176.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 819

Missae sacrificium celebrandum est lingua liturgica sui cuiusque ritus ab Ecclesia probati.

The priest, when celebrating Holy Mass, must accurately and devoutly observe the rubrics of the respective ritual books and avoid the arbitrary addition of other ceremonies and prayers. Every contrary custom is hereby reprobated.

There is a distinction between prescriptive and directive rubrics which should be retained.[22] The obligation imposed by prescriptive rubrics is greater and more serious than that which attaches to merely directive rubrics. The former concern the celebration of the Mass itself, whilst the latter refer to what immediately precedes or follows the celebration, for instance, how the priest should approach or leave the altar, etc. But even the prescriptive rubrics do not all oblige with equal strictness. They distinguish between the ordinary and the extraordinary parts of the Mass, the former being such as occur in every Mass (confession, orations, offertory, breaking of the host and the dropping of a particle into the chalice), whereas the latter occur only in a certain kind of Masses (Gloria, Tract, Credo, various commemorations, etc.). But the juridical obligation of saying everything according to the rubrics, whether in red or black, is undeniable.[23] The rubrics of the canon in particular must be carefully followed.

No addition is allowed even for the sake of devotion, and the prayers and ceremonies must not be curtailed[24]

22 Noldin, l. c., n. 208 f. It would be unreasonable to reject this distinction, and lead to unnecessary scruples, or Jansenistic rigorism, or Pharisaism.

23 S. Rit. C., Nov. 12, 1605 (Dec. Auth., n. 194).

24 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or mutilated. Hence no arbitrary prayers, ejaculations or gestures are to be used.

These rules also bind, to their fullest extent, all religious, whether exempt or not. They are not allowed to insert in the canon the name of their superior, unless, of course, he is an abbot nullius.[25] Should they attempt any change or mutilation or addition, the Ordinary may proceed against them with ecclesiastical censures, against which no appeal or injunction or inhibition is permissible.[26]

The ceremonies and prayers of the Mass must be carried out according to the respective ritual books. Hither refers also can. 819, which rules that Mass must be celebrated in the liturgical language proper to each one's rite, as approved by the Church. The Roman Pontiffs, whilst permitting and upholding the Oriental rites, at the same time kept watch against schismatical tendencies. The reason is obvious: the lex orandi reflects the lex credendi. Therefore the Orientals, no less than the Latins, are obliged to use the liturgical books approved by Rome.[27]

The liturgical language is Latin for the whole Western Church, and wherever else it is in use, as, for instance, in parts of Servia.[28] The Oriental Rites differ in language. The Missal for the Latin Church was issued and approved by Pius V, in 1570, and the last revision, comprising the chant, was made in 1883 by authority of Leo XIII. As to the monastic Missal, enough has been said

25 Ibid.

26 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 6; S. Rit. C., March 16, 1591; Aug. 19, 1651 (Dec. Auth., n. 9, ad 19, n. 937, ad II). Why regulars should wear a hood (caputium) instead of a birretta is not quite intelligible.

27 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § IX, n. XVIII; "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743, § 11; "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 18.

28 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," § 18.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in Vol. III of this Commentary; we will only add that its general rubrics are identical with those used by the secular clergy.

Every edition of the Missal must be approved by the S. Rituum Congregatio, or at least contain a declaration by the Ordinary that it conforms to the edition of 1883. Lately a few additions have been made as to the Gregorian Chant, especially with regard to the "Gloria" and "Ite Missa est," of which we now have fifteen varieties,— certainly not to the gain of uniformity.

No mixture of rites or change from one rite to another by the same priest is allowed. Thus the Greeks are not allowed to say Mass in the Latin Rite, even in a Latin Church, nor are Latin priests allowed to celebrate Mass in the Greek Rite,[29] for instance, on the antimensia of Ruthenian churches. An exception was made in favor of some Oriental colleges in Rome and of the Greek College under the direction of the Benedictines, who may say Mass either in the Latin or in the Greek Rite. But this singular provision, made for the benefit of the students of these colleges, not for the benefit of the priests to whom the college is entrusted, cannot be alleged as a precedent for violating the general rule of not mixing the various rites.[30]

A curious mixture, however, is noticeable in the provinces of Gorizia, Zara, and Zagrab, where the use of the old Slavic or Glagolitic language is permitted under certain conditions which have been established by the S. Rit. C. after a protracted and heated controversy.[31]

29 St. Pius V, "Providentia," Aug. 20, 1566; "Quoprimum," July 14, 1570, § 3; Benedict XIV, "Impositio Nobis," March 29, 1751, § 9.

30 Benedict XIV, "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 34 f.

31 S. Rit. C., Feb. 13, 1892; Aug. 5, 1898 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3768, 3999); Aug. 14, 1900; March 14, 1902 (Anal. Eccl., VIII, 417; X, 206; XV, 22). Some Chinese missionaries were allowed to say Mass tecto capite, but the custom was to be eliminated gradually; S. C. P. F.,

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Finally it may be added that Mass must be celebrated in a standing, not sitting, posture. This rule, being merely ecclesiastical, does not bind the Pope, who may therefore sit when saying Mass. Any other priest would need a papal indult (S. C. Sacr.) to say Mass either partly or entirely in a sitting posture.[82] Of course, when the rubrics permit the minister to sit down, he may and should do so.

ARTICLE III

TIME AND PLACE OF CELEBRATING THE MASS

CAN. 820

Missae sacrificium omnibus diebus celebrari potest, exceptis iis qui proprio sacerdotis ritu excluduntur.

Holy Mass may be celebrated on all days except those on which the respective rite forbids the priest to say it.

In the Latin Church the general rubrics prescribe that no private Masses be celebrated during the three days preceding Easter. This is to be understood as follows: On Maundy Thursday one solemn Mass should be celebrated in all the churches where the Blessed Sacrament is preserved[83] and the liturgical functions are performed according to the Memoriale Rituum issued by Benedict XIII. In churches where, on account of a lack of clerics or servers, the sacred ceremonies cannot be duly held, the bishop may grant permission to the priests to say a low Mass for the convenience of the people. However, this Mass should be said before the solemn High Mass

July 31, 1673 (Coll., n. 206). They were not, however, allowed to say Mass in the Chinese language; S. C. P. F., Jan. 7, 1755 (Coll., n. 394).

82 Benedict XIV, "Aestas," Oct. 11, 1757, nn. VII–XII.

83 S. Rit. C., March 28, 1775 (Dec. Auth. 2503).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in the cathedral or mother church begins. Besides, according to the decree,[34] this permission must be obtained anew every year. However, even setting aside the contrary custom, the bishop can undoubtedly issue a faculty to be valid for a number of years. In a large diocese the annual issuance of such faculties would cost time and money without any special benefit.

Religious communities, under a decree of the S. Congregation of Rites,[35] may have one Mass said in their chapels, even though the prescribed liturgical functions are not performed there on the three days preceding Easter. If they have no chapel of their own, they may hear a private Mass in a neighboring church, but the doors must be shut.[36] If a feast of obligation falls on Maundy Thursday, it must be transferred to the day following Low Sunday, but the obligation of hearing Mass and abstaining from servile work remains attached to the original day.[37]

On Good Friday only one Missa Praesanctificatorum may be celebrated, and priests who have two parishes to attend to are not allowed to binate on that day.[38]

On Holy Saturday only one solemn Mass may be cele-34 S. Rit. C., July 31, 1821 ad 1 (Dec. Auth., n. 2616); "petita quotannis venia" is put in brackets.

35 S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1839 (Dec. Auth., n. 2799). This may be extended to seminaries and pious places which have their own chaplain and the right of preserving the Bl. Sacrament. S. Rit. C., June 28, 1821, ad 1 (Dec. Auth., n. 2616); whether the venia Episcopi, as Gasparri (l. c., n. 81) maintains, is required, is doubtful. Contrary custom would rather deny it.

36 Doubtless this provision was added because of the parochial service, with which the private service should not clash.

37 S. Rit. C., Sept. 13, 1692 (Dec. Auth., n. 1883). If the feast of the Annunciation falls on Good Friday or Holy Saturday, the whole feast with all the obligations is to be transferred to the Monday after Low Sunday; S. Rit. C., March 11, 1690. If a patron feast falls on that day, the obligation of abstaining from servile work remains for Good Friday, but the obligation of hearing Mass ceases; Gasparri, l. c., n. 85 f.

38 Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, c. 5, n. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

brated in churches in which the liturgical functions of Holy Week are performed. Private Masses are not easily allowed in any church on that day.[39] In small or poor parishes a low Mass may be said if custom permits. But neither a local nor personal indult permits private Masses to be said in churches which are not parish churches. Therefore a special indult is required for such, and the priest who says this Mass must omit every ceremony and commence with the Confessio without the Introitus. A bishop who ordains on that day in his private chapel must begin the Mass with the prophesies.[40] Priests of the Oriental Rite do not say Mass on days of strict fasting. Thus during Lent they celebrate only the Missa Praesanctificatorum, except on Saturdays, Sundays, and high feastdays, when they say Mass as usual.

THE HOUR FOR SAYING MASS

CAN. 821

§ 1. Missae celebrandae initium ne fiat citius quam una hora ante auroram vel serius quam una hora post meridiem.

§ 2. In nocte Nativitatis Domini inchoari media nocte potest sola Missa conventualis vel paroecialis, non autem alia sine apostolico indulto.

§ 3. In omnibus tamen religiosis seu piis domibus oratorium habentibus cum facultate sanctissimam Eucharistiam habitualiter asservandi, nocte Nativitatis Domini, unus sacerdos tres rituales Missas vel, servatis servandis, unam tantum quae adstantibus omnibus ad praecepti quoque satisfactionem valeat, celebrare potest et sacram communionem petentibus ministrare.

39 S. Rit. C., Feb. 12, 1690 (Dec. Auth., n. 1822).
40 Gasparri, l. c., n. 88 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Mass should not be commenced earlier than one hour before dawn, nor later than one hour after noon.

The starting-point is dawn, or daybreak (aurora), which, of course, depends on the hour of sunrise. Dawn in our country lasts about one hour and a half.[41] Therefore a priest is allowed to begin Mass about two hours and a half before sunrise. This, we believe, should be early enough for all reasonable demands, especially since the legislator himself has now added one hour to the time allowed before by common law. We do not believe that exempt and other religious who claim the privilege, granted after the Council of Trent, of celebrating one hour before dawn and one hour after noon, will now be allowed to extend the same to two hours. For the legislator by extending the time has not extended the starting-point (dawn) for the privilege. The privilege granted before the Council of Trent appears somewhat doubtful and it is in the ordinary power of bishops to compel even exempt religious to abide by the rule fixing the hour for celebrating Mass.[42] But we would not doubt the right of anticipating the hour of celebrating Mass when necessary for administering the viaticum [43] for devotion's sake. Another case of necessity would undoubtedly be the obligation of hearing Mass for working people who would otherwise have to arise before five o'clock in winter. (In summer time the case of necessity would hardly be verified.) Still another case of necessity would arise for the priest from the precept of 41 See the table of duration of dawn in Benedict XIV's Inst., 13, and Gasparri's, De Ssma Euch., Vol. I, p. 65. Dawn, on May 1, lasts here, at Conception, Mo., 42nd degree latitude, one hour and 45 min.; on Jan. 1, 1 hour and 39 min.; on Oct. 13, 1 hour and 31 min. See infra, Appendix.

42 Benedict XIV, Inst., 68, n. 11.

43 "Praeceptum sumendi viaticum praevalet legi ecclesiasticae de tempore celebrandi Missam."—S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hearing Mass on a holyday, which otherwise could not be complied with by reason of a necessary journey.[44]

The bishop may permit Mass, especially on a solemn occasion, to be protracted until after two P. M.[45] But he is not empowered to forbid the saying of Mass before sunrise.[46] In countries where there is hardly any dawn, as in the polar regions, Mass may commence about the time people arise and go to work.[47]

§ 2. On Christmas night only the conventual or parochial Mass may be commenced at midnight to the exclusion of every other Mass not granted by special Apostolic indult.

§ 3. In all religious or pious houses which possess an oratory with the faculty of habitually keeping the Holy Eucharist, one priest may say one or three Masses according to the rubrics Christmas night. Those who assist thereat comply with the obligation of hearing Mass, and Holy Communion may be administered to such as desire it.

The moment at which Mass may be begun on Christmas is the hour of midnight, not before. Hence it would be an abuse to commence Mass so early that the priest would be at the gospel or elevation when the clock struck twelve.[48] There is no strict obligation (inchoari potest) to commence at midnight, for the service may be postponed if there is an impediment. But the rubrics require of those bound to say public office, like cathedral chapters, and most of the regulars, that they sing 44 Noldin, l. c., n. 204; Marc, l. c., II, n. 1625.

45 S. Rit. C., July 7, 1899 (Dec. Auth., n. 4044).

46 S. Rit. C., Jan. 10, 1597 (Dec. Auth., n. 62).

47 Cong. Specialis, Sept. 18, 1634. The reason why Mass is to be celebrated at daytime is because Christ, the brightness of eternal light, is offered up therein.—Benedict XIV, Inst., 13, n. 2.

48 S. Rit. C., May 11, 1878, ad XV; June 2, 1883, ad X (Dec. Auth., nn. 3448, 3576).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Matins before the Mass and Lauds after it. This order may not be changed on that day.[49]

Our text clearly states that only the conventual or parochial Mass may be commenced at midnight. Hence neither canons, nor dignitaries, nor regulars of any kind or exemption, nor religious in general, may, in virtue of the common law, say three Masses immediately after midnight.[50] The priest who says the conventual or parish Mass at midnight must wait with the other two Masses until the rubrical time has arrived,[51] that is to say, till about five thirty A. M., when he may say the other two. It requires an apostolic indult to say the three Masses one immediately after the other, commencing at midnight. An indult, though a species of privilege, is not given by way of communication, and therefore no communicatio privilegiorum is permissible in this case. This is evident also from the fact that the custom of celebrating the three Christmas Masses at midnight has been condemned as an abuse which must be entirely eliminated.[52]

§ 3, then, grants by universal law a favor which formerly was given only by a special indult. Thus, for instance, the Ursulines, their pupils and lay sisters enjoyed this privilege of a Mass and Holy Communion at midnight,[53] where their rules approved by the Holy See prescribed this custom.[54] Pius X, the great promoter of devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, extended this favor to all religious institutes, pious houses and clerical sem-

49 S. Rit. C., April 3, 1830 (Dec. Auth., n. 2676).

50 S. Rit. C., Nov. 22, 1681; March 23, 1686 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1683, 1761).

51 S. Rit. C., Nov. 14, 1676 (Dec. Auth., n. 1584).

52 S. Rit. C., Sept. 18, 1781 (Dec. Auth., n. 2520).

53 S Rit. C., July 27, 1720 (Dec. Auth., n. 2267).

54 S. Rit. C., Aug. 7, 1871, ad IX (Dec. Auth., n. 3254).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

inaries.[55] Our text simply says: "in all religious or pious houses." What a religious house is may be seen from can. 488, 5°, where such a house is said to belong to a religious institute in general. From this it follows that all communities of religious may enjoy the right granted in this canon. A pious house is one where Christian charity is practiced under the supervision of ecclesiastical authority. Charity here comprises every species of good works, educational, corporeal works of mercy, etc. But it is essential that such a house be superintended by ecclesiastical authority.[56] To this class belong hospitals, asylums for the aged, orphans, and foundlings, clerical seminaries, and houses of religious societies of men and women (see can. 673). The latter cannot strictly be called religious houses, because not inhabited by religious in the canonical sense of the word, but in a wider sense they may safely be styled religious houses. A doubt may arise concerning hospitals conducted by religious but really superintended by lay or civil officials. However, if the religious form a community of their own, and have their own oratory, in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept, we would not exclude them from the benefit granted by this canon. A different status is that of our State asylums and penitentiaries. They are purely secular institutions, entirely managed by seculars, even though there be a temporary chapel where the Blessed Sacrament could hardly be kept. These, therefore, are not entitled to the favor here in question.

Our canon requires that in all such houses there be an oratory endowed with the privilege of habitually keeping the Blessed Sacrament. According to certain decrees of the Holy Office, of 1907 and 1908, it makes no differ-

[55] S. O., Aug. 1, 1907; Nov. 26, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, 146).

[56] Devoti, Institut. Canonic., 1874, Vol. I, p. 560; cfr. can. 1489.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ence whether this oratory be public, semi-public, or private. If it is a private oratory, an apostolic indult is needed to keep the Blessed Sacrament, whilst for a semi-public or public oratory the permission of the Ordinary is sufficient, as shall be seen under can. 1265.

The text furthermore says that one priest (unus sacerdos) may say one or three Masses (Missas rituales). Hence if there are more than one, the others must say Mass later. The three Masses must be said according to the rubrics, i. e., as they follow each other in the Missal, and not all three according to the formulary pro Missa in Nocte. But if a priest (for instance, an assistant at the cathedral who is also chaplain of a convent or hospital) says only one Mass, he is bound to observe what the law prescribes, servatis servandis. In other words, if he says but one Mass at midnight, he must say the other two Masses according to the rubrical time, i. e., the second not earlier than about 5.15 or 5.30 A. M., and the third, de die, after that.

The last clause is an extension of the decrees of the Holy Office of 1907 and 1908, which require that the doors of the oratory be shut (ianuis clausis). Our canon contains no such clause, wherefore outsiders, for instance, friends and relatives, may be admitted and by assisting comply with the precept of hearing Mass on Christmas Day, and also, if they so desire, receive Holy Communion. This is plainly expressed in the words: adstantibus omnibus, all who assist. But this favor can not be extended to the churches of religious, whether exempt or not, for not only was it directly denied to them by decree of the Holy Office, Nov. 26, 1908,[57] but our [57] "An indultum oratoriis concessum extendi possit ad ecclesias religiosorum, quae publico fidelis populi usui inserviunt? Negative, salvo tamen religiosorum privilegio in media nocte Missam celebrandi."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

text itself excludes such an extension, as it speaks only of religious or pious houses which have an oratory, not of churches. The reason obviously is not to create a prejudice against parish churches. However, the same decree allows, and the text of our canon does not forbid, religious to have a midnight Mass for themselves, i. e., behind closed doors, at which the members may receive Holy Communion.

THE PLACE FOR SAYING MASS

CAN. 822

§ 1. Missa celebranda est super altare consecratum et in ecclesia vel oratorio consecrato aut benedicto ad normam iuris.

§ 2. Privilegium altaris portatilis vel iure vel indulto Sedis tantum Apostolicae conceditur.

§ 3. Hoc privilegium ita intelligendum est, ut secumferat facultatem ubique celebrandi, honesto tamen ac decenti loco et super petram sacram, non autem in mari.

§ 4. Loci Ordinarius aut, si agatur de domo religionis exemptae, Superior maior, licentiam celebrandi extra ecclesiam et oratorium super petram sacram et decenti loco, nunquam autem in cubiculo, concedere potest iusta tantum ac rationabili de causa, in aliquo extraordinario casu et per modum actus.

§ 1. Mass must be celebrated upon a consecrated altar and in a consecrated or blessed church or oratory.

The Latin Church does not allow the unbloody Sacrifice to be offered except on an entirely consecrated altar, or at least on an altar stone consecrated according to the prescribed rules (see can. 1197 ff.). The Orientals use a so-called antimension or linen cloth blessed by the bishop, into the corners of which relics are sewed, and which is spread over the altar table.[58]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The general rule for the Latin Church is that, outside the case of extreme necessity, it is never allowed to say Mass in a place which is not sacred (in aedibus non sacris),[59] or, as our text has it, outside a church or an oratory which is either consecrated or blessed. In private and semi-public oratories, which are neither blessed nor consecrated, Mass may be celebrated only if they fulfil the necessary requirements, as stated in can. 1196. In private houses, especially sick persons, it is allowed to say Mass only if the viaticum can be neither secretly nor publicly brought to the sick.[60]

The altar stone must contain sacred relics. If the relics have been removed, the stone must be reconsecrated. To consecrate altars without relics for saying Mass requires a very special indult, such as was given to vicars Apostolic in times of persecution.[61]

§ 2 and 3. The privilege of a portable altar is granted either by law or by an indult of the Holy See. This privilege carries with it the faculty of celebrating Mass in any place, provided it be respectable and decent, and upon an altar stone; only celebration at sea is excluded. Before the Council of Trent bishops were empowered to grant permission to have a private oratory for the purpose of having Mass said therein, but after the Council this right, and consequently also the grant of a portable altar, was reserved to the Apostolic See.[62] This change, 58 Benedict XIV, "Impositio Nobis," March 29, 1751, § 4; In., De Sacrif. Missae, l. I, c. 2; cfr. cc. 1, 2, 11, Dist. 1, de cons.

59 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1774, § 22.

60 S. C. P. F., Dec. 14, 1668; April 30, 1753 (Coll., nn. 172, 388).

61 S. Rit. C., Oct. 6, 1837; Dec. 7, 1844; May 23, 1846 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2777, 2876, 2911); S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1802; May 14, 1681 (Coll., nn. 660, 223).

62 Benedict XIV, "Magno cum

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

however, did not affect the private oratories in episcopal palaces, because the latter are not comprised under the name of private houses.[63] Therefore episcopal oratories, as well as those of Cardinals,[64] exist by law. If special privileges are asked for, the S. C. Sacr. is competent to grant them.[65]

It must be added that even exempt religious require a special privilege, ratified after the Council of Trent, to make use of a portable altar, and the Ordinary, in virtue of Sess. XXII, decretum de observandis et evitandis in celebratione missae, may proceed against them if they presume to celebrate upon a portable altar or keep such an altar in their rural houses.[66] All privileges granted to that effect before the Council of Trent, even by the Pope himself, must be regarded as revoked.[67] On the other hand, Cardinals as well as bishops may continue to use the portable altar even without the permission of the local Ordinary in whose diocese they may wish to say Mass.[68] The clause, "non autem in mari" does not apply to Cardinals and bishops,[69] but to all others, unless besides the indult of a portable altar they also have a special indult permitting them to celebrate Mass on shipboard.[70]

§ 4. The local Ordinary, or, in the case of an exempt religious house, the higher superior, may grant permisanimi," June 2, 1751, § 11; Id.; De Sacrif. Missae, III, 6, 5 f.

63 Benedict XIV, Const. cit., § 2.

64 Cfr. can. 239, § 1, 7°; can. 349, § 1, n. 1.

65 Normae Peculiares, c. VII, art. 3, n. 11 (A. Ap. S., I, 88).

66 S. C. C., June 4, 1672, Aug. 29, 1761 (Richter, Trid., p. 130, nn. 9 f.).

67 S. C. C., March 23, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., t. 15, 101 ff.).

68 Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, 6; n. 5; cfr. c. 12, 6°, V, 7.

69 Can. 239, § 1, n. 8; can. 349, § 1, n. 1.

70 S. Rit. C., March 4, 1901, ad 4 (Anal. Eccl., t. 9, 115): "Si capella navium locum fixum habeat in navi, uti publica pro navigantibus habenda est; secus neque publica est neque privata, sed habetur ut altare portatile;" ad V, ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sion to say Mass outside a church or oratory, upon a consecrated altar stone, provided the place is decent (no bed room) and the permission is granted for a just and reasonable cause, for extraordinary cases only, and not habitually.

This canon contains part of the faculty formerly granted to our American bishops.[71] Two Ordinaries are named in § 4: the local Ordinary and the Ordinary of exempt religious. To begin with the latter, note that the major superior of exempt religious can give the permission in question only with regard to a house of his own religious institute. Hence he cannot permit his subjects to say Mass in a strange place not owned by the religious, for instance, on a missionary trip.[72] In this case the competent Ordinary would be the Ordinary in whose diocese the religious wishes to say Mass. But if the house belongs to, and is occupied by, religious of the same order, the legitimate superiors, i. e., the general, the provincial and all those who represent the former, may grant the permission in question.

The local Ordinary is the one commissioned to watch over his diocese, and is responsible for abuses which may creep into it. He may grant the permission in question under the following conditions:

(1) That Mass be said upon an altar stone which contains sacred relics and is validly consecrated and prepared.[73]

(2) That the place in which Mass is to be said is decent or respectable. Decency must be gauged not by adornment merely, but by the respect and reverence due to the august Sacrifice. It is forbidden to say Mass in 71 Form I, art. 6; cfr. Putzer, Comm., p. 277 ff.

72 S. C. P. F., Nov. 18, 1765 (Coll., n. 461).

73 S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the churches of heretics and schismatics (see can. 823, § 1), and it would be improper to offer the holy Sacrifice in the private houses of unbelievers or non-Catholics. Theatres and Masonic temples could hardly be styled respectable places for saying Mass, although the former might be used in case of extreme necessity. The open air would be a decent place.

(3) That no permission be given to say Mass in bedrooms (in cubiculis). Hence it would be better, in case of necessity, to choose the living or sitting room for saying Mass. However the S. C. Prop. has given permission to say Mass in the sleeping room of a sick person (in cubiculo infirmi) if there is no other way of administering the Viaticum.[74] But then the minister should see to it that there are no indecent or superstitious emblems or pictures in the room.[75]

(4) That the permission be granted for a just and reasonable cause. As stated above, the Blessed Sacrament may never be exposed to irreverence, nor should the faithful be scandalized. A just reason would be if an epidemic raged in the town or city which would necessitate the closing of the churches; if there were no Catholic church or public oratory in the town or city,[76] or if the precept of receiving Easter communion could not otherwise be complied with; or if the administration of the Viaticum required it.[77] War and social disturbances would be an additional reason for granting the permission.

(5) This permission, however, is not to be understood as an habitual faculty or a right to be used by the priest ad libitum, but only, as the text says, "in casu extraor-

74 S. C. P. F., April 30, 1753 (Coll., n. 388).

75 S. C. P. F., Sept. 6, 1821 (Coll., n. 764).

76 S. C. P. F., April 30, 1753, ad 2 et 4 (Coll., n. 388).

77 S. C. P. F., Sept. 5, 1821 (Coll., n. 764).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dinario et per modum actus." This would seem to imply that a priest should ask for it every time he deemed it necessary. However, we believe the Ordinary can grant the permission to priests in such a way that they would not have to ask for it every time they needed it, provided, of course, the conditions set forth in this section be present.[78] Lastly, it may be noted that this permission may be granted so as to allow Mass to be said in private houses and on any day;[79] but the permission must be issued gratis.[80]

CAN. 823

§ 1. Non licet Missam celebrare in templo haereticorum vel schismaticorum, etsi olim rite consecrato aut benedicto.

§ 2. Deficiente altari proprii ritus, sacerdoti fas est ritu proprio celebrare in altari consecrato alius ritus catholici, non autem super Graecorum antimensiis.

§ 3. In altaribus papalibus nemo celebret sine apostolico indulto.

§ 1 forbids saying Mass in churches of heretics and schismatics, even though these may have once been duly consecrated or blessed.

That the church sometimes reconsecrates temples formerly belonging to heretics, is proved by historical examples dating back to the sixth century (Arians).[81] From this practice it follows that churches once consecrated and hallowed by Catholic services, when they have fallen into the hands of non-Catholics, are considered desecrated and therefore unfit for the celebration of the

78 S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846).

79 S. C. Sacr., March 22, 1915, ad 1 (A. Ap. S., VII, 147).

80 S. C. Sacr., Dec. 23, 1912, ad 1 (A. Ap. S., IV, 725).

81 Cfr. cc. 21, 22, Dist. 1, de cons.; Benedict XIV, "Iam inde," May 12, 1756, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sublime Mystery. The decisions of the Roman Court are to the effect that rather than say Mass in a non-Catholic temple a priest should use a portable altar or celebrate the Holy Sacrifice in a private house.[82] However, the Holy Office once permitted the archbishops of Antivari to use a schismatic church, provided a separate Catholic altar was set up therein and one part of the church was reserved exclusively for Catholics.[83] But this was a case of necessity. Ordinarily priests should rather make use of portable altars. In another instance the Holy Office permitted the simultaneous use of a garrison chapel at Malacca for Catholic and non-Catholic services, but instructed the Vicar Apostolic to ask the government to build a separate chapel, or, if that could not be done, to build one himself from alms collected. It may be added that Clement XI permitted Catholic services to be held in so-called "simultaneous churches[84] in Switzerland.[85]

§ 2. A Latin priest may celebrate Mass on a consecrated altar of another rite, but not upon a Greek antimension. These antimensia being, as stated, not altar stones, but consecrated sheets of linen, do not come up to the requirements of the Latin Church.[86]

§ 3. On papal altars no one is allowed to say Mass without a special indult. Benedict XIV gives two reasons why an altar is called papal: either because it was consecrated by the Pope or because he said Mass upon 82 S. C. P. F., May 21, 1627; Feb. 13, 1629; May 7, 1631 (Coll. nn. 34, 47, 69): neither chalices nor vestments of schismatics may be used.

83 S. O., Dec. 1, 1757 (Coll., n. 408).

84 S. O., June 5, 1889 (Coll., n. 1707).

85 S. O., June 13, 1634 (Coll., n. 75); Putzer, l. c., p. 279. "Simultaneous" churches are those in which Catholics and Protestants hold service at different hours.

86 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," § VI, nn. VIII, XIX; S. O., June 7, 1726 (Coll., n. 306).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it.[87] Several altars in Rome are called papal, viz., those of the patriarchal basilicas of St. John Lateran, St. Peter, St. Paul, and Santa Maria Maggiore. There are also a few papal altars outside Rome. Benedict XIV sent one to Lisbon[88] and on another occasion declared the high altar on the side of the pontifical throne in the church of St. Francis at Assisi a papal altar.[89] From this we may conclude that to the two reasons stated a third must be added, viz., a special distinction granted directly by the Sovereign Pontiff. The consequence is that no one, not even a Cardinal or bishop, may say Mass on such an altar without a papal indult. This indult is generally affixed to the altar when another than the Pope says Mass on it. The reason for this rule lies in the dignity of the consecrator or grantor of the privilege.[90]

ARTICLE IV

ALMS OR STIPENDS FOR MASSES

CAN. 824

§ 1. Secundum receptum et probatum Ecclesiae morem atque institutum, sacerdoti cuilibet Missam celebranti et applicanti licet eleemosynam seu stipendium recipere.

§ 2. Quoties autem pluries in die celebrat, si unam Missam ex titulo iustitiae applicet, sacerdos, praeterquam in die Nativitatis Domini, pro alia eleemosynam recipere nequit, excepta aliqua retributione ex titulo extrinseco.

§ 1 approves the time-honored custom which allows

87 "Dilectus Filius," Jan. 15, 1745, § 1 (S. Maria Maggiore).

88 "In postremo," Oct. 20, 1756, § 9.

89 "Fidelis Dominus," March 25, 1754.

90 Cfr. c. 97, Dist. 2, de cons.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

every priest who says Mass to accept an alms or stipend for the same.

In the early days of Christianity the faithful were wont to offer bread and wine at each Mass which they attended. Money too was sometimes laid upon the altar, intended either for the poor members of the congregation or for the clergy in common. The practice of giving alms to a determined priest so that he might offer the special or ministerial fruit of the Holy Sacrifice either for the donor or his relatives and friends, began about the eighth century and became universal after the twelfth. There is no incongruity in applying the Mass for a special person or purpose. For, although the Holy Sacrifice, by reason of its main offerer and object, viz., Christ, is of infinite value, yet the special fruit or effect is not infinite, and therefore one person may derive greater profit from it than the rest, and repeated oblations for a particular person or object will produce their effect more certainly and abundantly.[91] Nor is there any simony connected with receiving a Mass stipend. For, as St. Thomas says,[92] the priest does not receive the stipend as a price for the consecration of the Holy Eucharist, but as part of his support. Hence Wiclif and his followers misunderstood the nature of prayer for others when they called those who obliged themselves to pray for others simonists.[93] Mistaken also was the notion of the pseudo-council of Pistoja that the application of the priest did not produce a special effect in favor of those for whom it was made, and that the acceptance of stipends was a shameless abuse.[94] It cannot be denied, however, that abuses did creep in. Some avaricious priests either 91 Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, c. 21, nn. 1–7.

92 Summa Theol., II–II, q. 2, art. 2.

93 Cfr. prop. 25 (Denzinger, n. 501).

94 Propp. 30, 54 (Denzinger, nn. 1393, 1417).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

traded in Masses or said Mass several times a day for filthy lucre's sake.[95] These abuses prompted the Church to enact, in the matter of stipends, severe laws, which are now embodied in the Code. We add to § 1 only one comment, namely, that the text requires that Mass be said and applied. Saying Mass, therefore, is not sufficient to justify a stipend, but application of its special fruits must be made at least before the consecration of the wine. A habitual intention once made and not consciously retracted suffices. It is also sufficient if one celebrates according to the intention of the superior who distributes Masses to his subjects. If one has received a number of stipends and does not remember from whom or in what order they were given, it is sufficient that he say them with the intention to apply them in the order in which they were given. If another has collected the stipends, it suffices that the one who says the Masses have the intention of saying them according to the order intended by the distributor.[96]

§ 2. A binating priest who is obliged to apply one Mass ex titulo iustitiae, is not allowed to accept a stipend for the other. An exception to this rule is Christmas Day, on which a priest who says three Masses may accept three stipends. A partial exception to the general rule is the privilege of accepting some compensation for the other Mass for a reason which is extrinsic to the nature of a Mass-stipend as such (ex titulo extrinseco). Our parish priests and bishops are now obliged in justice to apply Holy Mass for the people (pro populo) on Sundays, holydays of obligation, and the suppressed holydays mentioned in can. 466 and 339 (see Vol. II of this Commentary).[97] No pastor is allowed to accept a stipend

[95] Benedict XIV, l. c., n. 8.
[96] Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 188 f.
[97] Vol. II, p. 550. See also S. C. C., July 13, 1918 (A. Ap. S., XI,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

on such days. For the titulus iustitiae is strictly attached to the obligation of saying Mass for the people. The only exception is for Christmas Day, when the pastor must apply only one Mass for his people, and may accept stipends for the other two.[98] On All Souls' Day he may receive a stipend for one of the three Masses; and even if he says only one, he is entitled to a stipend.[99] For this day is not one of the holy-days mentioned in canons 466 and 339.

Now what is an extrinsic title which permits a priest to accept a remuneration for one Mass, whilst he is obliged to offer another ex titulo iustitiae? The general rule may be stated thus: It must not be of the nature of a stipend given for the application of the special fruits, nor of the nature of a just claim which would oblige the priest to apply them ex iustitia. The Church has never, except for very special reasons, allowed the acceptance of two stipends on one day. An extrinsic title, therefore, would exist if one had to walk a considerable distance to say a Mass for which he is not entitled to accept anything, or if he had to fast for an unusually long time to impart an extraordinary instruction to which he were not otherwise obliged.[1] Besides if bound merely by the titulus caritatis, he would be allowed to say Mass to which this title obliges him. There is an authentic decision to this effect. A congregation of priests obliges its members to say one Mass for every deceased member. The question arose: May a priest of that society, when he bi-46 ff.), S. C. Cons., Aug. 1, 1919 (A. Ap. S., XI, 346 f.), has definitely settled this question. For the decree quoted requires three things: definite boundary lines, residence, and endowment. And these conditions certainly obtain in many city, and even in some country parishes.

98 Benedict XIV, "Quod expensis," Aug. 26, 1748; S. C. C., Sept. 25, 1858.

99 Benedict XV, "Incruentum," Aug. 10, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 403).

1 S. C. C., May 23, 1861; cfr. Prümmer, Theol. Moral., III, n. 288.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nates, apply the second Mass for a deceased member? The S. Congregation answered yes.[2] From this we may infer that the members of a purgatorial society of priests, on days on which they are allowed to binate, may apply one Mass for their people (or accept a stipend if they are not obliged to say Mass pro populo), and say the other for a deceased member of the society. For a purgatorial society is based upon the titulus caritatis no less than the above-mentioned congregation. We may further conclude that priests of a religious community who are compelled to binate, may apply one Mass for their deceased members, and the other either pro populo or for the donor of a stipend. Here again the titulus caritatis is obvious.

This extrinsic title, however, cannot be invoked for the two Masses which the priest says on All Souls' Day, one for all the deceased faithful and the other according to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff. Therefore, even if he has to say Mass at an inconvenient hour, or in a rural oratory, or on a cemetery, he is not allowed to accept anything for his labor or inconvenience. Furthermore, the stipend to which priests are entitled for one Mass must not exceed the usual or customary or synodal tax, though they are allowed to accept free offerings that are in no wise solicited. Besides, priests are forbidden to receive a stipend and apply the other two Masses which they may say on All Souls' Day for another person or purpose, reserving the two for the poor souls and according to the intention of the Holy Father for another day. The bishop may proceed against priests who fail to comply with these rulings with ecclesiastical censures, including suspension.[3]

2 S. C. C., Sept. 14, 1878 (Coll. P. F., n. 1500); it is, of course, supposed, that the priest says one Mass ex titulo iustitiae or stipendii, otherwise no decision would have been required.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The S. C. Propaganda sometimes, for particular reasons, granted permission to receive a stipend for both Masses a priest had to say.[4] But this faculty was never given in virtue of the formularies formerly issued, nor is it to be expected now, except in very extraordinary circumstances.

CAN. 825

Nunquam licet:

1.° Missam applicare ad intentionem illius qui applicationem, oblata eleemosyna, petiturus est, sed nondum petiit, et eleemosynam postea datam retinere pro Missa antea applicata;

2.° Eleemosynam recipere pro Missa quae alio titulo debetur et applicatur;

3.° Duplicem eleemosynam pro eiusdem Missae applicatione accipere;

4.° Alteram recipere eleemosynam pro sola celebratione, alteram pro applicatione eiusdem Missae, nisi certo constet unam stipem oblatam esse pro celebratione sine applicatione.

It is forbidden:

1.° To apply a Mass for the intention of one who may ask for the application of a Mass and offer a stipend in future, but who has not yet asked for it, and to keep the stipend afterwards given for the Mass already said. This would be a sort of interpretative intention. The priest, in this case, only surmises or supposes that he is to receive a stipend, but is certain neither as to the per-

[3] S. C. C., Oct. 15, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 480).

[4] S. C. P. F., Oct. 15, 1863; May 24, 1870 ad 18 (Coll., nn. 1244, 1352).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

son nor as to the stipend expected. This practice was strictly forbidden by the S. Congregation, though some theologians, especially in Spain, had defended it.[5]

It would not be contrary to law if one said Mass for the intention of a person who requested the favor but would offer the alms only after the Mass had been applied.

It is unlawful:

2.° To receive a stipend for a Mass which is due and must be applied for some other reason. Thus a pastor who is obliged to apply a Mass for his people, may not receive a stipend for the same, even though his salary is not sufficient to support him.[6] A canon or beneficiary who is bound to apply Mass for the benefactor or founder of the benefice or chaplaincy, is not allowed to receive a stipend other than the one that may accrue from the benefice or foundation.[7] For a conventual Mass, which is generally offered for the living and the dead benefactors of the community, no stipend may be accepted.[8]

It is furthermore forbidden:

3.° To accept two stipends for the application of one and the same Mass. Even after the Council of Trent, which branded the abuse of Mass stipends as akin to simony, there were theologians who thought it permissible to receive two stipends for one Mass. The reason they gave was that the fruit of the Mass which may be disposed of by the priest according to his own good pleasure, is of two kinds: satisfactory and impetratory. The former may be applied for a deceased person and the latter for a living sick person. Besides, they argued,

5 Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, III, 22, 10.

6 S. C. C., Aug. 30, 1698; Feb. 1716 (Richter, Trid., p. 134, n. 32).

7 S. C. C., Nov., 1702; Sept. 18, 1603 (ibid., nn. 33, 64).

8 S. C. C. June 28, 1708; May 16, 1733 (ibid., nn. 56, 58).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the priest may, as it were, give up his own personal fruit for the benefit of another and therefore receive a stipend for that as well as for the special or ministerial fruit. Hence, they held, it is permissible to receive two stipends for one and the same Mass. But neither the Holy Office nor the S. Congregation of the Council shared this opinion; on the contrary, they condemned the practice based upon it.[9]

It is unlawful, finally,

4.° To receive one stipend for the celebration, and another for the application of the same Mass, unless it is certain that one stipend has been offered for the celebration alone without the application. Two decisions of the S. Congregation may illustrate this text.[10] A pious testator had founded a benefice or chaplaincy with the express clause that the priest or beneficiary was not obliged to apply the Mass. The S. Congregation decided that the fruit or interest of the benefice might be accepted and a stipend taken for the application of the same Mass. In another case a founder had directed that a Mass be said by the chaplain on every Sunday and holy-day of obligation, without specifying on whose behalf it should be said or applied. In that case, because nothing certain could be deduced from the will, the chaplain was instructed to apply for the benefit of the founder. Perfectly legitimate is the acceptance of an offering for singing a High Mass in the place of a sick or absent pastor, who may not be able to sing that Mass on that day, but says nothing about its application, for instance, pro populo. In that case the substitute may accept the offering for the singing

9 S. O., Sept. 24, 1665, prop. 8, 10 (Denzinger, nn. 979, 981); S. C. C., Dec. 13, 1859; Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, 22, 4 f.

10 S. C. C., July 13, 1630; March 18, 1668; Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, 22, 6 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the High Mass and receive a stipend for the special intention. For it is evident that the offering is given for the special labor of singing High Mass and accommodating the absent pastor, who would be obliged to sing it himself if he were at home.[11]

VARIOUS KINDS OF MASS STIPENDS

CAN. 826

§ 1. Stipendia quae a fidelibus pro Missis offeruntur sive ex propria devotione, veluti ad manum, sive ex obligatione etiam perpetua a testatore propriis heredibus facta, manualia dicuntur.

§ 2. Ad instar manualium vocantur stipendia Missarum fundatarum, quae applicari non possunt in proprio loco, aut ab iis qui eas applicare deberent secundum tabulas fundationis, et ideo de iure aut Sanctae Sedis indulto aliis sacerdotibus tradendae sunt ut iisdem satisfiat.

§ 3. Alia stipendia quae ex fundationum reditibus percipiuntur, appellantur fundata seu Missae fundatae.

§ 1. Stipends offered, as it were, offhand by the faithful for Masses, either out of pure devotion, or in the form of an obligation, even perpetual, imposed upon his heirs by the testator, are called manual.

§ 2. Quasi-manual are stipends for foundation-masses, which for one reason or another cannot be said in the church in which, or by the priest by whom, they should be said according to the charter, and are therefore, either

11 This is also true of a low Mass, especially if one would have to travel a certain distance to say it for the required purpose, e. g., to enable the faithful to comply with their duty on a Sunday or holy-day of obligation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by law or by an Apostolic indult, to be handed over to other priests.

§ 3. Other stipends which are received from the interest of legacies, are called foundations. In order to understand the distinction between these three kinds of Masses we must proceed from the term foundation, which here means a legacy or testamentary bequest of goods or chattels, which,[12] by a legal fiction, bears the character of an artificial person or quasi-corporation. A foundation or pious legacy made for a good purpose is what we call a pia causa and possesses a juridical entity of its own. A foundation or founded Mass in the sense of our canon is a legacy made by a testator for the purpose of having a Mass said either at a certain place (altar, chapel, church) or by a certain priest. Such a legacy, to be valid, must be accepted by those to whom it is made, and made according to the rules prescribed by the Church. It may entail special conditions or qualifications which must be conscientiously carried out. A founded Mass, therefore, would be one to be said on a certain altar or in a certain church for all time. But if the testator had expressly stipulated only a certain altar or church, but no particular application, the Mass would not be a foundation, though it might be a benefice or chaplaincy. On the other hand, if the testator has not expressly excepted the application of the Mass, it is always to be presumed that the Mass is a founded Mass to be applied for the legatarius.[13] Sometimes the testator determines the priest who is to say the Mass, for instance, the chaplain attached to a certain church, or altar, or who says Mass at a specified hour (primassarius) or, more generally, the priests

12 Blackstone-Cooley, Com., Vol. II, 512.

13 S. C. C., Jan. 11, 1710 et pluries (Richter, Trid., p. 137, n. 55); cfr. can. 1544 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

assigned to a certain parish. If no special priest is mentioned, the choice is left to the heirs to determine.[14] Finally, it may happen that a testator leaves, say, $1000 for Masses to be said each year forever without further determination. In that case the executor has to see to it that the will is put into effect.[15] The final obligation rests on the heirs, who may relieve themselves of further responsibility by handing over the legacy to the Ordinary. In the last hypothesis no foundation would be created because no obligation is attached to any particular church or altar, nor are the celebration and application of the Masses imposed on a determined priest. Hence such Masses are really manual stipends. $1000, at 5% interest, would produce $50 per annum and entitle the testator to fifty Masses.

Quasi-manual Masses arise from founded Masses which are to be said either in a particular church or by a specially designated priest. If the testator has left it to the Ordinary to make a change concerning the place or priest, the latter may de iure order such a change and assign another altar or church and give the stipend to another priest. If the charter contains no clause as to the free choice of place or person, the Holy See (S. Cong. Conc.) must be asked. For the last will of the faithful is to be respected, especially with regard to Masses.[16]

A manual stipend may, therefore, be called an offhand stipend involving no obligation other than the application of the Mass. A quasi-manual stipend, on the other hand, 14 S. C. C., Jan. 15, 1639 and passim (Richter, l. c., n. 59 f.).

15 Here it may not be amiss to draw attention to certain civil laws. Where these are not favorable to such legacies, it would be wise not to mention the specific purpose for which the sum is left, but leave it to the executor to specify and apply it. But the heirs are under grievous obligation of handing over the money.

16 Urban VIII, "Cum alias," ad dub. 1 (Richter, Trid., p. 146).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is a modified foundation, the obligation of which is limited as to place or person. A foundation proper, finally, is a legacy attached either to a certain place (altar, chapel, church) or to a certain priest by the will of the testator.

NO TRAFFICKING IN MASSES ALLOWED

CAN. 827

A stipe Missarum quaelibet etiam species negotiationis vel mercaturae omnino arceatur.

Every species of bartering or trafficking with Mass stipends must be strictly avoided.

The terms negotiatio and mercatura are nearly synonymous, except that the former, which may be translated by bartering or exchange of wares, has perhaps a more general meaning. Trafficking is a common term for buying and selling for the sake of gain. Even negotiato includes the notion of profit, at least in common parlance. To understand this canon fully, it must be viewed in the light of the following decisions.

1. Collecting of Mass stipends by booksellers and other merchants through public advertisements and promises of premiums is strictly forbidden, as is also the distribution of stipends in the form of books or merchandise, whether to the full amount of the stipends or retaining a profit, no matter whether this profit is given to pious institutions or kept by the agent, whether others have handed over these stipends to said merchants or whether they have collected them themselves. Stress is to be laid on the act of collecting and the number of Masses.[17]

2. It is also forbidden to diminish Mass stipends; thus [17] S. C. C., July 25, 1874, n. 1–5 (Coll. P. F., n. 1423).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from Masses to be said in a celebrated sanctuary nothing may be deducted for the adornment or decoration of the altars, etc.[18]

3. According to a decision of the S. C. C., it would not be trafficking if good books or magazines were given in place of stipends, or if other merchandise were given for the same by ecclesiastics.[19] However, a decree ("Vigilanti") of May 25, 1893, prohibits accepting books from booksellers in lieu of Mass stipends. It is not without reason that Cardinal Gasparri in his notes omits all reference to this mitigated interpretation. In general, therefore, whatever savors of trade or bartering is forbidden, no matter what some theologians say who wrote before the Code. On the other hand, we hardly believe that a priest would be forbidden to give a book to a brother priest with the request: "Please say a Mass according to my intention." For there is no trafficking involved in such an agreement. The purpose of the legislator is to exclude trading in Masses.

CAN. 828

Tot celebrandae et applicandae sunt Missae, quot stipendia etiam exigua data et accepta fuerint.

The number of Masses to be said and applied must correspond with the number of stipends given and accepted, even though these be small.

This rule, given by Urban VIII and re-iterated by Innocent XII, is to be understood as follows:[20] If a priest receives, for instance, ten Mass intentions, but only five dollars, he is bound to say ten Masses, provided, of 18 S. C. C., May 25, 1893 (Coll., n. 1832); this is only allowed by a special papal indult.

19 S. C. C., April 24, 1875; July 25, 1874 (Coll. P. F., n. 1443, 1423).

20 Urban VIII, "Cum alias"; Innocent XII, "Nuper" (Richter, Trid., p. 145 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

course, as our text says, he has accepted the stipends. But it could not be said that he accepted the obligation if he received the five dollars without being aware of the smallness of the amount, or if the donor had deceived him or given him a counterfeit note. There is a contract between the one who offers the stipend and the priest who says the Mass.[21] This contract is of the nature of a tacit do ut facias. Now any contract that is not knowingly and willingly agreed to by both parties must be regarded as invalid, and a priest is not supposed to acquiesce in fraud or deceit. But if he accepts the five dollars with the promise that he will say ten Masses, he must abide by his promise, even though the amount is not the customary or synodal one. This rule affects all priests, regular as well as secular, individuals as well as communities, congregations and orders of religious.[22] Greek priests must offer the Holy Sacrifice according to the intention of those who make voluntary offerings (oblations), and if several persons make an offering, the priest must inform them of the preceding oblations, and, unless they all declare themselves satisfied with one Mass, he must offer as many Masses as there are oblations. Nor is it sufficient to put particles on the table according to the number of the offerers, or to make a simple commemoration for the different donors.[23]

21 S. O., Sept. 24, 1665, prop. 10 dam. (Denzinger, n. 981): "Non est contra iustitiam, pro pluribus Sacrificiis stipendium accipere, et Sacrificium unum offerre. Neque etiam est contra fidelitatem, etiamsi promittam promissione, etiam iuramento firmata, dandi stipendium, quod pro nullo alio offeram."

22 Urban VIII, "Cum alias," § 5.

23 Benedict XIV, "Demandatam," Dec. 24, 1743, § 10; S. C. P. F., April 13 1807, n. XVI (Coll., n. 692).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 829

OBLIGATION NEVER CEASES

Licet sine culpa illius qui onere celebrandi gravatur, Missarum eleemosynae iam perceptae perierint, obligatio non cessat.

Even though the alms given for Masses have perished without the fault of the one who is obliged to say the Masses, the obligation does not cease.

This is merely a consequence of what was said in the preceding canon concerning the species of contract, which obliges as soon as it is entered upon. Hence if a priest has received money for some Masses and loses it, the loss is his (res perit domino) and he remains bound to say the Masses.

A reasonable doubt may arise about founded Masses, though there is a Roman decision which rather favors the existence of the obligation. Regulars were entrusted forever with a church to which the obligation of saying one Mass daily for the founders and benefactors was attached. Though it was not evident that this burden had been attached at the time of the foundation and there was no trace of annual revenues, the S. Congregation decided that the religious were bound to apply the Mass.[24] This is in keeping with can. 825, 4°, and therefore our present text probably also applies to foundations, unless the Holy See either modifies or abolishes the obligation.

24 S. C. C., Jan. 28, 1708; Dec. 15, 1731 (Richter, Trid., p. 137, n. 56).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

NUMBER OF MASSES NOT DETERMINED

CAN. 830

Si quis pecuniae summam obtulerit pro Missarum applicatione, non indicans earundem numerum, hic supputetur secundum eleemosynam loci in quo oblator morabatur, nisi aliam fuisse eius intentionem legitime praesumi debeat.

If one offers a sum of money for the application of Masses without determining the number, this is to be reckoned according to the amount usually given in the place where the donor lived, unless it may be lawfully presumed that he had a different intention.

This canon must be compared with canons 828 and 831. The former makes the number of Masses to be applied dependent upon the contract entered between the donor and the priest, whilst can. 831 rules that the Ordinary should determine what constitutes a stipend. Neither of these two canons applies to the hypothesis set up in can. 830. In concreto, this hypothesis is that a man hands a priest ten dollars for stipends without determining the number of Masses he wishes to have said. If he would say to the priest: "Please say a Mass," the remainder of the sum (nine dollars) might justly be taken as a personal gift, especially if the donor is known as a generous man, or if it would be around Christmas time or the priest's birthday, etc. But if the donor would say: "Please say Masses for my intention," then ten Masses would have to be said in our country, where the usual stipend is one dollar for a Mass.[25]

[25] Innocent XII, "Nuper," § 15; S. C. C. Nov. 15, 1698; Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. X.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MASS STIPENDS TO BE FIXED BY THE ORDINARY

CAN. 831

§ 1. Ordinarii loci est manualem Missarum stipem in sua dioecesi definire per decretum, quantum fieri potest, in dioecesana Synodo latum; nec sacerdoti licet ea maiorem exigere.

§ 2. Ubi desit Ordinarii decretum, servetur consuetudo dioecesis.

§ 3. Etiam religiosi, licet exempti, circa stipem manualem stare debent decreto Ordinarii loci aut dioecesis consuetudini.

§ 1. It belongs to the Ordinary of the diocese to fix, if possible by a synodal decree, the amount of a manual Mass stipend, and priests are not allowed to demand more.

§ 2. Where there is no episcopal decree on the subject, the diocesan custom must be observed.

§ 3. Religious, also, even though exempt, must abide by the episcopal decree or diocesan custom.

This text is so plain that it needs no explanation. We will therefore only add that the Ordinary may enact, and enforce his enactment with ecclesiastical censures, that the secular as well as regular clergy shall not accept less than what either the synodal decree or diocesan custom prescribes; but he may not forbid priests to accept more than is customary, if the faithful voluntarily offer more.[26] The Ordinary is not entitled to fix the stipend for founded Masses for exempt religious.[27]

26 S. C. C., Jan. 16, 1649; Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. XI.

27 S. C. C., Jan 15, 1698; Benedict XIV, De Sacrif. Missae, l. III, 22, 9, in agreement with the superiors regular, fixed the sum at 60 scudi ($60). This sum, according to the present value of money, would be from $240 to $300.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 832

Sacerdoti fas est oblatam ultro maiorem stipem pro Missae applicatione accipere; et, nisi loci Ordinarius prohibuerit, etiam minorem.

A priest is allowed to accept a stipend which is larger than the one determined by diocesan statute or by custom; and, unless the Ordinary has forbidden, he may also accept a lesser one. The prohibition to receive a stipend below the customary sum must be made antecedently, and it would not be just to punish a priest for doing so if no prohibition had been promulgated.

ADDITIONAL STIPULATIONS

CAN. 833

Praesumitur oblatorem petiise solam Missae applicationem; si tamen oblator expresse aliquas circumstantias in Missae celebratione servandas determinaverit, sacerdos, eleemosynam acceptans, eius voluntati stare debet.

It is presumed that the one who offers a stipend asks only to have the Mass applied; but if he expressly determines certain circumstances to be observed in the celebration of the Mass, his wishes must be complied with.

This follows from the nature of the stipend as a contract. Any one who makes a contract is allowed to add stipulations (modi contractus), provided, of course, they are not opposed to the substance of the contract or forbidden by law. The " circumstances " of which our canon speaks, may refer to time, day or feast, kind of Mass and altar, etc. Of the time within which Masses are to be said the next canon (834) treats. We will only observe that, if the petitioner asks to have the Mass said on a certain day, and the priest agrees to do so, this stipulation must be complied with.[28]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) Similarly, if a certain day or feast is stipulated, it must be strictly observed, or the stipend returned, unless the priest knows the mind of the donor.

(b) If the donor asks for a certain Mass, for instance, a votive Mass in honor of the Blessed Virgin, the priest should say that Mass, though not bound under grievous obligation to do so. If the priest is asked to say a Mass for the poor souls, he should say a "Black" Mass.

The question has been asked whether a priest would satisfy the obligation arising from a stipend for a Mass for the dead, if he said the Mass of the day, though he could and should say a "Black" Mass. The S. Congregation of Rites answered that if the rubrics permitted a votive Mass or Missa de requiem, the priest would not fulfill his obligation by saying the Mass of the day, because the will of the testator or giver, if reasonable, must be respected.[29] In a mitigated form the same answer was returned twenty years ago by the same Congregation. The question was:[30] "Does a priest who is given a stipend for a Mass to be said for one or several dead, or in honor of a holy mystery, or of the Blessed Virgin, or of a Saint, fulfill his obligation if he says and applies the Mass of the day, because the rubrics do not permit him to say the Mass especially asked for? The answer was:

28 Theologians (cfr. Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 266) maintain that the obligation is a grave one if the donor insists on a special day, but only a levis if he asks for a certain day without insisting on it or for no special reason. Besides, if many Masses are offered, say to a monastery, without a specially urgent appeal, it may reasonably be supposed that the donors are satisfied to have the Masses said as soon as possible, even though they should prefer a certain day.

29 S. Rit. C., March 3, 1761, ad 7 (Dec. Auth., n. 2461).

30 S. Rit. C., June 13, 1899, ad IV (Dec. Auth., n. 4031).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Yes, but with the addition: "It would be more advisable to comply, as far as possible, with the intention of the giver by saying the 'Black' or votive Mass." From this decision we may gather that the priest should comply with the manifest and expressed intention of the giver but is not under a strict obligation to do so, unless a direct demand was made as to the kind of Mass to be said, especially if it be a foundation. In our country, we believe, most people are satisfied if the priest says a "Black" Mass, even though the intention was directed for the benefit of the living, and we do not quite understand why some theologians [31] regard it as incongruous to say a "Black" Mass for the living. Does not the act of charity done to the poor souls enhance, as it were, the fruits of the Mass thus applied? Of course, if a Mass in honor of a special Saint, e. g., St. Anthony, were asked for, based on the belief that this Saint is a particularly powerful intercessor with God, it would not be prudent to say a "Black" Mass.

(c) If a special altar is asked for by the donor, this wish should be conscientiously complied with, in as far at least as canon 836 does not permit a deviation from the rule.

Here the question of the privileged altar, which will be more fully discussed under cans. 916–918, may be briefly touched upon as far as it is connected with our present subject. Generally speaking, privileged altars are intended for the dead, and therefore "Black" Masses should, as a rule, be offered thereat. The rubrics forbid a Missa de Requiem on duplex days, unless it be a cantata in die obitus, etc. Yet, says the S. Congregation, if the Mass is de facto applied for the intention of the giver or founder, the privilege is not lost, i. e., the indul-

31 Thus Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 268.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gence attached to such an altar is gained also by a Missa de festo or die occurrenti prescribed according to the rubrics. Neither does it matter whether the altar is thus privileged in perpetuum, or ad tempus, or pro certis diebus, if the Mass is said on the privileged days, and the Mass has to be said in the color of the day according to the rubrics.[32] Hence, to gain the indulgence attached to a privileged altar it is not necessary to say a "Black" or Ferial or Vigil Mass with the oration for the deceased, although this may be laudably done.[33]

(d) The donor may also stipulate that the Mass be said in a certain church or chapel. In that case the priest must say the Mass in the church or chapel appointed. A chaplain who is appointed to a certain chapel, must say Mass there, and if the founder has not expressly determined otherwise, he must also apply the Mass for the founder.[34] The rector of a church in which a Mass must be said by the last will of a testator, may not permit a priest to whom he has given the stipend to say the Mass in another church, or to subtract anything from the original alms.[35] If a Mass to be said in a certain church must be transferred to another church, some compensation for wine, altar bread, candles, and the use of vestments may be demanded.[36] From this it logically follows that a priest saying Mass in a strange church would not act against ecclesiastical law or natural courtesy if 32 S. Rit. C., Aug. 5, 1662; Dec. 1, 1666; Aug. 13, 1669 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1238, 1343, 1392).

33 S. O. (sect. Indulg.), Feb. 20, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 122); Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. XV.

34 S. C. C., Aug. 18, 1668; Jan. 11, 1710 (Richter, Trid., p. 136 f. nn. 49, 55); Dec. 19, 1904, ad 3; especially is the chaplain not allowed to determine ad libitum the stipend to be given to another priest for saying Mass in that chapel (which would be against n. XV of the "Ut debita," May 11, 1904).

35 S. C. C., Dec. 19, 1904, ad 2 (Linzer Q.-S., 1905, Vol. 58, p. 674).

36 S. C. C., Jan. 15, 1639, et pluries (Richter, Trid., p. 137, n. 62; Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. XIII).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

he would leave some compensation at least for the janitor and the altar boys.

Here we may add something concerning the thirty so-called Gregorian Masses, which, according to tradition, originated with St. Gregory the Great (590–604), who celebrated Mass for thirty consecutive days to redeem the soul of a monk who had died with some unlawfully retained property. The custom is widespread to-day, but some have exaggerated notions as to the effects of these Masses. We are concerned only with the law regarding them, which has lately been fixed as follows:

(a) The thirty Gregorian Masses must be celebrated on thirty consecutive days, without interruption;

(b) A priest cannot say, for instance, three Masses on Christmas Day as Gregorian Masses, and then on the 28th Dec. resume the celebration.

(c) Nor can he give the thirty Masses to different priests that they may be said in less than thirty days.

(d) It is not required that the same priest say all thirty Masses, or that he say a "Black" Mass on the days when the rubrics permit.[37]

Since the Gregorian Masses are a burden and a risk, it would not be against ecclesiastical law if the Ordinaries[38] would fix an "extra" tax for them. For religious the Ordinary in that case is the superior major, who, therefore, is entitled to make or authorize an additional charge for Gregorian Masses.

[37] S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), Dec. 12, 1912 (A. Ap. S., V, 32 f.); the three last days of Holy Week do not interfere with the thirty consecutive days.

[38] This is done in some Eastern dioceses, where the charge is $45.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TIME OF FULFILLING THE OBLIGATION

CAN. 834

§ 1. Missae pro quibus celebrandis tempus ab oblatore expresse praescriptum est, eo omnino tempore sunt celebrandae.

§ 2. Si oblator nullum tempus pro Missarum manualium celebratione expresse praescripserit:

1.° Missae pro urgenti causa oblatae quamprimum tempore utili sunt celebrandae;

2.° In aliis casibus Missae sunt celebrandae intra modicum tempus pro maiore vel minore Missarum numero.

§ 3. Quod si oblator arbitrio sacerdotis tempus celebrationis expresse reliquerit, sacerdos poterit tempore quo sibi magis placuerit, eas celebrare, firmo praescripto can. 835.

§ 1. If a term has been expressly fixed by the donor, the Masses must be said at the time required.

This obligation, as already observed, follows from the stipulation attached to the contract.[39]

§ 2. If no time has been expressly fixed for manual stipends, the following rules must be followed:

1°. Urgent Masses must be said as soon as possible within an equitable period. Thus if a Mass is ordered for a successful operation or child-birth, it is supposed to be said before or on the day of the event. However, the legislator says "tempus utile" (see can. 35), which here means, if the priest is not occupied with other intentions or obligations. Should he take sick or be lawfully prevented on the day on which he is obliged to say the 39 S. C. C., June 23, Sept. 1, 1742, ad 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

stipulated Mass, he would have to ask another priest to say the Mass in his stead,[40] provided he could find one who would be willing and able; if not, he may keep the stipend and say the Mass as soon as possible.

2°. If the Masses are not urgent, they must be said within a short time (intra modicum tempus), proportionate to the greater or smaller number of Masses. By modicum tempus was always understood one month from the date of the obligation in case of one Mass.[41] A scale was proposed to the S. Congregation[42] for a greater number, as follows:

For	10	Masses,	1 month
"	20	"	2 months
"	40	"	3 "
"	60	"	4 "
"	80	"	5 "
"	100	"	6 "

The answer was: "It is left to the discretion of the priest, with due regard to the decree 'Ut debita,' of May 11, 1904, and to the rules of approved authors." But it must be noted that the scale as proposed applied to stipends received from one person, not several. Hence, if of 100 persons each would offer one Mass stipend, the six months' term would not apply, unless the intention of the donors to have them said within that time were evident. Therefore, if the priest tells the person who offers a stipend that he cannot say the Mass within one month, or three months, and the person thus advised says: "All right, Father," he may accept the stipend. An im-

40 S. C. C., Sept. 18, 1683; June 4, 1689 (Richter, Trid., p. 138, n. 65 f.).

41 S. C. C., July 17, 1755; Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. XIV; "Ut debita," May 11, 1904 (Anal. Eccl., t. 12, 202).

42 S. C. C., Feb. 27, 1905 (Anal. Eccl., t. 13, 124).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

plicit stipulation to the same effect may be assumed if the faithful know that many Masses are said in a monastery or religious community and nevertheless send their stipends there. It may, we say, be presumed that they are satisfied to have the Masses said when it suits the community. If they are not " urgent " as to the time, tempus utile may be taken.

§ 3 renders this explanation clearer. If the donor expressly leaves the time for saying the Mass to the discretion of the priest, the latter may say it when most convenient for him, with due regard to can. 835.

CAN. 835

Nemini licet tot Missarum onera per se celebrandarum recipere quibus intra annum satisfacere nequeat.

No one is allowed to receive more Masses to be celebrated by himself, than he can say within a year.

The phrase " per se celebrandarum" means that the priest himself, and not another, is supposed to say the Masses. Otherwise a priest may accept as many Masses as he wishes and dispose of them according to the rules laid down in can. 839 ff.

The phrase " intra annum" (within a year) also calls for an explanation. The starting point for manual Masses is the date on which the first Mass is received and accepted. Say this is the first of March, 1919, and suppose the donor (according to can. 834, § 3) has left it entirely to the discretion of the priest when to say the Mass. If he says it any time before March 1, 1920, he will have complied with the law. He may, before he has said the Mass accepted on March 1, 1919, accept others, and say them first. But if the donor has set no time for the Mass given on March 1, 1919, nor expressly left it to the discretion of the priest when to say it, the priest must say the Mass within a month, although he may receive other Masses before April 1, 1919, before having said the Mass accepted on March 1, 1919. For these Masses received in the meantime, say on the feast of St. Joseph, 1919, the same rules hold good.[43] It is well to instruct the faithful on this point and also to ask the giver in each instance whether he is willing to leave the time for saying the Mass to the priest.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

POSTERS IN CHURCHES

CAN. 836

In ecclesiis in quibus ob fidelium peculiarem devotionem Missarum eleemosynae ita affluunt, ut omnes Missae, celebrari ibidem debito tempore nequeant, moneantur fideles, per tabellam in loco patenti et obvio positam, Missas oblatas celebratum iri vel ibidem, cum commode poterit, vel alibi.

The churches here in question are mainly famous sanctuaries or shrines. When it proves impossible to say all Masses in such sanctuaries for which stipends are offered, in order that the expectations of the faithful may not be disappointed, they should be advised that the Masses will be said either in the church itself, if convenient, or else in some other church.[44] A public notice to this effect should be posted in a conspicuous and easily accessible place. If stipends are offered nevertheless, the ministers cannot be accused of "pious fraud."

Evidently this rule applies only to churches where the faithful make their offerings personally, not to communities to which stipends are sent.

[43] Innocent XII, "Nuper," § 15 ad 11 (Richter, Trid., p. 146).

[44] S. C. C., March 8, 1659; Benedict XIV, Instit., 56, n. XIV.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MASSES SENT AWAY

CAN. 837

Qui Missas per alios celebrandas habet, eas quamprimum distribuat, firmo praescripto can. 841; sed tempus legitimum pro earundem celebratione incipit a die quo sacerdos celebraturus easdem receperit, nisi aliud constet.

Whoever has Masses to be said by others, should distribute them as soon as possible, with due regard to can. 841. But the lawful time for saying them commences on the day on which the priest who is to say them has received them, unless the contrary is evident.

Here the intentionarius of religious communities and of priests overloaded with Mass intentions is especially aimed at. The second clause may be illustrated thus: A religious in Rome receives from his home monastery thirty Masses. Sent on Feb. 1, they arrive on March 1. Ordinarily the religious would have time to say them from March 1 to the middle of May. If, however, the letter contains a clause urging him to say the Masses as soon as possible, he would have to hurry up; but if the letter says: "at your convenience," he could postpone saying the thirty Masses and say them when he had no other intentions.[45] A decision of the S. Congregation advises that where there is a large number of intentions, the Masses should be distributed among several priests, so that they may be said more promptly.[46]

[45] "Ut debita," n. 4.

[46] S. C. C., Feb. 27, 1905, ad 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 838

Qui habent Missarum numerum de quibus sibi liceat libere disponere, possunt eas tribuere sacerdotibus sibi acceptis, dummodo probe sibi constet eos omni exceptione maiores vel testimonio proprii Ordinarii commendatos.

This canon is a corollary to the preceding one, for it describes the qualities of the priests to whom superfluous Masses, of which one may freely dispose, may be entrusted. Any priests may be freely chosen, provided they are absolutely reliable or recommended by the local Ordinary. It is not necessary, therefore, that they be known personally [47] (facie ad faciem) to those who distribute the Masses.

DURATION OF THE OBLIGATION OF A MASS STIPEND

CAN. 839

Qui Missas a fidelibus receptas aut quoquo modo suae fidei commissas aliis celebrandas tradiderint, obligatione tenentur usque dum acceptatae ab eisdem obligationis et recepti stipendii testimonium obtinuerint.

Whoever gives Masses received from the faithful or otherwise entrusted to his care to others is personally responsible for them until he is informed that the obligation has been accepted and the stipend received.

It is evident that the priests to whom Masses are sent according to this canon, must have the same qualities as those described in can. 838. The obligation for Masses 47 "Ut debita," n. 5, says: "personaliter sibi notis"; but this is omitted in our text. However, even the wording of "Ut debita" did not absolutely require personal knowledge.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

given to others does not cease until the other has accepted the obligation and received the stipend. The reason is evidently based upon the nature of the contract. For readiness to accept the obligation is only half efficacious, and does not become fully so until the object is delivered, which is done by actual transmission and reception of the price. It is further necessary to have reliable information with regard to both these essential conditions. This information may be given orally or in writing, but it must produce moral certainty. No Masses whatsoever are excepted from this law, not even those sent to the Ordinary or the Holy See. Therefore the old ruling of "Ut debita," 1904, n. 6, must be modified to the effect that the obligation remains until information is given either by the Ordinary or the Holy See if Masses are sent to either. Also the risk of losing the money must be borne by the sender. When a check or draft is sent, there is no loss to be feared except of time, and the cancelled check upon its return will serve as a receipt. Whether this would suffice for making sure of the acceptance of the obligation depends on the business capacity of the recipient and the custom of the country. In our country cashed and returned checks are acknowledged as legal receipts.

CAN. 840

§ 1. Qui Missarum stipes manuales ad alios transmittit, debet acceptas integre transmittere, nisi aut oblator expresse permittat aliquid retinere, aut certo constet excessum supra taxam dioecesanam datum fuisse intuitu personae.

§ 2. In Missis ad instar manualium, nisi obstet mens fundatoris, legitime retinetur excessus et satis est remittere solam eleemosynam manualem dioecesis in qua

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Missa celebratur, si pinguis eleemosyna locum pro parte teneat dotis beneficii aut causae piae.

§ 1. He who sends manual stipends to others, must transmit them as he has received them, i. e., in full, unless the donor has expressly permitted him to retain part of the stipend, or unless it is evident that whatever exceeds the synodal or customary stipend was intended for the person of him to whom the stipend was given.

There are many strict prohibitions to this effect from the time of Urban VIII to our own, intended to keep "damnable lucre" out of the Church.[48] The decree "Ut debita," of May 11, 1904, abolished all previous privileges or indults and demanded "a new and special concession of the Apostolic See," which cannot be communicated to others, for the superiors of famous sanctuaries who wish to retain a small percentage of the stipends for the upkeep and adornment of the church. If a Mass stipend for a certain place or sanctuary were $2, therefore, the priest who said the Mass must be given the two dollars in full.[49] However, the S. Cong. made an exception in favor of sanctuaries by adding: "nisi de consensu oblatorum," that is, if the donors expressly (no praesumpta or tacita licentia) state that a small sum may be kept out of the usual stipend for the sustenance of the church, it would be allowed by law.[50]

Another reason for retaining a part of a Mass stipend would be if the amount exceeded the usual tax and was given intuitu personae, for personal reasons. In Holland the faithful often give their pastors stipends which are 48 "Alias," June 21, 1625, § 6: "damnabile lucrum"; S. O., Sept. 24, 1665, prop. dam. 9 (Denzinger, n. 980).

49 S. C. C., Dec. 19, 1904, ad 3 (Anal. Eccl., t. 13, p. 70). This law also obliges the Oriental priests; S. C. P. F., Jan. 20, 1893 (Coll., n. 1823).

50 S. C. C., "Vigilanti," May 25, 1893 (Coll. P. F., n. 1832).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

almost equal to a salary. They do this partly to insure their support, and partly out of gratitude and affection. The pastors, when absent or sick, or for other reasons, have their chaplains or curates (coadiutores) say the Masses for the usual or synodal stipend and keep the surplus for themselves. The matter was brought to Rome, and the S. Poenitentiaria, in the name of Benedict XIV, decided that the practice was permissible.[51] Now a priest may receive a stipend of $5 from a friend, or as a present, and if he is certain that the pingue stipendium was given for merely personal motives, he may keep the $4 and give $1 to another priest to say the Mass, unless, of course, the donor had insisted that he himself say the Mass.

In another case solved by the S. Poenitentiaria[52] pastors were accustomed to exchange Mass intentions with their assistants or curates, who sang the Missa cantata in the pastor's place, but received no stipend. The pastor on his part did not say the Mass according to the intention of the assistant, but gave a manual stipend to a third priest, who said the Mass according to the intention of the assistant. The S. Congr. decided that such an exchange of intentions was allowed, provided the third priest was aware of the higher stipend and freely and of his own accord renounced it. The reason given was that there is no detestable trading in that case.

§ 2. The excess or surplus of quasi-manual stipends may be lawfully retained if the pingue stipendium takes the place of a partial endowment of an ecclesiastical pre-

[51] S. Poenit., April 6, 1742 (Coll. P. F., n. 336); Benedict XIV, "Quanta cura," June 30, 1741, enacted severe penalties against so-called trading and approved the decision of S. Poenit. h [52] S. Poenit., Aug. 22, 1826 (Coll. P. F., n. 789). This decision runs counter to the doctrine of St. Alphonsus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google bend or pious institution, unless the will of the founder reads otherwise. In that case, then, if the beneficiary has the Mass said by another priest, the former is bound only to hand the customary or diocesan stipend to his substitute.

How can this ruling be made to square with § 1 of the same canon? The answer is obvious. The surplus stipend is given as a sort of contribution to the necessary support of the priest, who is employed for a certain benefice or chapel, and since the stipend itself is of the same nature, there is no alienation involved either of the foundation or of the stipend. Besides, there is no trading, because the priest receives the stipend to which he is entitled according to the diocesan custom. In Bavaria and elsewhere, where the income of pastors is fixed by the civil government by agreement with the ecclesiastical authority, the salary includes the stipends accruing from foundation Masses, and from requiem and marriage Masses, for which a larger stipend is paid than for ordinary Masses.

Since, however, the pastors are sometimes lawfully prevented from saying these Masses personally, they give them to other priests, who say them for the usual stipend, which is less than the one received by the pastors, who retain a portion of the original stipend as part of their legitimate income. Rome has declared this practice lawful, because the money thus kept is really a part of the salary.[53] The surplus may also be retained in favor of the church to which a priest is assigned.[54] If the founder, however, has set up a clause forbidding such retention, it would be unlawful, as the 53 S. C. C., Monacen., Feb. 28, March 28, Aug. 22, 1874 (A. S. S., Vol. 8, 65 ff.).

54 S. C. C., Jan. 21, 1898 (Anal. Eccl., t. 15, 65).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google will of the founder must be religiously respected.[55] This rule, we believe, may also be applied to our country, where quasi-manual stipends form part of the salary of priests, provided no contrary stipulation exists in the will of the founder.

CAN. 841

§ 1. Omnes et singuli administratores causarum piarum aut quoquo modo ad Missarum onera implenda obligati, sive ecclesiastici sive laici, sub exitum cuiuslibet anni, Missarum onera quibus nondum fuerit satisfactum, suis Ordinariis tradant secundum modum ab his definiendum.

§ 2. Hoc autem tempus ita est accipiendum ut in Missis ad instar manualium obligatio eas deponendi decurrat a fine illius anni intra quem onera impleri debuissent; in manualibus vero, post annum a die suscepti oneris, salva diversa offerentium voluntate.

§ 1. Administrators of pious institutions, and all, whether clergymen or laymen, who are in any way bound to have Mass obligations fulfilled, must at the end of each year send the Masses not yet said to their Ordinaries in some manner to be determined by the latter.

§ 2. The time for complying with this obligation runs, for quasi-manual stipends, from the end of the year during which the Masses should have been said, and for manual stipends from the day on which the obligation was accepted, with due regard to the intention of the donor.

Causae piae are pious institutions under the direction of the local Ordinary, which generally have a number of Masses either imposed by the will of founders or offered by the faithful. The administrator (or syndicus, as he was formerly called) of each house is responsible for the Mass obligations being duly fulfilled. Pia causa in this context certainly includes the administration of any ecclesiastical institute with the sole exception of male religious, as can. 842 clearly implies. Hence it also comprehends religious houses of women who are not under the jurisdiction of a prelate regular. Besides piae causae here comprises also parishes, chaplaincies, rectories, in fact, any one, clergyman or layman, who has to see to the fulfillment of such obligations; also guardians or executors of last wills and the heirs upon whom devolves the duty of complying with pious obligations.

[55] S. C. C., Feb. 21, 1688 (Richter, Trid., p. 138, n. 69); "Ut debita," May 11, 1904, n. 15; Feb. 23, 1907 (Anal. cit., p. 64).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Ordinary to whom the Masses not yet said must be sent, is the one in whose diocese the pia causa is located.

§ 2 defines the date from which the obligation commences. For quasi-manual Masses, which are attached either to a definite church or to a specified priest, the time runs from the end of the year within which the Masses were to be said. Suppose, e. g., a quasi-manual Mass was to be said on St. Michael's Day, 1918. If this Mass was not said that year, it must be handed over to the Ordinary before the last day of Dec., 1918, because we now generally understand the civil year, which commences Jan. 1. However, if it were taken to mean the ecclesiastical year, the end of that year would be the Saturday before the first Sunday of Advent. If the document merely says: "So many Masses must be said each year," we should take the civil year. But if a date is stated, from which the obligation commences, the year is reckoned from that date.

If there is question of purely manual stipends, the obligation of sending them to the Ordinary commences on the first day after a full year has elapsed from the day when the obligation was assumed. For instance, a Mass was ordered on St. Michael's day, Sept. 29, 1918, but not said on that day, and hence the Mass must be sent to the Ordinary on Sept. 30, 1919. Only if the will of the donor has expressly left it to the discretion of the priest to prolong the term of one year, may he refrain from sending it to the Ordinary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DUTY OF ORDINARIES AND RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 842

Ius et officium advigilandi ut onera Missarum adimpleantur in ecclesiis saecularium pertinet ad loci Ordinarium; in religiosorum ecclesiis, ad eorum Superiores.

The right and duty of watching over the fulfilment of Mass obligations belong to the Ordinary of the diocese with regard to the churches of secular priests, and to the superiors of religious with regard to their churches.

This canon repeats the ruling of Innocent XII, who gravely enjoined Ordinaries to see to it, at their canonical visitations and on other occasions, that all the regulations concerning Mass stipends are carried out without delay, cavil, or perverse interpretation.[56] However this duty extended only to churches where secular priests are employed — in ecclesiis saecularium. The legislator, by extending the exemption formerly belonging to exempt regulars exclusively, has made the superiors of religious, whether exempt or not, responsible in this matter. This had been the law ever since the times of Urban VIII and Innocent with regard to foundation Masses.[57] But the bishop of St. Pölten, in Lower Austria, thought he was [56] "Nuper," Dec. 23, 1697, § 24.

[57] Ib. § 25; S. C. C. Nov. 14, 1699; June 26, 1700.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

entitled to inspect the books for manual stipends kept by the Franciscans of his diocese. The S. Congregation thought differently and told the bishop that he could not claim the right of inspecting the records of even manual Masses at the time of his canonical visitation. This decision touched the books kept in a parish church in charge of the Franciscans.[58]

The text says, in ecclesiis religiosorum. What churches are these? We believe that since the text draws no distinction between churches perpetually and temporarily entrusted to religious, the legislator intends to include both classes. But the religious must be such as defined by the Code, viz., members of a congregation with the three religious vows. A doubt may arise as to communities of nuns or Sisters who are subject to the diocesan Ordinary but have a religious as chaplain. Who is the responsible person in that case? We believe a distinction will disperse the doubt. For the Masses which are sent to the religious community of Sisters, as such, and which cannot be said by the chaplain, the superioress is responsible, and ultimately the local Ordinary, because such congregations are subject to him. As to the Masses given to the chaplain, he must answer for them to his superior, because by the name of Ordinary, according to our text, is to be understood the superior of the religious; — pro suis respectivis subditis, as one decision declares.[59]

STIPEND-BOOKS

CAN. 843

§ 1. Rectores ecclesiarum aliorumque piorum locorum sive saecularium sive religiosorum in quibus

58 S. C. EE. et RR., May 11, 1904 (Anal. Eccl., t. 12, p. 248).

59 S. C. C., Feb. 27, 1905 (Anal. Eccl., t. 15, 123).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eleemosynae Missarum recipi solent, peculiarem habeant librum in quo accurate notent Missarum receptarum numerum, intentionem, eleemosynam, celebrationem.

§ 2. Ordinarii tenentur obligatione singulis saltem annis huiusmodi libros sive per se sive per alios recognoscendi.

§ 1. Rectors of churches and other pious institutions, whether in charge of seculars or religious, where Mass stipends are wont to be received, shall keep a special book, in which the stipends are to be entered as to number, intention, amount, and date of celebration.

§ 2. The Ordinaries are obliged to inspect these books at least once a year, either personally or by a deputy.

The latter section, of course, affects mainly secular institutions, not exempt or other religious, as otherwise can. 842 would be meaningless; but the religious superiors, too, must inspect the books kept in or for the community.[60]

CAN. 844

§ 1. Ordinarii quoque locorum et Superiores religiosi, qui propriis subditis aliisve Missas celebrandas committunt, quas acceperint Missas cum suis eleemosynis cito in librum per ordinem referant curentque pro viribus ut quamprimum celebrentur.

§ 2. Imo omnes sacerdotes sive saeculares sive religiosi debent accurate adnotare quisque Missarum intentiones receperit, quibusve satisfecerit.

§ 1. Local Ordinaries and religious superiors who give Masses to their own subjects or to others, shall promptly enter the Masses they receive, together with the amount of the stipend, according to the order of time in which they were received, in a book, and see to it that they are said as soon as possible.

[60] Cfr. S. C. EE. et RR., May 11, 1904.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. All priests, secular as well as religious, shall keep an accurate account of the intentions received and the Masses said by them.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

THE HOLY EUCHARIST AS A SACRAMENT

ARTICLE I

THE MINISTER OF HOLY COMMUNION

CAN. 845

§ 1. Minister ordinarius sacrae communionis est solus sacerdos.

§ 2. Extraordinarius est diaconus, de Ordinarii loci vel parochi licentia, gravi de causa concedenda, quae in casu necessitatis legitime praesumitur.

The ordinary minister of Holy Communion is the priest alone, the extraordinary minister may also be a deacon, if the local Ordinary or pastor grants him permission, which should be given for a grave reason, and is lawfully presumed in case of necessity.

Whereas priests by their ordination receive the power of consecrating and distributing the Holy Eucharist,[1] deacons only obtain the power of distributing the same. By custom rather than by divine law their power is made subordinate to the jurisdictional power of the Ordinary, in order to show forth the hierarchic order. Besides, since the pastor, who must be a priest, is the legitimate head of the flock assigned to him, it is becoming that the 1 C. 29, Dist. 2, de cons. (a text taken from the reform-synod of Paris, 829; cfr. Hefele, Concil., Gesch., IV, 60, can. 45) relates with horror that women entered the sanctuary and distributed holy Communion.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google deacon, who is his inferior, should depend on him for permission to exercise his power.

Lay men, and especially women, are expressly excluded from distributing Holy Communion, because they belong not to the Ecclesia sanctificans, but to the Ecclesia sanctificanda. That in extreme necessity laymen may give communion to themselves, may be admitted, since history reports examples of this practice.[2] Deacons, then (but not subdeacons),[3] may, with the permission of the Ordinary or pastor in whose diocese or parish they wish to distribute Holy Communion, perform that function. But the permission is not to be granted without a grave cause. Such a cause would exist if the pastor were lawfully prevented from giving Holy Communion to the people on a holyday of obligation, or if a large number of people had to be accommodated, making it impossible for the pastor to finish in time. We hardly believe permission should be granted for the sake of a few daily communicants, unless the parents of a newly ordained deacon should perhaps wish to receive Holy Communion at the hands of their son. In case of necessity[4] the permission may be presumed. Such a case would be the administration of the Viaticum, or of paschal Communion to such as have no opportunity to receive it on some other day.

When a deacon administers Holy Communion, he may proceed as follows: Dressed with the surplice and stole crossed on the right side, he recites the Misereatur and Indulgentiam, making the sign of the cross over himself or over the communicants (or, if he brings the Viaticum, over the sick person), distributes Holy Communion, re-

2 Noldin, De Sacramentis, ed. 10, n. 124.

3 They sometimes usurped that prerogative; cfr. Hefele, l. c., p. 621.

4 S. Rit. C., Feb. 25, 1777 (Dec. Auth., n. 2504): "Extra casum necessitatis non licet diacono."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cites the " O sacrum," according to the season, then the Dominus vobiscum, and blesses the people (or the infirm) with the Blessed Sacrament. All this is allowed when the deacon has express or presumed permission.[5] If he is merely helping the pastor, he should abstain from reciting the prayers and blessing the people.

In case no other priest is present, a priest may administer Communion to himself, even for mere devotion; and the same holds good of a deacon.[6]

COMMUNION AT MASS AND OUTSIDE OF IT

CAN. 846

§ 1. Quilibet sacerdos intra Missam et, si privatim celebrat, etiam proxime ante et statim post, sacram communionem ministrare potest, salvo praescripto can. 869.

§ 2. Etiam extra Missam quilibet sacerdos eadem facultate pollet ex licentia saltem praesumpta rectoris ecclesiae, si sit extraneus.

§ 1. Any priest may distribute Holy Communion during Mass, and, if he celebrates privately, also immediately before and after Mass, with due regard to the regulations for private Oratories laid down in can. 869.

§ 2. Even outside of Mass every priest enjoys the same right, provided he has at least the presumed permission of the rector of the church if he is a stranger.

§ 1 distinguishes between two kinds of Masses, of which one is called private, while the other is not determined. What, then, is a private Mass?

There are, as Benedict XIV says,[7] various meanings at-

[5] S. Rit. C., Aug. 14, 1858 (Dec. Auth., n. 3074).
[6] Noldin, l. c., n. 124.
[7] De Sacrif. Missae, l. II, c. 22, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tached to the term "private Mass." It may be a Mass said in a private place, or on a day not a feast-day, or because the fruit is applied to a private person, or because only a few persons are present, or because it is not said on the main altar or as a parochial or conventual Mass, or, finally, because the priest alone receives Holy Communion. There is a decision of the S. Congregation of Rites [8] which seems to throw some light on our subject. The question was asked whether priests duly vested for saying Mass could, for a reasonable cause, distribute Holy Communion before or after the solemn Mass, or at the Missa cantata, or the conventual Mass, as is permitted before and after the private Mass. The answer was, no. Hence a private Mass would be one said without solemnity or chant, not as a conventual Mass, but simply for the sake of devotion. But what about a parochial Mass? Here we believe a distinction should be drawn as follows: The parochial Mass, properly speaking, is the one said for the people,— the Missa pro populo, as it is now required on all holydays of obligation and some suppressed feasts. This is strictly the parochial Mass, because it is said for the people and, at least as a rule, in their presence. On other days the pastor is supposed to say private or merely devotional Masses, because there is no strictly juridical obligation of saying Mass on those days. We are aware [9] that some take the term "private Mass" simply in the sense of Missa lecta, even though it be a parish or conventual Mass. This may be true with regard to certain rubrical considerations, but in our case it certainly cannot be the underlying idea, as the decision

[8] S. Rit. C., Jan. 19, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., t. 14, 104 f). A conventual Mass is one either sung or read by religious corporations.

[9] Am. Eccl. Rev., 1916, Vol. 55, p. 429 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google quoted proves. Hence during, but not immediately before or after, a solemn, or sung, or conventual, or strictly parochial Mass Holy Communion may be distributed, whilst a priest saying private Mass may also distribute it before, during, and after Mass.

Every priest is entitled to distribute Holy Communion even in a church not his own, provided he has the at least presumed permission of the rector of the church where he says Mass. The accessory follows the principal,[10] which in this case is the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice. This rule holds good also with regard to religious, although the Decretals[11] were rather severe in condemning religious who ventured to distribute the Holy Eucharist without the special permission of the pastor.

A permission may be presumed if no express prohibition has been issued by the local pastor.

If there is a public notice hung up in the sacristy regulating the hour for distributing Holy Communion, visiting priests should heed it, because it is intended to preserve order.

When Holy Communion is distributed at a "Black" Mass (which is not forbidden),[12] the priest may communicate the faithful during Mass with particles consecrated in another Mass, or before and after Mass if there is a plausible reason. However, before and after Mass the blessing is to be omitted.[13]

10 Reg. Juris, 42, in 6°.
11 C. 1, Clem. V, 7.
12 S. Rit. C., July 24, 1683 (Dec. Auth., n. 1711).
13 S. Rit. C., July 23, 1868 (Dec. Auth., n. 3177).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLIC HOLY COMMUNION FOR THE SICK

CAN. 847

Ad infirmos publice sacra communio deferatur, nisi iusta et rationabilis causa aliud suadeat.

CAN. 848

§ 1. Ius et officium sacram communionem publice ad infirmos etiam non paroecianos extra ecclesiam deferendi, pertinet ad parochum intra suum territorium.

§ 2. Ceteri sacerdotes id possunt in casu tantum necessitatis aut de licentia saltem praesumpta eiusdem parochi vel Ordinarii.

Holy Communion should be brought to the sick publicly, unless a just and reasonable cause advises otherwise.

The right and duty to bring Holy Communion publicly to the sick, even though they be not his parishioners, belongs to the pastor within the limits of his parish. Other priests may perform this function only in case of necessity or with the at least presumed permission of the pastor or Ordinary.

These two canons concern countries where it is still customary to bring Holy Communion to the sick publicly, i. e., in procession, formed by the pastor and some faithful lay people, or by the pastor and his sexton or a cleric who carries a light or lantern.[14] Only in cases of necessity, when the furor gentilium or violence and great irreverence was to be feared, was secret communion permitted.[15] Special faculties were issued for countries in 14 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 22, 1744, § 21 f.; S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1779 (Coll., n. 537).

15 S. Rit. C., Feb. 10, 1871, ad I, n. 1, 3–5; May 23, 1843; Sept. 12, 1857 (Dec. Auth., nn. 3234, 2908, 3059).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which there was danger of sacrilegious irreverence. Now these faculties are no longer needed, as any reasonable cause suffices to dispense from what was formerly the general law. To decide whether such reasons exist, as they surely do in our country, belongs to the Ordinary, or the pastor, because the law fixes no limit. Our canon puts the right of bringing Holy Communion publicly to the sick among the parochial rights (cfr. can. 462, 3°), but this has reference only to the public mode of administering the Viaticum, not the private. What was said concerning religious under can. 514 must be here repeated.[16]

PRIVATE COMMUNION

CAN. 849

§ 1. Communionem privatim ad infirmos quilibet sacerdos deferre potest, de venia saltem praesumpta sacerdotis, cui custodia sanctissimi Sacramenti commissa est.

§ 2. Quando privatim sacra communio infirmis ministratur, reverentiae ac decentiae tanto sacramento debitae sedulo consulatur, servatis a Sede Apostolica praescriptis normis.

§ 1. Any priest may bring Holy Communion privately to the sick, provided he has the at least presumed permission of the priest who is the custodian of the Blessed Sacrament.

The custodian of a cathedral church properly is the chapter,[17] but generally the custos or dean of the chapter. In religious communities of men the custody is entrusted to the superior of the house, the custos sacrae supellectilis, or the parish priest, if a parish is attached to the house.

16 Cfr. C. 1, Clem. V, 7.

17 Can. 415, § 3, 1.°

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The pastor is the custodian of the Blessed Sacrament in his parish; the chaplain, in religious communities of women and pious institutions.

§ 2. When Holy Communion is brought privately to the sick, care should be taken that due reverence and respect is rendered to the august Sacrament according to the rules prescribed by the Apostolic See.

One of the latest rules, taken from Benedict XIV's Constitution "Inter omnigenas," (Feb. 2, 1744) and reenforced by the S. Congregation of the Sacraments,[18] is the following: Ordinaries may permit Communion to be brought to such as are sickly (mala affectis valetudine) and cannot leave their home, but would like to receive the Holy Eucharist for devotion's sake. But the priest must always wear the stole under his dress, or what we call coat; the pyxis must be placed in a burse appended by strings from the neck and carried on the breast. The priest shall never go alone, but be accompanied by at least one of the faithful. In case of necessity, we suppose, this last condition might be dispensed with, although it certainly is a very grave one, as appears from the aforesaid Constitution and other instructions.[19]

What we observed under can. 847 concerning the bringing of Holy Communion secretly is corroborated by this canon, and hence the faculty given in virtue of form 1, art. 24, is no longer needed.[20]

18 Dec. 23, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 725).

19 S. C. P. F., Sept. 20, 1739; Sept. 11, 1779; Feb. 25, 1859 (Coll., nn. 324, 537, 1171); the stole was dispensed with on account of a long trip and the possible transparency through the light vestment.

20 Cfr. Putzer, Comm., p. 282 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE HOLY VIATICUM

CAN. 850

Sacram communionem per modum Viatici sive publice sive privatim ad infirmos deferre, pertinet ad parochum ad normam can. 848, salvo praescripto can. 397, n. 3 et can. 514, §§ 1–3.

To bring Holy Communion as Viaticum to the sick, either publicly or privately, belongs to the pastor in accordance with can. 848, with due regard to can. 397, n. 3, and can. 514, §§ 1–3.

The right here established belongs to the strictly parochial rights, and must therefore be respected by all priests, assistants or curates, including religious, even if exempt or acting as missionaries.[21] This is also true if Tertiaries of the Order of St. Francis are sick in their own houses and wish to receive the Viaticum. A Franciscan may hear their confession, but the administration of the last Sacraments belongs to the pastor in whose parish they live.[22] Exempt from this rule are clerical religious and cloistered Sisters, as explained under can. 514.

Canons of the cathedral are obliged to administer the last rites to their bishop, according to canon 397, 3°. Canons who reside in a parish must receive the last rites at the hands of the pastor within whose jurisdiction they live, not from the canons or dignitaries of the chapters to which they belong, whether collegiate or cathedral.[23]

It may not be amiss to add that the Code mentions no punishment for trespassing upon the rights of the pastor

21 S. C. P. F., June 13, 1633 (Coll., n. 73). Of course, if the express consent of the pastor is obtained, all those mentioned may administer the Viaticum.

22 S. Rit. C., June 20, 1609 (Dec. Auth., n. 271).

23 S. Rit. C., Mar. 17, 1663, ad 4; Dec. 18, 1756 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1255, 2441).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by religious, as was the case up to the date of its promulgation.[24] But it may also be useful to state that, as the right of pastors is here set forth, obedience involves a duty. Hence the pastor should not wait until he is called to the sick, but lovingly and prudently seek them out and persuade them to receive the Sacraments.[25] He should not discriminate between poor and rich, between those of noble and those of low birth or station.[26] It is the duty of the Ordinary to see to it that this obligation is not neglected by the pastors under his jurisdiction. This is one point that may be investigated at the canonical visitation.[27]

Can. 851

§ 1. Sacerdos sacram communionem distribuat azymo pane vel fermentato, secundum proprium ritum.

§ 2. Ubi vero necessitas urgeat nec sacerdos diversi ritus adsit, licet sacerdoti orientali qui fermentato utitur, ministrare Eucharistiam in azymo, vicissim latino aut orientali qui utitur azymo, ministrare in fermentato; at suum quisque ritum ministrandi servare debet.

The priest shall distribute Holy Communion according to his rite, either in unleavened or in leavened bread. But in case of necessity, if no priest of the respective rite is present, a priest of the Oriental rite, who would otherwise use leavened bread, may administer the Holy Eucharist in unleavened bread, and, conversely, a priest of the Latin or Oriental rite, who would ordinarily use unleavened bread, may give Holy Communion in leav-

24 Pius IX, "Apostolicae Sedis," Oct. 12, 1869, II, 14.

25 S. C. P. F., Sept. 11, 1719 (Coll., n. 537).

26 Benedict XIV, Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744, § 14, ad dub. XII.

27 Ib., "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ened bread; but each must observe the rubrics of his own rite.

Orientals generally use leavened bread for the Holy Eucharist, only the Armenians and Maronites are accustomed, ever since the fourth century, to consecrate and distribute unleavened bread.[28] The faithful, though they may gather in a church which serves both rites, must receive Holy Communion at the hands of the priest of their own rite, consequently in unleavened bread, if their rite so prescribes, or in leavened bread, if their rite prescribes that kind.[29] Pius X, who so ardently advocated frequent Communion, ruled in one of his Constitutions that, although unwarranted promiscuity of rite should be avoided, the faithful may, even for mere devotion's sake, receive Holy Communion according to any rite,[30] and consequently under the species of either leavened or unleavened bread. But the administering priest must say the prayers and observe the ceremonies according to his own language and rubrics.

COMMUNION UNDER THE SPECIES OF BREAD

CAN. 852

Sanctissima Eucharistia sub sola specie panis praebeatur.

Holy Communion may be administered under the species of bread only.

This brief canon recalls a long history of dissension and tragedy, especially in Bohemia, which the unhappy Hus attempted to separate from the centre of unity. He

28 Benedict XIV, "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 23.

29 Ibid., "Etsi Pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VI, n. XI.

30 "Tradita ab antiquis," Sept. 14, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 615 f.), II, III.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was not the originator of the demand for communion under both kinds, but his disciples carried the subversive principles of the master to their final consequences and adopted the chalice for the laity as a symbol of the Hussite union.[31] Against these heretics the Council of Constance, whose decision was approved by Martin V, maintained the ancient practice of the Church, which, as it says, was introduced in order to avoid the danger and scandals which so easily occur when Holy Communion is given under both species.[32] This text makes it evident that the law enacted in our canon is ecclesiastical, not divine, and, consequently, that the Church may tolerate a contrary custom, as she does among several (not all) Oriental rites.[33] But where the practice is connected with a heretical tendency, the Church must combat it. This tendency lies in the belief either that Christ is not received entirely under one species, or that the use of the chalice is required by divine law and hence the Church was mistaken in forbidding it. Where this error has taken root, the faithful must be carefully instructed and the use of the chalice gradually abolished.[34]

ARTICLE II

THE RECIPIENT OF HOLY COMMUNION

CAN. 853

Quilibet baptizatus qui iure non prohibetur, admitti potest et debet ad sacram communionem.

Every baptized person not forbidden by law may and must be admitted to Holy Communion.

31 Cf. Funk, Manual of Church History, 1913, Vol. II, p. 35.

32 Martin V, "In eminentis," Feb. 22, 1418 (Denz., n. 585).

33 Benedict XIV, "Allatae," July 26, 1755, § 25.

34 S. C. P. F., Dec. 6, 1777 (Coll., n. 524).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Every baptized person is by divine right entitled to receive Holy Communion, because Baptism has bestowed this right upon him. The obligation to receive Holy Communion rests, not on its absolute necessity for salvation (necessitate medii), but on the divine precept contained in the words of our Lord: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, you shall not have life in you." [35] This is a general law, which is based on the very end and organization of the Church. It has been modified in the course of centuries by special laws and regulations laid down by the Church for the welfare of the faithful and to safeguard the reverence and devotion due to this august Sacrament. The Church repels no one from the holy Table, even though his condition be humble, his mind weak, whether he lives in a palace or a sordid hut. All are called by Christ to His banquet,[36] and therefore the priests are in duty bound to offer every opportunity to the faithful for receiving Communion and to lay aside unreasonable and Jansenistic scruples. This does not mean that they should indiscriminately admit all, even public sinners, practical pagans, and unworthy Catholics who are a scandal to their community. Certain guiding rules [37] are set forth in the following canons.

COMMUNION OF CHILDREN

CAN. 854

§ 1. Pueris, qui propter aetatis imbecillitatem nondum huius sacramenti cognitionem et gustum habent, Eucharistia ne ministretur.

§ 2. In periculo mortis, ut sanctissima Eucharistia

35 John VI, 54.

36 Alex. VII, "Sacrosancti," Jan. 18, 1658, in XII, XIII (Coll. P. F., n. 129); of the same tenor is Clement IX, "In excelsa," Sept. 13, 1669.

37 S. C. P. F., April 29, 1784 (Coll., n. 569).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pueris ministrari possit ac debeat, satis est ut sciant Corpus Christi a communi cibo discernere illudque reverenter adorare.

§ 3. Extra mortis periculum plenior cognitio doctrinae christianae et accuratior praeparatio merito exigitur, ea scilicet, qua ipse fidei saltem mysteria necessaria necessitate medii ad salutem pro suo captu percipiant, et devote pro suae aetatis modulo ad sanctissimam Eucharistiam accedant.

§ 4. De sufficienti puerorum dispositione ad primam communionem iudicium esto sacerdoti a confessionibus eorumque parentibus aut iis qui loco parentum sunt.

§ 5. Parocho autem est officium advigilandi, etiam per examen, si opportunum prudenter iudicaverit, ne pueri ad sacram Synaxim accedant ante adeptum usum rationis vel sine sufficienti dispositione; itemque curandi ut usum rationis assecuti et sufficienter dispositi quamprimum hoc divino cibo reficiantur.

§ 1. To children who, by reason of their tender age, are unable to know and desire this Sacrament, it should not be given.

The dogmatic aspect of this canon is stated by the Council of Trent when it says that there is no obligation for children to receive Holy Communion,[38] because being regenerated in the laver of Baptism, and embodied in Christ, they have received the grace of adoption, which, at their age, they cannot lose.[39] The same Council refused to reprimand or forbid the custom of the Orientals to give Holy Communion to children under both species,[40] as 38 Sess. 21, can. 4 de Communione.

39 Ibid., cap. 4.

40 Among the Copts of Egypt the custom prevailed to administer holy communion even to children only eight days old, who would often vomit up the species of the sacred blood; S. O., June 14, 1741 (Coll. P. F., n. 326).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

long as belief in its necessity was not defended. But Benedict XIV forbade the Italian Greeks to follow that practice.[41] In the Latin Church the custom of administering Holy Communion to infant children never took root, and it is now universally forbidden. Our text is taken from the Rituale Romanum,[42] which has been the law for the Latin Church in the matter.

Our canon does not specify any age, but says, "pueris qui cognitionem et gustum non habent." The limit, according to can. 83, § 3, is about the seventh year. But this limit is not to be taken in the strict sense, because the clause is modified by the apposition phrase: "who have neither knowledge nor desire of the Holy Eucharist." Precocious children may have such a knowledge as well as desire, and may therefore be admitted to holy Communion. But no obligation to admit them before the seventh year can be read into the text, nor has such an obligation been established by the latest decrees.[43]

§ 2. Holy Communion may and must be administered to children who are in danger of death if they are able to distinguish the Holy Eucharist from common bread, and to adore it reverently. This means that they should be able to grasp at least the most necessary notion of that mystery, the real presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist.[44] It has been officially styled a "detestable abuse" not to administer the Viaticum to children who have attained the age of reason.

§ 3. Apart from the danger of death, a fuller knowledge of Christian doctrine and a more careful preparation is justly demanded, so that they may know, as far 41 "Etsi pastoralis," § II, n. VII; cf. IDEM, "Allatae," July 26, 1755, § 24.

42 Tit. IV, c. 1, n. 11.

43 S. C. Sacr., Aug. 8, 1910 n. I (A. Ap. S., II, 582).

44 S. O., April 10, 1861, ad 1 (Coll., n. 1213).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as they are capable, at least the mysteries which are absolutely necessary for salvation (necessitate medii) and approach the Holy Eucharist devoutly, according to the capacity of their age. This sounds quite different from the propositions proscribed in 1687 and 1690, of which the former required a passive attitude without an act of virtue or personal effort, whilst the latter demanded an absolutely pure love of God without any alloy as a requisite for receiving Holy Communion.[45]

The mysteries that are necessary necessitate medii for salvation are the Blessed Trinity and the Incarnation, of which the latter is an indispensable preamble to the mystery of the Holy Eucharist.

The age at which the obligation of receiving Holy Communion begins is approximately the seventh year. A full and perfect knowledge of the catechism is not required.[46] Formerly children had to be fully instructed in all the questions of the Catechism before they were admitted to the Sacred Table, but Pius X changed that.

§ 4. It belongs to the confessor and to the parents or guardians to judge whether children are sufficiently prepared for first Holy Communion.

§ 5. But it is the pastor's office to see to it, even by an examination if he prudently deems it opportune, that children are not admitted to Holy Communion before they have attained the age of discretion or without sufficient preparation, and to take care that those who have attained the use of reason and are sufficiently prepared, are nourished with this divine food as soon as possible.

Benedict XIV instructed bishops to admonish pastors not to admit any one to Holy Communion who did not know the more important articles of faith and chapters 45 Prop. 32 (of Mich. Molinos); propos. 23 (Denz., nn. 1119, 1180).

46 S. C. Sac., Aug. 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 582, n. II & III).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of Christian doctrine and the strength and efficacy of the Bl. Eucharist.[47]

WHO ARE NOT TO BE ADMITTED TO HOLY COMMUNION

CAN. 855

§ 1. Arcendi sunt ab Eucharistia publice indigni, quales sunt excommunicati, interdicti manifestoque infames, nisi de eorum poenitentia et emendatione constet et publico scandalo prius satisfecerint.

§ 2. Occultos vero peccatores, si occulte petant et eos non emendatos agnoverit, minister repellat; non autem, si publice petant et sine scandalo ipsos praeterire nequeat.

§ 1. The Holy Eucharist may not be given to such as are publicly unworthy, e. g., the excommunicated, interdicted and notoriously infamous, unless they have given signs of repentance and amendment and have repaired the scandal publicly given.

The general rule, as laid down by Benedict XIV,[48] is that public and notorious sinners must not be admitted to Holy Communion, no matter whether they demand it publicly or secretly. To give them the Body of Christ would be to coöperate in a profanation of the Sacrament, and such coöperation cannot be justified even on the plea of saving the good name of the petitioner, because by the publicity and notoriety of his crime he has lost the claim to a good name.

47 "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 9. There is, of course, room left for speculation.

48 "Ex omnibus," Oct. 16, 1756, § 3 f. The case concerned the Constitution of Clement IX, "Unigenitus," Sept. 8, 1713, by which 101 propositions of Paschasius Quesnel were condemned and which had aroused opposition.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The next question is: Who are public and notorious sinners? According to the same Pontiff sinners are public and notorious, (a) if they have been declared such by an ecclesiastical judge, or (b) if they have publicly confessed their crimes or, as we say, "pleaded guilty"; or (c) if they have committed in word or deed a crime that still lasts and is known to the public as not atoned for and therefore is a source of scandal. A sin is therefore notorious when it cannot be concealed, and public, like a matrimonial impediment, when it can be proved in court. All of which supposes, in our case, that the priest as well as the congregation, or at least the larger part thereof, are aware of the unworthiness of the one who wishes to receive Communion. If the priest knows nothing, or doubts the publicity or notoriety of the crime, it would certainly be safer to give the Holy Eucharist to one who publicly asks for it.[49]

The text adds: "quales sunt excommunicati, interdicti manifestoque infames." Excommunication requires at least a declaratory sentence, and hence notoriety is easily acquired. By interdicti must here be understood those who are under a personal interdict, because this alone follows the person.[50] Infamy is attached to certain crimes, either ipso facto,[51] or by declaration of the ecclesiastical court. Our canon does not distinguish between excommunicati vitandi and tolerati, nor between infamy of fact and of law, nor between excommunication reserved to the Holy See (in whatever form) and excommunication re-

49 Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 40.

50 Cf. can. 2269, § 2.

51 Ipso facto infames are those mentioned in can. 2320 (who desecrate the sacred species), in can. 2328 (who desecrate graves), in can. 2343 (who maliciously lay hands on the Pope), in can. 2351 (those who engage in duelling), in can. 2356 (polygamists), in can. 2357 (those condemned for unnatural crimes contra sextum). Infames formerly were the histriones, or public actors, who perverted young people; c. 95, Dist. 2, de cons.; also public usurers; cr. 3, 5, X, V, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

served to the Ordinary.[52] Hence all these categories are comprised by the term "publice indigni."

But the legislator adds the clause: unless it is known that they have repented and amended and repaired the public scandal they have given. Both these conditions are required. The following rules[53] are generally set up for judging the external disposition — of the internal men can hardly form a judgment — of a penitent:

(1) If a public sinner has lived in proximate occasion of sin, he must abandon it before he can be admitted. This applies especially to concubinarians.

(2) If no proximate occasion is involved a confession made publicly, or seen by several persons who are ready to testify to the fact, suffices, provided no ecclesiastical sentence has been pronounced; for if sentence of excommunication or a verdict was publicly pronounced, or infamy publicly declared, mere confession is not sufficient, but the sentence must first be withdrawn by the authority who pronounced it. After proper rehabilitation the penitent may be admitted unless he has again given public scandal.

(3) If a public reparation is required, as it sometimes is from those who have contracted marriage before a non-Catholic minister, it must be made before the culprit is admitted to Holy Communion.

(4) In the case of those who have relapsed into a vicious crime, if confession was made and the scandal somewhat repaired, some time should elapse before they are admitted to Communion, so that there be some guarantee of genuine amendment.

Those who order their bodies to be cremated after death, though they are not members of a Masonic sect nor

[52] C. 9, C. 11, q. 3.
[53] Cf. Lehmkuhl, II, n. 41; Noldin, l. c., n. 37.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have embraced its principles, must be admonished to retract the order, otherwise they cannot be given the last Sacraments. If admonition proves fruitless and no scandal is to be feared, they may be admitted to the Sacraments, provided they are in good faith.[54]

§ 2. Occult sinners, if they ask secretly and the priest knows they have not amended, should be refused the Bl. Sacrament; but not if they ask publicly and cannot be passed over without scandal.

This rule was made to spare the good name of such occult sinners as have not lost their reputation. Occult sinners are those whose unworthiness or crime is known only to a few persons and, we must add, which will not be proved in court within a short time.

All these, then, according to the general rule of the Church,[55] must be admitted to the Bl. Sacrament, if they ask for it publicly, i. e., approach the Communion railing together with others. The same rule holds good if such a one asks for the Viaticum, but in that instance the priest should elicit an act of sincere contrition and demand the retraction of possible errors[56] before he administers the Viaticum.

Freemasons and others who secretly belong to a sect condemned by the Church, cannot be refused if they publicly approach the Holy Eucharist, but notorious members of a condemned sect may and should be repulsed.[57]

CAN. 856

Nemo quem conscientia peccati mortalis gravat, quantumcumque etiam se contritum existimet, sine

54 S. O., July 27, 1892 (Coll. P. F., n. 1802 ad 1).

55 Benedict XIV, "Ex omnibus," § 9.

56 Ibid. This may also be the case with secret Modernists.

57 S. O., Aug. 1, 1855 (Coll. P. F., n. 1116).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

praemissa sacramentali confessione ad sacram communionem accedat; quod si urgeat necessitas ac copia confessarii illi desit, actum perfectae contritionis prius eliciat.

No one who is conscious of a mortal sin, no matter how sorry or contrite he may feel, is allowed to receive Holy Communion without having previously gone to confession. In case of urgent necessity, when no suitable confessor is at hand, such a one must make an act of perfect contrition before approaching the Sacred Table.

This canon we leave to moralists to explain, because it pertains to the court of consequence. We will only add that this law, no matter whether it be regarded as divine or ecclesiastical, is a grave one, as is apparent from the Council of Trent. Copia confessarii must be understood of any confessor with the necessary faculties who is not an accomplice of the penitent. Theologians say that the repugnance to, or impossibility of going to confession must be such as is not directly connected with the act itself. Urgent necessity of receiving Holy Communion exists when one has to fulfill the paschal obligation, and before contracting marriage.

COMMUNION MAY BE RECEIVED ONLY ONCE A DAY

CAN. 857

Nemini liceat sanctissimam Eucharistiam recipere, qui eam eadem die iam receperit, nisi in casibus de quibus in can. 858, § 1.

No one is allowed to receive Holy Communion on the day on which he has already received it; exception is made in case of the Holy Viaticum or irreverence to be avoided (see can. 858, § 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE EUCHARISTIC FAST

CAN. 858

§ 1. Qui a media nocte ieiunium naturale non servaverit, nequit ad sanctissimam Eucharistiam admitti, nisi mortis urgeat periculum, aut necessitas impediendi irreverentiam in sacramentum.

§ 2. Infirmi tamen qui iam a mense decumbunt sine certa spe ut cito convalescant, de prudenti confessarii consilio sanctissimam Eucharistiam sumere possunt semel aut bis in hebdomada, etsi aliquam medicinam vel aliquid per modum potus antea sumpserint.

§ 1. One who has not fasted since midnight cannot be admitted to Holy Communion, except he be in danger of death, or it be necessary to prevent irreverence towards the Blessed Sacrament.

This law is ecclesiastical only, but very ancient. It has always been rigorously enforced by the Church. The Pope alone has power to dispense from it.[58]

It does not, however, apply to those who are in probable danger of death, i. e., suffering from a sickness which may prove fatal. Soldiers going into battle are not per se exempt from it. If wounded, of course, the law ceases for them too; but it does not cease for those who have to meet sentence of death, unless they are at the same time suffering from a serious disease.[59] The second reason which excuses from fasting and also from the law that Holy Communion may be received but once a day, is [58] C. 54, Dist. 2, de cons.; Benedict XIV, "Quadam," March 24, 1756, § 3 (dispensing James III of England).

[59] July 5, 1854, ad 1 (Coll., n. 1099); the quotation of Noldin (l. c., n. 154), from S. C. P. F., July 21, 1841 (Coll., n. 928) mentions the case of prisoners to whom Holy Communion must be given as Viaticum, but nothing is said of their being dispensed from the law of fasting.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

the necessity of preventing irreverence towards the Blessed Sacrament. This would exist, e. g., if the altar or church were on fire or about to collapse, leaving no time for removing the Bl. Sacrament to a place of safety; or if it would be impossible to secure it from profanation by invading barbarians, heretics or infidels.

Beyond these two cases a canonist cannot stretch the interpretation, although it is customary [60] to add another: ad vitandum scandalum publicum. This may be admitted as a matter of equity which inheres in every human law.

§ 2. The sick who have been in bed for a month and have no certain hope of speedy recovery, may, if the confessor prudently advises, receive the Holy Eucharist once or twice a week, even though they have taken medicine or something by way of a drink.

This privilege now applies to all the faithful without exception.[61] All that is required is the confessor's (not the pastor's) advice.

"Per modum potus" includes broth, coffee, or any liquid food mixed with something solid, as, for instance, wheat-meal (semolino) or ground toast (pangrattato), etc., provided the liquid form remains.[62] Whether an egg-nog would be allowed seems to be doubtful,[63] although in case of great weakness we should not hesitate to permit this mixture, as long as the liquid form prevails. We also submit the following considerations:

(1) The law of fasting before Holy Communion certainly is an ecclesiastical positive law which is complied

60 Noldin, l. c., 153.

61 A decree of S. C. C., Dec. 7, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., t. 14, 486 f.) permitted it once or twice a week for pious institutions; for the rest, once or twice a month.

62 S. O., Sept. 7, 1897 (Coll., n. 1983).

63 Prümmer, l. c., III, n. 203, would admit it; also Ballerini-Palmieri (Opus Theol. Morale, IV, 730).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

with by those sick persons who can and do fast, say, three or five times a week. Consequently, they are entitled to receive Holy Communion without any restriction, provided they are disposed for, and desirous of, receiving it. In other words, they must strictly observe can. 858, § 1.

(2) § 2 of same canon undoubtedly is a favorable extension or mitigation of an otherwise strict law. And this modification allows sick persons in casu to receive Holy Communion once or twice a week even though they have taken medicine or something per modum potus, which a decree of S. C. C. (Dec. 7, 1906) explains as a beverage mixed with some bread (toast), egg or milk. This is a positive grant or permission which the lawgiver undoubtedly wishes to see made use of in order to foster the frequency of Holy Communion. However, there would be no grant or favor conveyed by § 2, can. 858, if the persons in casu would not be permitted to receive once or twice a week, supposing they had already received in compliance with § 1 of the same canon. Hence I conclude that § 2 grants something beyond and besides what is stated in § 1. Therefore if a sick person could receive five times with fasting, he or she would also be allowed to receive once or twice a week without fasting, and hence daily or almost daily. This view is in keeping with the mind of the lawgiver, who wishes to promote frequent Communion, and also with the old adage: favores convenit ampliari.

OBLIGATION OF RECEIVING COMMUNION

CAN. 859

§ 1. Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis, idest ad rationis usum, pervenerit, de-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bet semel in anno, saltem in Paschate, Eucharistiae sacramentum recipere, nisi forte de consilio proprii sacerdotis, ob aliquam rationabilem causam, ad tempus ab eius perceptione duxerit abstinendum.

§ 2. Paschalis communio fiat a dominica Palmarum ad dominicam in albis; sed locorum Ordinariis fas est, si ita personarum ac locorum adiuncta exigant, hoc tempus etiam pro omnibus suis fidelibus anticipare, non tamen ante quartam diem dominicam Quadragesimae, vel prorogare, non tamen ultra festum sanctissimae Trinitatis.

§ 3. Suadendum fidelibus ut huic praecepto satisfaciant in sua quisque paroecia; et qui in aliena paroecia satisfecerint, curent proprium parochum de adimpleto praecepto certiorem facere.

§ 4. Praeceptum paschalis communionis adhuc urget, si quis illud praescripto tempore, quavis de causa, non impleverit.

§ 1. Every Catholic, of either sex, who has reached the age of discretion, i. e., attained the use of reason, must receive Holy Eucharist once a year, at least during Easter time, unless his own priest should, for a reasonable cause, advise him to abstain from it for a time.

The summary of the Decretals[64] says: "This is a famous chapter and often to be quoted." It is famous especially for the reason that some non-Catholic writers use it to establish the date when auricular confession was introduced into the Church. The initial words are taken from a Decretal of the Fourth Lateran Council, which was adopted as an ecclesiastical precept by the Council of Trent.[65] The precept was made obligatory even for missionary countries like China, as far as the annual 64 C. 12, X, V, 38.

65 Sess. 13, can. 9, de Euch.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obligation goes, though as to the time some liberty was naturally left to the missionaries.[66] The obligation commences as soon as discretion has been attained, i. e., about the seventh year of age.[67]

The next clause, concerning the confessor's counsel to abstain for a time, may be understood in the sense of spiritual direction, or as a reparation for scandal given, or similar reasons. The penitent's own priest, according to the Decretal, means the parish priest, and this no doubt is also the meaning of our text, though we believe that if the penitent would tell the pastor about his confessor's counsel, the pastor should not further trouble himself or the penitent.

§ 2. The time for receiving the Paschal Communion extends from Palm Sunday to Low Sunday; but the local Ordinaries may prolong the time for all the faithful of their diocese from Laetare Sunday to Trinity Sunday, both inclusive, provided circumstances of persons and place demand such a prolongation.

Benedict XIV had extended the time for receiving the Paschal Communion for Servia[68] from the beginning of Lent to Pentecost and in our country it was by special faculties prolonged from Lent to Trinity Sunday. Hereafter the common law must be observed, which, however, permits the Ordinaries to extend the term as stated. Every such extension must be duly promulgated, and if the bishop extends the time, it also benefits religious, who may therefore distribute Holy Communion in their churches during that time.[69] If the Holy Eucharist is distributed during the solemn Mass on Holy Saturday, the 66 S. O., March 23, 1656, Nov. 13, 1669; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., nn. 126, 189, 114).

67 S. C. Sac., Aug. 8, 1910, ad 1 (A. Ap. S., II, 582).

68 "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 22, 1744, § 21.

69 Benedict XIV, "Magno cum animi," June 2, 1751, § 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

faithful who receive it comply with this commandment.[70]

§ 3 says that it is advisable for the faithful (therefore, no longer[71] a strict command), to receive the Paschal Communion in their own parish church, and if they have received it in another church, to notify their pastor of the fact.

§ 4. The precept of receiving the Paschal Communion obliges even after the lapse of the prescribed term, and should therefore be complied with as soon as possible, and one may not wait until the next Easter time if he has neglected this duty.[72]

THE DUTY OF PARENTS AND OTHERS

CAN. 860

Obligatio praecepti communionis sumendae, quae impuberes gravat, in eos quoque ac praecipue recidit, qui ipsorum curam habere debent, idest in parentes, tutores, confessarium, institutores et parochum.

This canon reminds parents, guardians, confessors, directors of schools and pastors, of the obligation incumbent upon them to see to it that impuberes entrusted to their care comply with the precept of receiving Holy Communion at least once a year, during Easter time. Puberty, according to can. 81, § 2, commences for boys with the fourteenth, and for girls with the twelfth year, completed. After that age the obligation, if not morally, ceases at least juridically, for the classes of persons named in the text.[73]

70 S. Rit. C., March 22, 1806 (Dec. Auth., n. 2561).

71 Cfr. Benedict XIV, "Magno cum animi," § 22.

72 Eugene IV, "Fide digna," July 8, 1440; Pruemmer, l. c., III, n. 212.

73 S. C. Sac., Aug. 8, 1910, ad IV (A. Ap. S., II, 582).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

UNWORTHY COMMUNION DOES NOT SATISFY THE LAW

CAN. 861

Praecepto communionis recipiendae non satisfit per sacrilegam communionem.

The precept of receiving the Eucharist is not complied with by a sacrilegious Communion.

The contradictory proposition was condemned by Innocent XI.[74] One who has knowingly and willingly made a sacrilegious communion must, either before the lapse of the term, or as soon as possible after the expiration of the paschal time, receive Communion worthily.

COMMUNION ON HOLY THURSDAY

CAN. 862

Expedit ut feria V maioris hebdomadae omnes clerici, etiam sacerdotes qui ea die a Sacro litando abstinent, sanctissimo Christi Corpore in Missa sollemni seu conventuali reficiantur.

It is becoming that, on Holy Thursday, all the clergy, even the priests who abstain from saying Mass on that day, receive Holy Communion at the solemn or conventual Mass.

Because, as a rule, there should be only one solemn Mass on Holy Thursday, many priests are free from the obligation of celebrating on that day. To perpetuate the memory of that Sacred Day, on which the Lord Himself distributed his Body and Blood, the Ordinaries are admonished to distribute Holy Communion to the clergy.[75] The S. Congregation has more than once declared that 74 Prop. 55 dam., March 4, 1679 (Denz., n. 1072).

75 Caeremoniale Ep., l. II, c. 23, n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the bishop can compel dignitaries and canons and their substitutes, if they are not obliged to say Mass,[76] to receive Holy Communion from him or another celebrant.[77] However, our text cannot be construed as implying a strict obligation, as "expedit" does not signify a strict law in canonical language. The Ordinary shall, therefore, use persuasion rather than force. After all the clergy have received Holy Communion, the civil magistrates may be admitted before the rest of the people, and at the procession, march after the baldachino.[78]

FREQUENT COMMUNION

CAN. 863

Excitentur fideles ut frequenter, etiam quotidie, pane Eucharistico reficiantur ad normas in decretis Apostolicae Sedis traditas; utque Missae adstantes non solum spirituali affectu, sed sacramentali etiam sanctissimae Eucharistiae perceptione, rite dispositi, communicent.

We are familiar with the rules concerning frequent Communion laid down by the saintly Pius X. The Church has never ceased[79] to exhort the faithful to frequent, nay even daily Communion, not only in spirit, but in reality, provided they were duly prepared. Jansenism, as is well known, was opposed to this practice, nor were the troublesome times of the French Revolution and the teaching of Wessenberg in Germany and the synod of 76 If a holy-day of obligation would fall on that day, several priests would have to say Mass; S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1716 (Dec. Auth., n. 2240), and thus could not receive.

77 S. Rit. C., Sept. 19, 1654; Sept. 10, 1701; Dec. 22, 1770; Sept. 23, 1837 (Dec. Auth., nn. 970, 2079, 2489, 2769).

78 S. Rit. C., Aug. 12, 1854 (Dec. Auth., n. 3024).

79 S. C. C., Feb. 1679 (Denz., n. 1086).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Pistoja in Italy favorable to its growth. But finally a pacific victory was brought about by the efforts of Pius X.

Our text mentions the norms laid down in the decrees issued by the Holy See. These norms are especially the "Sacra Tridentina Synodus," of Dec. 20, 1905, the "Editae saepe," of May 26, 1910, and the "Quam singulari," of the S. Congregation of the Sacraments, of Aug. 8, 1910. The latter was ordered to be read annually in the vernacular, but the purpose of this provision seems to be attained by the promulgation of the Code, which embodies the main contents of the decree. We may therefore assume that the decree need no longer be read, though it would not be wrong to do so.

DUTY OF RECEIVING THE VIATICUM

CAN. 864

§ 1. In periculo mortis, quavis ex causa procedat, fideles sacrae communionis recipiendae praecepto tenentur.

§ 2. Etiamsi eadem die sacra communione fuerint refecti, valde tamen suadendum, ut in vitae discrimen adducti denuo communicent.

§ 3. Perdurante mortis periculo, sanctum viaticum, secundum prudens confessarii consilium, pluries, distinctis diebus, administrari et licet et decet.

§ 1. When there is danger of death, no matter from what cause it arises, the faithful are obliged by the precept of receiving Holy Communion.

This precept, though purely ecclesiastical, is a grievous one. It was insisted upon already by the Council of Nicaea.[80] Priests, therefore, should take care that [80] C. 9, C. 26, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Holy Eucharist be always ready for sick calls.[81] From whatever cause the danger may arise, says the text, which means that not only intrinsic maladies or diseases are to be considered but also extrinsic causes, such as a sentence of death awaiting prisoners.[82] Besides, though the illness may last a long time, as is the case with consumptives, the Holy Viaticum should not be delayed, especially if they live at a distance.[83]

§ 2. Although these have already received Holy Communion on the same day, they should be strongly advised to receive it again when the crisis sets in.

The Code has hereby cut short the controversy [84] on the necessity and admissibility of receiving Holy Communion twice on the same day. It is not only permissible, but even advisable, when there is danger of death, though no strict obligation is enforced.

§ 3. It is lawful and becoming to administer the Viaticum several times on different days as long as the danger of death lasts, according to the prudent judgment of the confessor.[85] In that case the formula "Corpus Domini" is used.

CAN. 865

Sanctum Viaticum infirmis ne nimium differatur; et qui animarum curam gerunt, sedulo advigilent ut eo infirmi plene sui compotes reficiantur.

The Holy Viaticum should not be too long deferred, and those in charge of souls should take great care that the sick receive it while fully conscious.

This law has been time and again impressed upon

81 C. 93, Dist. 2, de cons.

82 S. C. P. F., July 21, 1841 (Coll., n. 928), but in that case they would have to fast.

83 S. C. P. F., Feb. 20, 1801 (Coll., 657): morbo etico.

84 Cfr. Noldin, l. c., n. 138.

85 Rit. Rom., tit. IV, c. 4, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishops as well as pastors.[86] It is a matter for the Ordinary to investigate at the time of the canonical visitation.[87] The reason is not far to seek; the better the disposition of the recipient, the greater the effects of this holy Sacrament.

CAN. 866

RITE OF HOLY COMMUNION

§ 1. Omnibus fidelibus cuiusvis ritus datur facultas ut, pietatis causa, sacramentum Eucharisticum quolibet ritu confectum suscipiant.

§ 2. Suadendum tamen ut suo quisque ritu fideles praecepto communionis paschalis satisfaciant.

§ 3. Sanctum Viaticum moribundis ritu proprio accipiendum est; sed, urgente necessitate, fas esto quolibet ritu illud accipere.

Holy Communion, even for devotion's sake, may be distributed to the faithful of any rite in the species consecrated in any rite; but they should be advised to receive the Paschal Communion in their own rite. The Holy Viaticum should, except in case of necessity, be received by the dying in their own rite.

These are the rules laid down by Benedict XIV, Leo XIII, and Pius X,[88] who all wished to see the faithful receive Holy Communion as often as their devotion and spiritual welfare demand. The condition, of course, is that the rite be Catholic, not schismatic or heretical.[89]

86 Alexander VII, "Sacrosancti," Jan. 18, 1658, § 2, n. XIII (Coll. P. F., n. 129).

87 Benedict XIV, "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 9.

88 "Etsi Pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VI, n. XIII f.; "Orientalium," Nov. 30, 1894, n. II; "Tradita ab antiquis," Sept. 14, 1912, III–V.

89 S. C. P. F., Aug. 18, 1893 (Coll., n. 1846).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ARTICLE III

TIME AND PLACE FOR DISTRIBUTING HOLY COMMUNION

Time

CAN. 867

§ 1. Omnibus diebus licet sanctissimam Eucharistiam distribuere.

§ 2. Feria tamen VI maioris hebdomadae solum licet sacrum Viaticum ad infirmos deferre.

§ 3. In Sabbato Sancto sacra communio nequit fidelibus ministrari nisi inter Missarum sollemnia vel continuo ac statim ab iis expletis.

§ 4. Sacra communio iis tantum horis distribuatur, quibus Missae sacrificium offerri potest, nisi aliud rationabilis causa suadeat.

§ 5. Sacrum tamen Viaticum quacunque diei aut noctis hora ministrari potest.

§ 1. The Holy Eucharist may be distributed every day of the year.

§ 2. But on Good Friday only the Viaticum may be administered to the sick.

§ 3. On Holy Saturday Holy Communion may be distributed only at the (solemn) Mass or immediately thereafter.

§ 4. Holy Communion may be distributed only at hours when Mass may be said, unless good reasons advise a deviation from this rule.

§ 5. But the Holy Viaticum may be administered at any hour of the day or night.

Although, says a well-known decree of the S. C. Concilii, frequent and even daily Communion has been recommended by the Holy Fathers, yet the Church has never appointed certain days of the week or month on which the faithful should abstain from, or receive, Holy Communion. Much less is there any divine precept enjoining daily Communion.[90] If the Viaticum is brought publicly to the sick on Good Friday the psalms must be recited in a very low voice, but the color of the stole is white. When it is brought quasi-privately, the people must be dismissed from church without the usual blessing, because the Blessed Sacrament should not be kept in the church [91] but in the sepulchre.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It is remarkable that Communion may now be distributed immediately after the conventual or solemn Mass [92] on Holy Saturday. But the phrase "continuo ac statim" must be carefully noted, because it indicates that before the Mass, or after the priest has left the altar, no distribution of Holy Communion is allowed. The faithful who receive Holy Communion on that day fulfill the paschal precept.

The time for receiving Holy Communion is during Mass, and the faithful should be exhorted to receive it when assisting at the Holy Sacrifice. However, if they ask for it outside of Mass, they should not be refused, because they are supposed to ask reasonably.[93] But Holy Communion is not to be distributed [94] before the time for Mass, as stated under can. 821, nor after that time, especially not until sunset, because abuses might easily creep in.

90 Feb. 12, 1679 (Coll. P. F., n. 219).

91 S. Rit. C., May 15, 1745 (Dec. Auth., n. 2383).

92 S. Rit. C., March 22, 1806 (Dec. Auth., n. 2561), did not yet allow that, but the decree of April 28, 1914, ad II (A. Ap. S., VI, 196 f.) simply says: et etiam expleta Missa. Our text has two additions.

93 Gasparri, De SS. Euch., n. 1084.

94 S. Rit. C., Sept. 7, 1816, ad 23 (Dec. Auth., n. 2572); June 11, 1904, ad III (Anal. Eccl., XII, 334).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 868

Sacerdoti celebranti non licet Eucharistiam intra Missam distribuere fidelibus adeo distantibus ut ipse altare e conspectu amittat.

A priest saying Mass is not allowed to distribute Holy Communion during Mass to persons who are so far from the altar that he himself would lose sight of the altar.

The principle underlying this canon is that the priest must never lose sight of the altar for the reason that Holy Communion is an integral part of the Mass and some particles may remain unconsumed until the last ablution. Therefore the S. Congregation has decided more than once that a celebrating priest is not allowed to bring Communion during Mass to sick persons or others who are in a different though an adjoining room from the oratory where he says Mass.[95] This applies to pious institutions and private oratories. If all the particles have been distributed but some fragments remain on the paten, these should be placed in the pyxis which is kept in the tabernacle if no other priest says Mass in the same chapel.[96]

A practical conclusion from this law is that the Communion rails should be made so that the altar can be seen from every corner.

Place

CAN. 869

Sacra communio distribui potest ubicunque Missam celebrare licet, etiam in oratorio privato, nisi loci Or-95 S. Rit. C., Dec. 19, 1829; Florentina, ad 1 (Dec. Auth., n. 2672), Dec. 7, 1844 (n. 2883); May 11, 1878 (n. 3448).

96 S. Rit. C., March 1860 (n. 3099).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dinarius, iustis de causis, in casibus particularibus id prohibuerit.

Holy Communion may be distributed wherever Mass may be said, even in private oratories, unless the local Ordinary should for just reasons forbid it in some particular case.

This text is based on a general decree of the Congregation of Rites permitting the distribution of Holy Communion to all the faithful who assist at Mass in a private Oratory. But the decree expressly says: with due regard to the rights of the pastor,[97] and consequently these should never be curtailed or jeopardized, otherwise the Ordinary may forbid the distribution of Holy Communion.

[97] S. Rit. C., May 8, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., t. 15, 403).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IV

THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE

CAN. 870

In poenitentiae sacramento, per iudicialem absolutionem a legitimo ministro impertitam, fideli rite disposito remittuntur peccata post baptismum commissa.

In the Sacrament of Penance, through a judicial absolution imparted by a legitimate minister, the sins committed after baptism are forgiven to every faithful Catholic who is properly disposed.

This is the true concept of the Sacrament of Penance based on Scripture and tradition. Penance is one of the seven Sacraments instituted by Christ. It follows Baptism and is therefore sometimes called the "second plank of salvation" or "laborious Baptism." It is effected by the judicial absolution of the priest, but not without the formal coöperation of the penitent, who must be properly disposed by having either contrition or attrition, as the theologians [1] say.

What most concerns the canonist is the judicial absolution.[2] The power of the keys, i.e., to forgive and retain sins, is exercised by pronouncing the sentence of forgiveness or retention. This sentence is rendered by the judges of the society founded by Christ. The essence

1 Cfr. Palmieri, De Poenitentia, Romae 1879; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. III, 3rd ed., 1919.

2 Trid., sess. 14, c; 1–8; can. 1–4, 9, 12, 15, de Poenit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the judiciary power consists in authority to impose an obligation or to assert a right or law with regard to one who is subject to authority and a debtor to the law in a matter that falls under that law and authority. The penitent who accuses himself of guilt towards God, has contracted a twofold debt: the reatus culpae and the reatus poenae: guilt and punishment, and God alone can absolve him from either. He does not do so directly, but through certain human agents, who act by His authority and commission. These are true judges, and their power is a truly judiciary power which does not merely announce forgiveness, like a preacher of penance, but pronounces sentence of justification which is ratified by God.[3]

[3] Trid., sess. 6, c. 14, can. 29, de iustif.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

THE MINISTER OF PENANCE

CAN. 871

Minister huius sacramenti est solus sacerdos.

CAN. 872

Praeter potestatem ordinis, ad validam peccatorum absolutionem requiritur in ministro potestas iurisdictionis, sive ordinaria sive delegata, in poenitentem.

The sole minister of this sacrament is the priest, who, to absolve validly, needs not only the power of order, but also the power of jurisdiction, either ordinary or delegated, over the penitent.

This again is a dogmatic truth, based on sources to which it is not necessary here to refer. Early documents amply prove that it was the presbyteri, both of the higher, i.e., episcopal and the lower, i.e., priestly rank, who exercised the power of the keys.[1] Peter Abélard wrongly limited the exercise of this power to the Apostles,[2] whereas Wiclif, Hus, and Luther unduly extended it to all Christians, including laymen.[3] The Church requires the priestly character as the fundamental condition or aptitude because of the hieratic element which is intimately connected with the jurisdictional

1 Cfr Trid., sess. 14, c. 1, de poenit.; sess. 23, c. 15, de ref.

2 Prop. dam. ab Innoc. II., n. 12 (Denzinger, n. 321). Palmieri, l. c., p. 161 ff.

3 Denzinger, nn. 565, 566, 637.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

power. But since the exercise of this power is really a judiciary act, which pre-supposes jurisdiction, jurisdiction also is essentially required. The Code almost exclusively employs the term, jurisdiction,[4] approbatio being used, as it were, only by the way. Besides the term jurisdiction there occurs the noun licentia.[5]

1. Jurisdiction is here understood as the power of hearing confession or imparting judicial absolution validly, in the act of sacramental confession. This may, as the text says, like any other jurisdiction, be twofold, viz., ordinary or delegated. It is ordinary if attached to the office one holds; delegated if given to the person by virtue of a special commission. It may be delegated either by a local Ordinary (can. 874, § 1), and in that case is limited to the territory of that Ordinary (can. 875, § 1) or by an exempt religious superior, and in that case is restricted to the person or subjects of the religious superior.[6]

2. Licentia, license or permission, is the formal approval required for licitly exercising the office of confessor. It is not necessarily the result of a doctrinal examination,[7] but may be a merely moral provision or concession made to render the act conformable to the requisites of obedience or subordination. And in this sense it may be identified with the former approbatio, inasmuch as this was considered to be an authentic judgment as to a priest's fitness for hearing confessions. The Code only mentions jurisdiction for validly, and license for licitly hearing confessions, but adds that the jurisdiction must concern the penitent, in other words, the con-

[4] Cfr. Vol. II, p. 170 ff., of this Commentary.

[5] Cfr. can. 881 f.; approbatus, as an adjective.

[6] Not quite accurate, therefore, is what we read in Schmitt, S. J., Supplementum ad Noldin, 1918, p. 53: "iurisdictio vero delegata est tantum territorialis."

[7] Cfr. can. 877, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fessor must have power over the penitent, who therefore becomes, or is supposed to be, his subject. This power, as stated before, is acquired by reason of the office or by special commission. Thus according to can. 875, § 1, an exempt religious superior of the clerical order grants to the priests of his organization delegated jurisdiction over the professed members, novices and others mentioned in can. 514, § 1. The Bishop enjoys ordinary jurisdiction for his territory and may delegate priests, secular as well as religious, for hearing confessions in his diocese.

Here it may be proper to discuss the controversy concerning the exemption which has formed a favorite topic in theological circles since the time of Martin IV (1281–1285).[8] Boniface VIII endeavored to settle the dispute between the Ordinaries and the mendicant friars. His Decretal[9] says that even if the Ordinary has given any one permission to choose his confessor, the latter can not absolve from cases especially reserved by the Ordinary. But since the exempt regulars contended that they obtained jurisdiction immediately from the Pope through their superiors, for which contention they were able to quote a Constitution of Martin IV, the dispute was by no means ended. The Council of Trent finally enacted that no priest, whether secular or regular, could absolve any one except he had first been examined and approved by the Ordinary. Exception was made for those who held a parish benefice,[10] because no one could be promoted to such a benefice without an examination. The rule thenceforth was that secular as well as regular priests, who wished to hear confessions of secular persons or nuns not subject to regular prelates, were obliged to have the "approbation" of the Ordinary of [8] Cfr. Vol. III, p. 34 f., of this Commentary.

[9] C. 2, 6°, V.

[10] Trid., sess. 23, c. 15, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the diocese.[11] Notwithstanding these plain rules, it happened in Spain that persons sticking too closely to the "Cruciata," obtained special indults for choosing confessors not approved by the local Ordinaries. This abuse was done away with completely by Benedict XIV, following in the footsteps of his predecessors.[12] He, as well as Gregory XV and Clement X,[13] declared that a religious, even though approved for hearing confessions in his diocese by the local Ordinary, can not validly absolve in a strange diocese a penitent coming from the diocese for which he was approved. Some regulars, besides, claimed that a religious presented to the bishop but rejected in the examination, could validly hear the confessions of seculars and absolve from cases reserved to the bishop. This proposition was proscribed.[14] Parish priests, i.e., priests who held a parish benefice, maintained that they could choose for their confessor any priest, even though he was not approved by the Ordinary. This proposition, too, was condemned.[15] Later it was asked of the S. Congregation whether a pastor, say of the diocese of St. Joseph, called in by a pastor of the diocese of Kansas City, may validly hear confessions without special jurisdiction from the bishop of Kansas City. The answer was: Yes, of his own subjects but not of others (affirmative quoad subditos, negative quoad alios).[16] This was the status quaestionis when the Code went into effect. These preliminary explanations will help the reader to understand the following canons.

11 S. C. C., June 7, 1755 (Richter, Trid., p. 205, nn. 1, 4).

12 "Apostolica indulta," Aug. 5, 1744.

13 Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 1622; Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 4.

14 Prop dam. ab Alex. VII, n. 13, Sept. 24, 1665 (Denzinger, n. 984).

15 Prop. dam. ab Alex. VII, n. 16, Sept. 24, 1665 (Denzinger, n. 987).

16 S. C. C. Nov. 19, 1707 (Richter, Trid., p. 206, n. 3); Benedict XIV, Instit., 86, n. 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ORDINARY JURISDICTION

CAN. 873

§ 1. Ordinaria iurisdictione ad confessiones excipiendas pro universa Ecclesia, praeter Romanum Pontificem, potiuntur S. R. E. Cardinales; pro suo quisque territorio Ordinarius loci, et parochus aliique qui loco parochi sunt.

§ 2. Hac eadem iurisdictione gaudent etiam canonicus poenitentiarius ecclesiae quoque collegiatae, ad normam can. 401, § 1, et Superiores religiosi exempti pro suis subditis, ad normam constitutionum.

§ 3. Haec iurisdictio cessat amissione officii, ad normam can. 183, § 1, et, post sententiam condemnatoriam vel declaratoriam, excommunicatione, suspensione ab officio, interdicto.

§ 1. Besides the Roman Pontiff, the Cardinals possess ordinary jurisdiction for hearing confessions in the whole Church; in the various dioceses the local Ordinaries, in their own districts the pastors, and those who take the place of pastors enjoy jurisdiction.

§ 2. The Penitentiary Canons of cathedral and collegiate Churches (can. 401, § 1) have the same jurisdiction; also exempt religious superiors with regard to their subjects, according to the constitutions of the respective institute.

1. The Sovereign Pontiff has the plenitude of the power of jurisdiction in and over the whole Church, and hence may hear confessions validly and licitly everywhere without notifying the local Ordinaries.

2. There can no longer be any doubt[17] that the 17 Formerly, unless they were legati a latere, cardinals did not, at least by law, enjoy this privilege.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, too, may personally hear confessions everywhere; but theirs is a strictly personal privilege[18] that can not be communicated to others. Can. 239, § 1, 1° says that Cardinals may validly and licitly hear confessions throughout the whole world, of secular as well as religious persons, and absolve them from all sins and censures except those most specially reserved to the Apostolic See and those attached to the revealing of the secret of confession, called "secret of the Holy Office."[19] From the general tenor of this canon it must be concluded that Cardinals may also absolve from cases reserved to, and by, the Ordinary.

3. The Ordinary enjoys ordinary jurisdiction within his territory, to which he is, as a rule, restricted. However, he may validly absolve his own subjects everywhere (ubique terrarum; can. 881, § 2).[20]

4. The same law applies to pastors and those who take their places. Pastors, therefore, enjoy ordinary jurisdiction in the court of conscience, for hearing confessions within the boundaries of their parishes, and for their own subjects also outside their parish limits, nay even outside the diocese. This is in accordance with the Council of Trent and certain later decisions of the Apostolic See.[21]

What about our American parish priests? We cannot 18 The S. C. Cons., April 25, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 190) calls it a personal privilege, like those of Ordinaries, can. 349. Such personal privileges cannot be communicated per modum facultatum; cfr. S. Poenit., July 18, 1919 (A. Ap. S., XI, 332).

19 The secretum S. Officii is a special secret to which all officials of the Holy Office and other persons placed under the same obligation are bound by an oath.

20 Cfr. Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 22.

21 Trid., sess. 23, c. 15, de ref.; Benedict XIV, Const. cit.; S. C. C., Nov. 19, Dec. 3, 1707 (Richter, Trid., p. 206, n. 3); Benedict XIV, Instit., 86, n. 7; cfr. can. 881, § 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

depart from what we have said in Vol. II of this Commentary on their legal status. They are and must be considered parochi, no matter whether they are removable or irremovable, because this quality is now accidental only, and not essential, to a pastor, as canon 454, § 2 clearly states. Consequently, by virtue of their appointment they obtain ordinary jurisdiction for hearing confessions and from the moment of taking possession of their parish,[22] may exercise this ordinary jurisdiction.

Who are a pastor's subjects? Those who have their domicile or quasi-domicile within the limits of his parish. The confessions of these, then, he may validly and licitly hear everywhere.[23]

The question again arises concerning our linguistically distinguished parishes. To these, we believe, the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum ministerium," which was issued for England in 1753, may be applied. § 2 of this Constitution says that secular as well as regular priests may hear confessions in the whole city or town without discrimination. This, we say, is similar to our case, and therefore, for instance, the pastor of a German-speaking congregation may validly hear the confessions of any of his subjects in the same town or city by virtue of his appointment and also the confessions of those who come to him from another parish, or even from another diocese. Besides, with due reverence to the pastor of another parish,[24] or with his permission, he may also licitly hear confessions in the church of that parish. Lastly, § 2 of can. 881 may be applied also to pastors, who thus may hear their own subjects everywhere.

22 Can. 461; can. 1443.
23 See Can. 811, § 2.
24 Benedict XIV, Const. cit., § 22: "debitis tamen officiis cum ipsius rectore antea persolutis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5. "Aliique qui loco parochi sunt." Who are these "others who take the place of a pastor"? They are the oeconomi and coadiutores who act as substitutes for disabled or absent pastors, as described in can. 473–475. Our so-called assistants or curates cannot be numbered among this class and therefore do not enjoy ordinary jurisdiction.

6. The Canonicus Poenitentiarius can absolve all, even strangers in the diocese, from sins and censures reserved to the bishop; he may absolve the subjects of his diocese outside his own territory. This power is granted to the canon penitentiary not only of the cathedral but also of a collegiate church.[25] Innocent III had ordained[26] that the bishops should choose helpers in the discharge of their pastoral office, especially for hearing confessions in cathedral and conventual churches. From this it follows that by their very appointment these canons enjoy ordinary jurisdiction according to what has been stated above.

7. Exempt religious superiors, finally, enjoy ordinary jurisdiction over their own subjects, according to the form of their constitutions. It was always understood that exempt religious superiors obtained their jurisdiction over their own subjects from the Sovereign Pontiff. This follows from the very notion of exemption. Exempt superiors are the superiors of all religious institutes which are exempt either by reason of their institution or by a special indult. As can. 875, § 2 clearly states, the privilege applies only to exempt institutes of clerics.

25 Can. 401, § 1.

26 C. 15, X, I, 31. The diocesan or collegiate chapter has no right to oppose the appointment of a Canon Poenit. (S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 19, 1846; Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 548 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The superiors here mentioned are those who are called maiores, hence the generals or provincials of exempt orders or congregations and their vicars, who hold a position similar to the provincial.[27] The text adds: ad normam constitutionum, in accord with the respective constitutions.

The abbots[28] of single and autonomous monasteries are real superiors in the sense of our text; such also are the conventual priors[29] of independent monasteries or convents, whereas the priores claustrales cannot claim ordinary jurisdiction, unless a special clause in the constitutions either denies that power to conventual priors or gives it to cloistral priors. Attention may here be drawn to can. 518, § 2, concerning the hearing of confessions of subjects.[30]

§ 3. Ordinary jurisdiction for hearing confession ceases when the office to which it is attached, is lost, as laid down in can. 183, and after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication, suspension from office or interdict. Ordinary jurisdiction also ceases at the moment one's resignation is accepted, when privation or removal is duly intimated, when the term of office expires,[31] and after one has been declared to have incurred, or has been condemned to, excommunication,[32] or personal interdict,[33] or suspension from office.[34]

27 Can. 488, n. 8.

28 The Abbot President of the Swiss-American Congregation, according to its Constitution, may hear the confessions of all its members, otherwise the Abbot President would not be entitled to do so, nor is the Abbot Primate.

29 Concerning the Priors of the Augustinians see S. C. EE. et RR., June 3, 1864 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 720); they are real conventual priors and therefore superiores maiores.

30 Clement VIII, "Sanctissimus," May 26, 1593; S. C. C., Sept. 21, 1624 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 246).

31 Can. 183.

32 Can. 2261, § 3.

33 Can. 2275, n. 2.

34 Can. 2284.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DELEGATED JURISDICTION

CAN. 874

§ 1. Iurisdictonem delegatam ad recipiendas confessiones quorumlibet sive saecularium sive religiosorum confert sacerdotibus tum saecularibus tum religiosis etiam exemptis Ordinarius loci in quo confessiones excipiuntur; sacerdotes autem religiosi eadem ne utantur sine licentia saltem praesumpta sui Superioris, firmo tamen praescripto can. 519.

§ 2. Locorum Ordinarii iurisdictionem ad audiendas confessiones habitualiter ne concedant religiosis qui a proprio Superiore non praesentantur; iis vero qui a proprio Superiore praesentantur, sine gravi causa eam ne denegent, firmo tamen praescripto can. 877.

§ 1. Delegated jurisdiction is conferred by the local Ordinary in whose diocese the confessions are to be heard, on priests, secular as well as religious, even exempt religious, for hearing confessions of both secular and religious persons; but priests of religious institutes, though thus endowed with delegated jurisdiction, in addition thereto need the permission of their superiors, in order to absolve licitly, with due regard always to can. 519. Here the recipients of delegated jurisdiction are mentioned as far as certain classes of penitents are concerned, namely:

(a) Secular persons, i.e., such as have not entered the religious state by taking the three vows; hence also members of societies who live in common without vows;[35] secular clergymen, even priests of any clerical rank of the secular order.[36]

35 Cfr. can. 673, § 1.

36 Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 1622, § 1; Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) Religious of the male sex, no matter whether exempt or not. All these may be validly and licitly absolved by any priest who has been endowed with delegated jurisdiction by the Ordinary.

Here a doubt may occur as to pastors, who have ordinary power, but are not specially mentioned in can. 519. This doubt seems unfounded because in said canon approval only is mentioned, and pastors are certainly supposed to be approved by the Ordinary, and, besides, the validity could certainly not be doubted.

The ministers who receive jurisdiction from the Ordinary are priests, secular as well as religious, including those who are exempt. Concerning the latter, especially the mendicants, there was a controversy, which is now decided. Religious, therefore, no matter of what order, congregation, institute or society, even though otherwise exempt from the law, need delegated jurisdiction to hear the confessions of secular persons, including priests.[37] No exception is made for any kind of regulars or religious, even at the time of missions or on the occasion of a jubilee — unless, of course, the Bull of the Jubilee decided differently.[38] All must have delegated jurisdiction from the local Ordinary.

Now the local Ordinary is the one in whose diocese the confessions are heard. Hence it is not sufficient that a religious obtains what we call the faculties for the diocese in which the religious house is located, to validly hear 37 Cfr. the Constitutions quoted in the preceeding note, and S. C. EE. et RR., Zagabrien., Dec. 14, 1674 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 271 ff.). Can. 514, § 1 is, of course, to be consulted, as seen under can. 875, § 1.

38 S. C. C., Dec. 4, 1683 (Richter, Trid., p. 206, n. 2); the confessions heard by regulars at the time of a jubilee were invalid, and the penitents who had a doubt about the validity of their confession, or knew of the lack of jurisdiction of such confessors, had to repeat the confession, in order to gain the indulgence; those in good faith were not to be disturbed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the confessions of secular persons in another diocese. These faculties do not overlap. Hence if a religious whose house is located in the diocese of St. Joseph wishes to hear confessions in any part of the Des Moines diocese, he has to obtain the respective faculty from the Ordinary of Des Moines. This jurisdiction is needed even in the case of a penitent who has an apostolic indult permitting him to choose any confessor he pleases.[39] The same holds good concerning any secular priest who needs delegated jurisdiction.

In connection with this the question may arise: What about the pastors of a diocese, who according to can. 873, § 1, enjoy ordinary jurisdiction for their parishes, if they wish to hear confessions in another parish of the same or another diocese? Their jurisdiction as pastors is certainly limited to their own territory (pro suo quisque territorio). Consequently, in order to hear confessions validly outside their parishes they need delegated jurisdiction from the Ordinary of the diocese in which they wish to hear confessions, unless there is question of their own subjects, whose confessions they may hear anywhere.[40]

Another question: May the pastor grant delegated jurisdiction to another priest, secular or religious, to hear confessions within his district, without asking the local Ordinary? It would seem that canon 199, § 1, should be applied here, which says that those who enjoy ordinary jurisdiction may delegate it to others. But our text as well as certain decisions of the Holy See[41] plainly state that pastors cannot grant to other priests delegated jurisdiction to hear confessions in their parishes.

39 Benedict XIV, "Apostolica indulta," Aug. 5, 1744, §§ 3, 5.

40 Can. 881, § 2.

41 S. C. C., Nov. 19, Dec. 3, 1707 (Richter, p. 206, n. 3); Benedict XIV, Institut., 86, n. VII. Hence

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The last clause of § 1, says that religious need at least the presumed permission of their respective superiors. Religious, before being presented to the Ordinary for approval, are usually examined as to their qualification for that office by their superiors or a board of professors.[42] If a religious thus examined is approved by the Ordinary and continues to hear confessions without objection on the part of his superior, the permission may be presumed, even though it has not been asked for every single instance. Thus, also, permission may be presumed if one is sent to help another on a Sunday.

Note that this permission in nowise affects the validity of confession as long as the jurisdiction delegated by the Ordinary is not withdrawn. The Dominicans have a statute which says that their superiors should suspend from hearing confessions any religious found unfit for that office. If such a religious has obtained faculties from the Ordinary and continues to hear confessions, are the latter valid? They are, even though the absolution is given by a suspended religious against the will of his superiors. Such a religious, of course, acts illicitly, but the absolution he gives is valid because of the jurisdiction received from the diocesan Ordinary.[43]

§ 2 is the logical consequence of what has thus far been stated. The local Ordinaries shall not grant jurisdiction to hear confessions habitually to religious who are not presented by their own superiors. On the other hand they shall not, except for grave reasons, refuse faculties to such as are presented by their superiors, with due regard, however, to canon 877.

the pastor cannot delegate his assistants or curates; such delegation must be given by the Ordinary.

42 This is the practice in every well-regulated community; Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 753.

43 S. C. EE. et RR., March 2, 1866 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 755). This religious incurred no irregularity; ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is a reminiscence of the medieval quarrel between the secular and the regular clergy, especially the Mendicants, which Boniface VIII and John XXII endeavored to settle.[44] The term presented, occurring in their Decretals, meant that the general or the provincial should present themselves personally or by deputy before the prelates (i.e., Ordinaries, in order to obtain their licentia, gratia et beneplacitum, and then choose a sufficient number from among their members as confessors, who again must be presented to said Ordinaries for the "licentia, gratia et beneplacitum." If the latter was refused, the Pope gave the power of hearing confessions "ex plenitudine potestatis." It is not difficult to perceive that the Ordinaries and pastors were not satisfied with this solution. Hence the Council of Trent[45] and later papal Constitutions[46] demanded faculties properly so-called, but at the same time warned the bishops against unreasonable refusal. Now-a-days a recommendation from the religious superior may suffice, provided can. 877 is complied with. However, if the bishop insists upon personal presentation, he does not exceed the limits of his power.[47]

A serious reason for refusing faculties would be lack of knowledge, moral deficiency, or want of pastoral prudence.

44 C 2, X, Clem. III, 7 (Boniface VIII, "Dudum"); c. un. Extrav. Comm., II, 1 (John XXII, "Frequentes") c. 2, Extrav Comm., III, 6 (Boniface VIII, "Super cathedram").

45 Trid., sess. 23, c. 15.

46 Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili," 1622; Clement X, "Superna," 1670; Benedict XIV, "Apostolica indulta," 1744 (explaining the extent of the "Cruciata"); S. C. EE. et RR., April 11, 1698.

47 S. C. C., June 4, 1755 (Richter, Trid., p. 206, n. 4).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONFESSORS OF EXEMPT RELIGIOUS

CAN. 875

§ 1. In religione clericali exempta ad recipiendas confessiones professorum, novitiorum aliorumve de quibus in can. 514, § 1, jurisdictionem delegatam confert quoque proprius eorundem Superior, ad normam constitutionum; cui fas est eam concedere etiam sacerdotibus e clero saeculari aut alius religionis.

§ 2. In religione laicali exempta, Superior proponit confessarium, qui tamen iurisdictionem obtinere debet ab Ordinario loci, in quo religiosa domus reperitur.

In exempt religious institutes of clerics delegated jurisdiction for hearing the confessions of the professed members, novices, and other persons mentioned in can. 514, § 1, may be given by their own superior according to the constitutions. This same Superior may also grant such jurisdiction to secular priests or priests of another religious institute.

The Council of Trent[48] did not change anything concerning the right of exempt religious to assign their own confessors. This right is part and parcel of the juridical institute of exemption. It was fully acknowledged by many constitutions and decisions of the Holy See.[49] But a dispute arose on the question whether, for instance, a Jesuit could validly absolve a Benedictine without faculties from the local Ordinary.[50] Our text clearly says that all that is needed is delegated jurisdiction from the exempt religious superior. Hence a religious of another religious institute, whether exempt or not, nay, even a

48 Sess. 23, c. 15, de ref.

49 Clement VIII, "Sanctissimus," May 23, 1593; "Romani Pontificis," Nov. 23, 1599; Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670; S. C. C., Sept. 21, 1624 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 246 f.).

50 Cfr. Bizzarri, l. c., p. 723, note.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

secular priest, may validly absolve a religious whose exempt religious superior has granted to that religious or secular priest delegated jurisdiction. Therefore no jurisdiction from the local Ordinary is required. By "proprius eorundem superior" is to be understood not only the general or provincial, but also the conventual prior, unless the constitutions of the resp. institute rule otherwise.[51] What has been said under can. 514, § 1, is, we believe, amply sufficient.[52]

But this rule applies only to exempt clerical institutes, because § 2 rules that in exempt lay institutes the superior proposes the confessor, who must obtain jurisdiction — not only permission — from the Ordinary in whose diocese the religious house is located. This is a new canon, although quite old in effect, according to the general principle: Nemo dat quod non habet, and superiors of lay institutes, although exempt, never, at least de iure, enjoyed jurisdiction in matters of confession. We may add that the superior has a strict right to present whom he pleases, and consequently the Ordinary must give the faculties if the presented candidate is fit.

CONFESSORS OF FEMALE RELIGIOUS

CAN. 876

§ 1. Revocata qualibet contraria particulari lege seu privilegio, sacerdotes tum saeculares tum religiosi, cuiusvis gradus aut officii, ad confessiones quarumcunque religiosarum ac novitiarum valide et licite recipiendas peculiari iurisdictione indigent, salvo praescripto can. 239, § 1, n. 1, 522, 523.

51 S. C. EE. et RR., June 3, 1864 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 720 ff.).

52 Cfr. Vol. III of this Commentary, pp. 141 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Hanc iurisdictionem confert loci Ordinarius, ubi religiosarum domus sita est, ad normam can. 525.

§ 1. Secular as well as religious priests, of whatever rank or office, need a special jurisdiction for validly and licitly hearing the confessions of female religious and their novices. Only the Cardinals are exempt from this general law. Can. 522 and 523 mention some modifications of this general law which no contrary particular law or privilege can nullify or alter.

§ 2. This jurisdiction is granted by the Ordinary in whose diocese the religious house is located, according to can. 525.

This law, though not explicitly enunciated by the Council of Trent, was enacted by Gregory XV and reasserted in later papal constitutions. Wherefore, though the second order of nuns or moniales was subject to the jurisdiction of the prelate regular of the first order, yet the confessors appointed by that prelate were first to be examined or at least found fit and then to be given a special approbation.[53] The Constitution of Clement X, "Superna," further ordains that a confessor assigned to one convent of Sisters cannot validly hear confessions of the Sisters of another convent and that extraordinary confessors appointed for single monasteries and for single extraordinary occasions, need jurisdiction every time they are appointed for hearing confessions. This is still the rule[54] if the Ordinary, in granting faculties, does not explicitly state that the confessor appointed may hear the confessions of all moniales on all occasions. We may also add that the said constitutions mention only moniales, and therefore female religious with simple vows

53 Gregory XV, "Inscrutabili," Feb. 5, 1622; Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670.

54 Cfr. S. C. C., June 5, Aug. 2, 1755 (Richter, Trid., p. 413, n. 10).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

were not considered as falling under this law. The Code, which is now everywhere law, simply says religiosarum ac novitiarum, and consequently all religious who go by that name, and all their novices, can validly confess only to a priest endowed with special jurisdiction by the local Ordinary. This ruling must not, however, be extended to the other persons mentioned in can. 514, namely, pupils, servants, sick persons, and guests. For hearing the confessions of these no special jurisdiction is needed. The Code further establishes that rank or office exempts no priest from the duty of obtaining special jurisdiction. Therefore, with the exception of Cardinals, no other dignitaries may claim any privileges in this regard. Of course, the local Ordinary who imparts the special jurisdiction may himself hear the confessions of Sisters. This is also true of all others who go by the name of Ordinary,[55] such as prelates nullius, vicars general, administrators, vicars and prefects Apostolic, but no prelate regular as such.

Lastly, attention is drawn to the beginning of the canon: "revocata qualibet contraria particulari lege seu privilegio." Such a particular law existed in Spain,[56] in virtue of a brief of Urban VIII, but has now ceased. We know of no privilege or special law granted after the aforesaid Constitution of Gregory XV; if any has been granted it is now void.

Concerning the exceptions mentioned in the present canon, these refer to Sisters who for conscience sake wish to go to a confessor approved by the Ordinary for hearing women's confessions in a church or semipublic oratory, and to sick Sisters, who may call in any confessor approved for women.[57]

55 Can. 198, § 1.

56 Benedict XIV, De Syn., Dioec., IX, 15, 9.

57 Can. 522 f.; see this Commentary, Vol. III, p. 162 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What does "special jurisdiction" mean? Simply that the Ordinary, in granting faculties, must expressly state: "Etiam ad confessiones audiendas religiosarum ac novitiarum." Of course, if he appoints a priest as confessor for Sisters, he is supposed to grant this special jurisdiction, even though, by mistake, this is not expressly[58] stated in the written or oral appointment.

§ 2 refers to can. 525, which says that the local Ordinary appoints the confessors,[59] ordinary as well as extraordinary, for Sisters either immediately subject to the Apostolic See or to the Ordinary himself. The prelate regular may present a priest to the local Ordinary, who then imparts to him jurisdiction for such nuns as are subject to the regulars of the respective institute.

In the Irish Ecclesiastical Record of 1919 (March and May, pp. 239 ff., pp. 414 ff.; cfr also American Eccl. Review, Oct. 1919, pp. 446 f.), there was a controversy over the wording: "ad suae conscientiae tranquillitatem," "for the peace of her conscience." The question was: Does this term imply a conditio sine qua non of valid confession, or is it simply a clause which does not affect the validity of confession? When we wrote on can. 522, we held it was no condition in the proper sense of the word, but a motive cause which prompted the legislator to do away with unnecessary and conscience-torturing restrictions. Nor have we been converted to the contrary view after having read the answers — we suppose by Dr. Kinane — to "Inquirer."

Here are our reasons: If we solved that "ad" into a dependent clause, this clause would read: ut consulatur conscientiae tranquillitati. Evidently here the motive is [58] This is not contrary to can. 879, § 1, because the very appointment as such of a confessor includes jurisdiction.

[59] Cfr. this Commentary, Vol. III, p. 166 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

expressed by the ut finalis. This, even if taken as a causa finalis, not merely impulsiva, cannot be construed as a conditio sine qua non. For, finis legis non cadit sub lege, unless it is expressed in the law itself (see can. 11). Take, for instance, the well-known Constitution of Martin V, "Ad evitanda," where the finis legis is clearly expressed. A similar phrase ("ad consulendum conscientiae") occurs in the decree "Ne temere," art. VII. Here the phrase is taken to mean a reason for admitting the extraordinary form of contracting marriage, the non-existence of which reason would invalidate a marriage informally contracted. But it would need a strong proof to read a conditio sine qua non even into this phrase, notwithstanding the assertion of Vermeersch, quoted by Kinane. Vermeersch speaks of a strict obligation, but this may be only moral, as the preceding words seem to insinuate. The main point in said decree is the "imminent danger of death," which generally causes unrest or disturbance of mind which is made the conditio in directo for contracting marriage before any priest and two witnesses. Not even in that case would the priest have been obliged to ask the person "in imminent danger of death" whether or not he or she wished to appease his or her conscience. There, too, the "consulendum conscientiae" is the impulsive or, if you wish, the motive cause for this permission, but not the conditio sine qua non, this being the imminent danger of death. The Code (can. 1098) has happily omitted the clause.

The preposition ad has several meanings in law texts. It may signify nearness or approach to something, and also a final cause, or even a condition, but as a rule it has this latter meaning only when a contract or stipulation is involved; for instance, I promise you something ad ar-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bitrium boni viri, i. e., iudicis.[59a] What is conscience? "Conscientia nihil aliud est quam sensus animae cognoscentis bonum et malum et quid intrinsecus latens in mente, quod probari non potest directo."[59b] Now the conscience is something hidden in the mind, and cannot easily be proved in the external court. Can this be made a conditio sine qua non of the validity of confession? We hardly believe. Yet in the opinion of the learned professor who answered "Inquirer" in the I. E. R., this would happen in our case. He reads three conditions into can. 522: The religious must make her confession: (1) for the peace of her conscience, (2) to a confessor approved by the local Ordinary to hear the confessions of women, (3) in a church or oratory, even a semipublic oratory (March No., p. 239 f.). Then (May No., p. 418) he adds: "If it is stated that a certain act is invalid, when a number of conditions are fulfilled [we suppose there is a printing mistake, otherwise the sentence is unintelligible, therefore either in the first clause we must read valid, or put a negative in the second, not fulfilled], it is clearly implied that the defect of any of these conditions involves the invalidity of the act." Again: "The canon itself puts the three [conditions] upon the same footing." The former statement is true only if all the conditions are to be taken conjunctively, but must be rejected if the conditions may be taken disjunctively (for instance, in can. 966), so that only the one or the other condition is required for the validity of an act. This is expressed by aut or vel.

But is it true that all three conditions are put upon the same footing? And first is it really true that the phrase ad conscientiae quietem involves a condition? As seen

59a Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Dictiones Usu Frequentes, n. VI, ed. Lugd. 1660, p. 644.

59b Barbosa, Axiomata, 52, l. c., p. 34.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

above it may signify a condition, but does so as a rule only in onerous contracts. That it has this signification in can. 522, needs stronger proofs than those so far advanced. But suppose it were a condition. In that case the peace of conscience would be on a level with the other two conditions, which certainly affect the validity of the confession. Hence the religious herself would be made co-arbiter of the validity of confession, or at least she would administer the material for valid confession, not only by her confession and contrition, but also by her "peace of conscience." This would be a new kind of theology.

But let us not drift into ridicule. We believe that Benedict XIV, in his Constitution, Pastoralis Curae, of Aug. 5, 1748, has solved the question quite clearly. There amongst other things he mentions a case quite similar to ours. Some nuns or sisters had asked for a special confessor, not only in case of sickness or aversion against the ordinary confessor, but for their greater peace of mind and further progress on the way of the Lord: "verum pro majori animi sui quiete atque ulteriori in via Dei progressu." The prelates regular refused to accommodate the sisters, but Benedict XIV leaned to a more lenient and charitable treatment. He says: "Persuasum enim habebimus, adeoque habemus, non solum integrae Communitati, sed singulis etiam Monialibus indulgendum esse in iis rebus, quae iuste et rationabiliter petuntur, maxime quum illae ad earum conscientiae quietem, et securitatem conferre dignoscuntur. Neque sane huiusmodi postulationes aut temere exaudiri, aut sine causa, reiici debere censemus; sed inquirendum in primis esse de qualitatibus tum Monialis, quae Confessarium extra ordinem petit, tum Confessarii, qui ab ea requiritur; ut utriusque diligenter inspectis, deliberari possit, an illius votis annuendum sit, an non. Si enim Monialis ex una parte nullum det adversae suspicioni locum, ex altera vero confessarius non modo legitimam Ordinarii approbationem, sed etiam commune probitatis testimonium pro se habeat, nullo modo probare possumus tam firmum huiusmodi Praelatorum in renuendo propositum; nec intelligimus, cur post Confessarium extraordinarium integrae Communitati, iuxta legem Concilii Tridentini, oblatum, nulla omnino Monialibus singulis spes relinquatur obtinendi peculiarem Confessarium, cuius consilio et opera, justis fortasse de causis, indigere se arbitrentur." If any one wishes to read a strict condition into this text, he may do so at his own pleasure, but he will certainly contradict the wording of the text, as well as the mind of the great Pontiff and canonist. The meaning is clear: in order not to torture the consciences of the poor sisters (" pro animi quiete," " ad earum conscientiae quietem et securitatem") the Pope gives them liberal and generous permission to call in another confessor, even if they have to apply to the S. Poenitentiaria. This is the motive cause, but not a condition in the proper sense of the word.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

We finally draw attention to what we said in note 13, p. 156, Vol. III, of this Commentary. There is no need of inquiring into the reasons which prompted Pius X to unfetter the consciences of religious. The view advocated in the I. E. R. would re-enthrall them and throw a Jansenistic cloak about the generous law of the Code.

EXAMINATION OF CONFESSORS

CAN. 877

§ 1. Tum locorum Ordinarii iurisdictionem, tum Superiores religiosi iurisdictionem aut licentiam audiendarum confessionum ne concedant, nisi iis qui idonei

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google per examen reperti fuerint, nisi agatur de sacerdote cuius theologicam doctrinam aliunde compertam habeant.

§ 2. Si post concessam iurisdictionem aut licentiam prudenter dubitent num probatus a se antea sacerdos pergat adhuc idoneus esse, eum ad novum doctrinae periculum adigant, etsi agatur de parocho aut canonico poenitentiario.

§ 1. The local Ordinaries shall not grant jurisdiction, nor the religious Superior jurisdiction or license for hearing confessions except to such as have been found fit upon examination. An exception may be made in favor of those whose theological competency is sufficiently known from other sources.

All the papal constitutions and decisions insist upon the fitness (idoneitas) of those who hear confessions. This includes two qualities, intellectual and moral. The intellectual consists in doctrinal knowledge, especially of the respective portions of Moral Theology [60] and Canon Law, and familiarity with the language in which confessions are to be heard.[61] The moral qualities required are prudence, probity of life, and zeal. Therefore the examiners should insist upon these qualities before they render their verdict to the Ordinary.[62]

Our Code admits a noteworthy mitigation in favor of those who are known for their theological learning. Thus now-a-days a teacher of Moral Theology or a synodal examiner may be exempted from this examination, also any one whose competency is well known to the bishop.

60 S. C. P. F., April 13, 1807, n. XII (Coll., n. 692).

61 S. C. P. F., March 17, 1760; Aug. 2, 1762 (Coll., nm. 427, 444): this rule affects the secular as well as the religious clergy.

62 Benedict XIV, "Apostolicum ministerium," May 30, 1753, § 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Should the Ordinary or religious Superior have a prudent doubt as to whether a priest once approved continues to be fit, they may submit him to a new doctrinal examination, no matter whether he be a pastor or canon penitentiary.

Here stress is laid on knowledge, and consequently the moral qualifications need not be re-examined because it might reflect on the priest's character.[63] The Ordinary is entitled to subject any confessor to an examination, even though he be a pastor or penitentiary canon. Also one, whose competence was assumed may be submitted to an examination after he has been given the faculties. The religious Superior may submit a religious to a new examination in case he has extra-sacramental knowledge of his doctrinal deficiency on some point.

LIMITED JURISDICTION

CAN. 878

§ 1. Iurisdictio delegata aut licentia audiendarum confessionum concedi potest certis quibusdam circumscripta finibus.

§ 2. Caveant tamen locorum Ordinarii ac religiosi Superiores ne iurisdictionem aut licentiam sine rationabili causa nimis coarctent.

Delegated jurisdiction, or the license for hearing confessions, may be limited, but local Ordinaries and religious Superiors should not restrict it unreasonably.

The first section is couched in general terms and excludes no class of clergy who need delegated jurisdiction. Therefore also exempt religious[64] who obtain delegated 63 S. C. EE. et RR., May 29, 1760; April 11, 1698 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, pp. 546 f., 282).

64 The regulars claimed exemption from all restrictions, but Alexander VII, Jan. 30, 1659 proscribed the jurisdiction either from the local Ordinary or from their Superior may have their jurisdiction limited. But the reason for so doing should at least have the semblance of justice. The S. Congregations have more than once admonished Ordinaries not to vex religious with unnecessary restrictions.[65] Any limitations should be based on unfitness, as resulting from the examination, as the Constitution of Clement X, "Superna," plainly states.[66] Restrictions may be made as to persons, place and time. As to persons it may be that a priest may be too young to hear women's confessions, or may be suited for one class of persons but not for another, etc. The same reasons would also justify limitation as to place. As to time, the Constitution of Clement X distinguishes between priests who were found generally fit, and others who proved less or not quite fit in the examination. De Lugo says the bishop may have a reasonable suspicion that one approved forever might care little for further study or intellectual improvement, or the moral character of the candidate may not be fully known to him.[67] The Ordinary should not make the exercise of delegated jurisdiction dependent on the permission of the parish priest;[68] in fact, he should not lay down too many conditions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proposition: "Non possunt Episcopi limitare seu restringere approbationes, quas regularibus concedunt ad confessiones audiendas, neque ulla ex parte revocare." Cfr. Benedict XIV, Instit., 86, n. IX.

65 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 13, 1641; Sept. 22, 1645 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 25 f.); S. C. P. F., Dec. 11, 1838, ad 5 (Coll., n. 879).

66 See § 4, and Innocent XIII, Apostolici ministerii," May 23, 1723, §§ 16, 19.

67 Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Moral., V., p. 287.

68 S. Rit. C., May 13, 1719 (Dec. Auth., n. 2264).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

JURISDICTION EXPRESSLY TO BE GRANTED

CAN. 879

§ 1. Ad confessiones valide audiendas opus est iurisdictione scripto vel verbis expresse concessa.

§ 2. Pro concessione iurisdictionis nihil exigi potest.

For the valid hearing of confessions, jurisdiction must be granted expressly either in writing or by word of mouth; but nothing is to be charged for the grant. Tacitly granted jurisdiction is hereby entirely rejected. One would look in vain for the word "expresse" in the papal constitutions [69] quoted by Cardinal Gasparri, though its equivalent is certainly to be found there. What is tacit jurisdiction? It is one which an Ordinary or Superior knows to be exercised by his subjects, and to which he does not object, although he could easily do so. For instance, a bishop calls a missionary from another diocese to give a mission in a parish of his own territory. Thereby he was formerly supposed to have granted him the necessary faculties for hearing confession.[70] Such tacitly granted jurisdiction can no longer be held to be sufficient for validly hearing confessions. There must be an express grant. The Ordinary in calling a missionary must explicitly confer upon him delegated jurisdiction, and the pastor must expressly obtain the same for a missionary, unless the latter belongs to the diocese or has obtained faculties for the diocese in which he is to give the mission.

We said this express grant is required for delegated jurisdiction. The text does not contain this adjective;

69 Benedict XIV, "Apostolica indulta," Aug. 5, 1744, § 3, expressly mentions tacit approbation or jurisdiction as sufficient.

70 Noldin, l. c., n. 347; Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moral., ed. 1917, p. 706; Am. Eccl. Rev., 1918, Vol. 58, p. 681.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

but it is clearly implied, because ordinary jurisdiction is acquired by reason of the office to which it is attached.

Here it may not be amiss to answer the question whether jurisdiction for hearing confessions may be acquired by custom. The Decretals [71] absolutely deny the possibility of acquiring such jurisdiction at least directly, by custom, even though it be immemorable. Indirectly, as Pirhing says,[72] one could obtain ordinary jurisdiction by acquiring a parochial benefice. Now this way is precluded, since all provision must be made in writing.[73]

Different from the express or tacit grant of jurisdiction is a doubtful and probable jurisdiction. A doubtful jurisdiction would be if one would not remember the date when, or the time for which, it was granted, or doubt the material extent of the faculties. Probable would be the jurisdiction in reserved cases and censures as to whether the circumstances are really such as would render the sin a reserved one or one punished by censures. Our Code has solved this doubt in favor of validity in both cases.[74]

REVOCATION OF JURISDICTION OR LICENSE

CAN. 880

§ 1. Loci Ordinarius vel Superior religiosus iurisdictionem vel licentiam ad audiendas confessiones ne revocent aut suspendant, nisi gravem ob causam.

§ 2. At graves ob causas Ordinarius potest etiam parocho aut poenitentiario confessarii munus interdicere, salvo recursu in devolutivo ad Sedem Apostolicam.

71 C. 2, 6°, V. 10.
72 Com., lib. V, tit. 38, n. 36.
73 Can. 159.
74 Can. 207, § 2; can. 209; Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., V, p. 319 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Non tamen licet Episcopo, inconsulta Sede Apostolica, si de domo formata agatur, omnibus alicuius religiosae domus confessariis una simul iurisdictionem adimere.

§ 1. Local Ordinaries shall not revoke or suspend jurisdiction or license for hearing confessions, except for a grave reason.

§ 2. But if there is such a reason, the local Ordinary may also forbid the pastor or canon penitentiary to exercise the office of confessor, with due regard, however, to the right of appeal in devolutivo to the Apostolic See.

§ 3. In the case of a domus formata, the bishop is not allowed, without having first consulted the Apostolic See, to take away jurisdiction from all confessors of a religious house at the same time.

Revoking the faculties or jurisdiction affects the validity of confessions, while the recall of the license only concerns licitness, but may reflect on the moral character and reputation of the confessor. Hence it is that a grave reason is required for the revocation of either. Such a reason is stated in a decree of 1615 and styled "a reason connected with confession."[75] This apposition is then further determined in the Constitution of Clement X, "Superna,"[76] which indeed speaks only of regulars, but may be said to cover our case, which includes both religious and secular clerics. It is stated there that if religious live scandalously or dishonorably, or if they have committed a crime which, according to the prudent judgment of the bishop, demands suspension from hearing confessions, these would be reasons justifying suspension from hearing confessions. For, adds said

[75] S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 20, 1615 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 21).

[76] See §§ 5, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Constitution, the principal quality of a minister of the Sacrament of Penance is probity of life and good conduct. The Code simply says: "a grave reason," and with this, says the "Superna," the conscience of the bishop is charged: i.e., he must use common sense and act with due deliberation. A grave reason would also be disregard of a decree of interdict, or the discovery of irregularities at the canonical visitation.[77]

§ 2 applies the same law to pastors and canonici poenitentiarii of cathedral and collegiate churches who otherwise enjoy ordinary jurisdiction. Therefore these, too, may be suspended from the office of confessors, so that the confessions would no longer be valid, unless, of course, can. 209 would apply. But the text adds that they may have recourse to the Apostolic See in devolutivo, which signifies that the order must be obeyed until reversed by Rome.[78]

§ 3 repeats former enactments [79] concerning confessors of religious communities. The sources from which our text is taken mention the houses of exempt regulars and of moniales. There were many complaints against Ordinaries for suspending all the confessors of a convent, though formerly approved by them for hearing the confessions of lay people.[80] This, as one decree says, caused scandal and injury to souls. Hence the new law which has entered the Code. But our text apparently draws a distinction between domus formatae and non formatae, i.e., houses in which at least six professed members live, four of whom are priests, and houses with less than this

77 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 20, 1615; Dec. 9, 1740 (Bizzarri, l. c., pp. 21, 326, 350); S. C. P. F., Dec. 11, 1839, ad 4 (Coll., n. 892).

78 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, §§ 15, 20.

79 Innocent X, "Cum sicut accepimus," May 14, 1648, § 4; Clement X, "Superna," § 6; S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 20, 1615.

80 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 28, 1732 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 328).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

number. The former documents simply say: alicuius conventus. But the Code implies that only in the case of a domus formata must the Holy See be consulted before the Ordinary can suspend all the priests of a community from hearing confessions. In smaller communities, which have not at least six members, four of whom are priests, all the priests may be suspended by the bishop from hearing the confessions of lay people or secular priests or non-exempt religious. From hearing the confessions of exempt religious the Ordinary cannot suspend exempt religious, since these receive delegated jurisdiction from their own superiors. If a bishop should attempt such suspension in the case mentioned (domus formata), it would be the Metropolitan's right and duty to remind him of can. 880, § 3.[81] On the other hand, the Ordinary may, for a grave reason, without asking or notifying the superior, remove or suspend a religious from hearing the confessions of female religious.[82] But if the female religious be subject to a religious exempt superior, the latter would be entitled to present another religious for approval or examination, in order to obtain jurisdiction.

It may strike the student as odd that the Code, in § 3, has chosen the term "bishop," whereas in the other two sections it uses the word "Ordinary." Was this done merely for the sake of change? We hardly believe so for reasons derived from a decision of the S. Congregation. The question was asked, whether the vicar capitular (diocesan administrator in our country) may suspend either secular or regular priests from hearing confessions. The answer was that there was no difficulty

81 Ibid.

82 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 9, 1740 Bizzari, l. c., p. 350). Revoking or suspending faculties without a reason (also under § 1) would be valid, as clearly implied by "Suprema."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as to secular priests, but the case was otherwise with regard to exempt religious once approved by the bishop either without limitation, or with the clause "ad beneplacitum nostrum." To remove such is, according to the School, a personal right of the bishop which does not pass to the chapter or the vicar capitular,[83] and hence to proceed thus is not in the power of the administrator, nor, since it is a personal right, is it in the power of the vicar general except with a special mandate.

CONFESSORS OF VAGI AND PEREGRINI

CAN. 881

§ 1. Omnes utriusque cleri sacerdotes ad audiendas confessiones approbati in aliquo loco, sive ordinaria sive delegata iurisdictione instructi, possunt etiam vagos ac peregrinos ex alia dioecesi vel paroecia ad sese accedentes, itemque catholicos cuiusque ritus orientalis, valide et licite absolvere.

§ 2. Qui ordinariam habent absolvendi potestatem, possunt subditos absolvere ubique terrarum.

§ 1. Secular as well as religious priests who are approved for hearing confessions in some place, no matter whether their jurisdiction be ordinary or delegated, may validly and licitly absolve vagi and peregrini who come to them from another diocese or parish, and also Catholics of any Oriental Rite.

The Holy See, says an Instruction,[84] has always observed the rule that, in a matter so delicate as the Sacrament of Penance, the liberty of the faithful should not be impeded, but they should be free to confess to whom they prefer. Of course jurisdiction must always be 83 S. C. EE. et RR., June 19, 1806 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 407 f.).

84 S. C. P. F., June 2, 1835 (Coll., n. 839).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

supposed. Now the text says that both secular and religious priests may absolve in casu, whilst the Constitution of Clement X, "Superna" (§ 7) only mentions regulars who are approved for the place or diocese in which they hear confessions. Hence a confessor approved for the diocese of St. Joseph and hearing confessions in that diocese, may absolve such as come to him from the diocese of Kansas City. But what does "approbati in aliquo loco" mean? It can mean neither license nor something midway between license and jurisdiction. The text itself explains the phrase. Approval is here only a general term which includes both jurisdiction and permission (for religious especially, who need the latter in order to hear confessions licitly). Hence the addition without the copula et: "sive ordinaria sive delegata iurisdictione instructi." Those who have ordinary jurisdiction are the bishops and pastors, each within his own territory, the bishop within the whole diocese, the pastor within his parochial district.[85] If the latter has received delegated jurisdiction for hearing confessions in the whole diocese, he may perform that office in any part of the diocese.

The subjects of this general rule are vagi, peregrini, and Catholici ritus Orientalis. Vagi are such as have neither domicile nor quasi-domicile in any place, diocese or parish. Peregrini are those who have a domicile or quasi-domicile, but for the time being live outside of it, in a strange place.[86] Oriental Catholics are those of an Oriental Rite differing from the Latin, though partaking of the Catholic communion. This threefold class of per-[85] S. C. C., quoted by Benedict XIV, Institut., 86, n. 14: "An provisus de parochiali per concursum, censendus sit approbatus idoneus minister ad audiendas confessiones in illa dioecesi, in qua illam parochialem obtinet? RESP.: Censeri dumtaxat in ea civitate, vel oppido, ubi sita est parochialis, non autem passim per totam dioecesim."

[86] Can. 91.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sons, then, may be absolved by any priest who has either ordinary or delegated jurisdiction for the place in which he actually hears confessions. As to the difference of rite, there is no difficulty, because the Sacrament of Penance, as far as the formula of absolution is concerned, has little or nothing to do with the rite. Wherefore the S. Congregation [87] has more than once enjoined the bishops of the Oriental Rite not to forbid their subjects to go to confession to Latin priests. Neither is there any doubt as to vagi, because custom testifies to the fact that they may be absolved by any priest endowed with jurisdiction. Unless jurisdiction is granted in one way or another, absolution, which is given in the form of a judicial sentence, cannot be imparted validly. This calls for a brief observation concerning peregrini. We will not enter into the controversy which raged several years ago concerning this point,[88] but will only state what, according to the Code, seems to us the more probable and consistent view. All admit, with St. Alphonsus,[89] that the Pope may grant jurisdiction to any priest for absolving peregrini (strangers) and that, without either ordinary or delegated jurisdiction, no valid absolution may be imparted. The question is: Who grants the jurisdiction necessary for absolving a stranger: — the bishop of the stranger who has left his domicile or quasi-domicile, or the bishop in whose territory the stranger dwells at the moment? Concretely, if a stranger comes from the diocese of Kansas City to a priest in the diocese of St. Joseph, and asks to be absolved, which bishop grants jurisdiction, the 87 S. C. P. F., June 2, 1835; Dec. 11, 1838; April 30, 1862, n. 2 (Coll., nn. 839, 879, 1227). A general prohibition would render confession neither invalid nor illicit.

88 Cfr. Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Moral., V. p. 305, nn. 613 ff.; Lehmhuhl, l. c., II, n. 384; Noldin, Zeitschrift für Kath. Theol., 1881, 453 f.; De Sacramentis, n. 349.

89 Theol. Moral., VI, n. 588.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishop of Kansas City or the bishop of St. Joseph? After reading the acute reasoning of Ballerini-Palmieri, it seemed to us that they had gained the point, and certainly, before the Code was promulgated, their position was speculatively the stronger. But after pondering can. 881, as compared with can. 879, § 1, this difficulty appeared: How about express jurisdiction? Ballerini-Palmieri's reasoning is based upon "tacit consent," "explicit or implicit license or approbation." The peregrinus is supposed to have the tacit consent of his bishop which he transfers to the confessor. However since tacit jurisdiction is now excluded, and since our text speaks of such as are approved "in" some place or diocese, we cannot help saying that the necessary jurisdiction must come from the Ordinary of the diocese in which the confession is heard. The difficulty arises from the fact that the peregrinus is not subject to the Ordinary who is supposed to grant jurisdiction over him. According to the Council of Florence and that of Trent,[90] the confessor must have either ordinary or delegated power over his penitent. It is true that the jurisdiction cannot be claimed by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile; yet it appears to us that the old adage, "Actor sequitur reum,"[91] may to some extent be applied here, for the penitent, being himself plaintiff and defendant, may choose the forum competens and thus submit himself to a judge otherwise competent, i.e., any priest who has jurisdiction. Therefore the Church, especially now-a-days when changes of domicile and wandering are so frequent, has wisely left it to the penitent to choose his own confessor, as long as the latter is qualified according to general law of the Church.

90 Thus Ballerini-Palmeri, V. p. 306, n. 615; Decret. pro Arm. (Denzinger, n. 594), Trid., sess. 14, c. 7, de poenit; can. 872.

91 Cc. 5, 8, X, II, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Those who possess ordinary jurisdiction for absolving may absolve their own subjects everywhere. Therefore Ordinaries and pastors (but not curates, assistants, or rectors) may absolve their subjects by reason of their office, to which this power is attached. The Cardinals enjoy the same power by reason of a personal privilege, which, however, cannot be communicated to others, except on their own behalf and that of their familiares.[92]

Subjects of Ordinaries and pastors are those who have their domicile or quasi-domicile within the boundaries of the diocese or parish. These, then, may be absolved by their respective Ordinaries or pastors in any diocese or parish, no matter where they may meet.[93] The ordinary jurisdiction may therefore be called extra-territorial or personal.

ABSOLUTION IN DANGER OF DEATH

CAN. 882.

In periculo mortis omnes sacerdotes, licet ad confessiones non approbati, valide et licite absolvunt quoslibet poenitentes a quibusvis peccatis aut censuris, quantumvis reservatis et notoriis, etiamsi praesens sit sacerdos approbatus, salvo praescripto can. 884, 2252.

When there is danger of death, any priest, even though not otherwise approved for hearing confessions, may validly and licitly absolve any penitent from whatever sins and censures, including those which are reserved and notorious, even though an approved priest may be present. But the rules laid down in can. 884 and 2252 must be observed.

92 Can. 239, § 1, nn. 1, 2.
93 S. C. C., Nov. 19, Dec. 3, 1707 (Richter, Trid, p. 206, n. 3).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The penitential discipline,[94] which was rather severe in the first century, was gradually mitigated so as to open the gate of salvation to public penitents, who could receive the imposition of hands at least at the point of death. The last of the three customary impositions was indeed reserved to the bishop, but the priest was allowed to give it in the "last necessity,"[95] which certainly was the approaching end. The subsequent ages[96] witnessed further mitigations, until the present discipline was established by the Council of Trent,[97] which, inter alia, enacted the wholesome law that no censure or reserved sin can debar a dying penitent from receiving the benefit of absolution.

"How is the periculum mortis or danger of death to be understood?" was asked by a former bishop of Cincinnati, and the Holy Office[98] referred him to "approved authors." One of these authors tells us that danger of death exists, not only in a very serious sickness, but also when there is danger to life from an external cause, for instance, before a battle, upon setting forth on a perilous voyage, before a difficult childbirth, etc.[99] In such a circumstance, then, our canon may be applied, and any priest, even though he has neither ordinary nor delegated jurisdiction or permission, may validly and licitly absolve. The text goes still further by saying: even though an approved priest may be present. Hence any validly ordained priest, even though belonging to a heretical or schismatic sect, or apostatized or censured may, even in 94 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments Vol. III, pp. 37 ff.: M. J. O'Donnell, Penance in the Early Church, 1907. Palmieri, De Poenit., p. 159, justly distinguishes a threefold manuum impositio: at the beginning, during, and at the end of public penance, which latter signified absolution.

95 C. 14, C. 26, q. 6.

96 C. 1, Extrav. Comm., V. 7 (Boniface IX, "Inter cunctas").

97 Sess. 14, C. 7, de poenit.

98 S. O., Sept. 13, 1859, ad 1 (Coll. P. F., n. 1181).

99 Noldin, De Sacram., n. 353.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

presence of an approved confessor, validly absolve any one in danger of death, and if we connect that clause with the present, he may also do so licitly.[1] It is but just, however, to add another decision of the Holy Office, in answer to the question: "Whether it is permitted to demand absolution of a schismatic priest in danger of death if no Catholic priest is at hand," as follows: Yes, provided no scandal is given to the faithful, no danger of perversion threatens the sick person, and, finally, provided that it may be reasonably presumed that the schismatic minister will absolve according to the rite of the Church.[2] The validity is not affected, provided he pronounces the formula correctly, but the obligation here imposed should not be made light of.

Furthermore, the Code says: he may absolve from all sins and censures, although reserved and notorious, except in two cases: the absolutio complicis, of which can. 884 treats, and the obligation of recurring to the proper authority, if the penitent regains his health, as will be more fully explained under can. 2252. Observe that recourse to the Holy See, i.e., the S. Poenitentiaria, must be had in case a sin has been forgiven which was modo specialissimo under censure reserved to the Holy See by either the law itself, or by the Holy See personally; and recourse must be had to the bishop if the law itself or the bishop has reserved a censure.

The time within which the application must be made is generally a month after the complete recovery of the penitent. It may be done either personally or through the confessor by mail,[3] of course, under fictitious names.

1 S. O., July 29, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1761) only mentions validity.

2 S. O., June 30, July 7, 1864, ad 6 (Coll. cit., n. 1257).

3 Can. 2254, § 1; S. O., Aug. 19, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1764).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONFESSORS AT SEA

CAN. 883.

§ 1. Sacerdotes omnes maritimum iter arripientes, dummodo vel a proprio Ordinario, vel ab Ordinario portus in quo navim conscendunt, vel etiam ab Ordinario cuiusvis portus interiecti per quem in itinere transeunt, facultatem rite acceperint confessiones audiendi, possunt, toto itinere, quorumlibet fidelium secum navigantium confessiones in navi excipere, quamvis navis in itinere transeat vel etiam aliquandiu consistat variis in locis diversorum Ordinariorum iurisdictioni subiectis.

§ 2. Quoties vero navis in itinere consistat, possunt confessiones excipere tum fidelium qui quavis de causa ad navim accedant, tum eorum qui ipsis ad terram obiter appellentibus confiteri petant eosque valide ac licite absolvere etiam a casibus Ordinario loci reservatis.

§ 1. Any priest traveling on the ocean may hear the confessions of all Catholics who travel with him on board the same ship, although the vessel may on its trip pass, or even stop for some time at, various places subject to different Ordinaries. But in order to absolve these travelers validly and licitly the priest must have duly obtained the faculty either from his own Ordinary, or from the Ordinary of the place he sails from, or from the Ordinary of any port which the vessel passes.

This canon, as is natural, grew out of the recently increased travel. It is not surprising, therefore, that theologians as well as the Holy Office were at first in doubt as to which Ordinary should impart jurisdiction. It was first decided that the Ordinary of the diocese from which the ship sailed should grant the necessary faculty, but that it should last only until the vessel reached the next station where an Ordinary was located.[4] Later the faculty was extended over the whole trip, even though the vessel made several stops of some duration (aliquandiu).[5] Finally the Holy Office formulated the text which is our present § 1, but limited the faculty of hearing confessions to the ship itself.[6]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 is the final formulation as it was rendered by the Holy Office on December 13, 1906, but which has not entirely entered our Code. What the legislator has adopted into the text is the following: As often as the vessel stops on its trip, the priests endowed with faculties, as stated under § 1, may validly and licitly hear the confessions of such of the faithful as may for any reason visit the vessel, as well as the confessions of those who approach them for that purpose when they go on land for a short stop. In this latter case, they may absolve also from cases reserved to the Ordinary of the diocese where they stop. The omission in the Code of one clause inserted by the Holy Office is noteworthy. The Holy Office had made a condition in the case where a priest hears confessions on land and absolves from reserved cases, viz: "provided there be no, or only one, approved priest in that place and the Ordinary cannot easily be reached."[7] The legislator certainly knew of that ruling, and the fact that he omitted it purposely from the Code shows that he intended to free the priests in question from the condition named. It would, besides, be embarrassing for traveling priests, who perhaps do not even know the lan-

4 S. O., March 17, 1869 (Coll. P. F., n. 1343).

5 S. O., April 9, 1900 (ibid., n. 2082).

6 S. O., Aug. 23, 1905 (ibid., n. 2244, note).

7 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

guage of the country, to have to ask about the presence of priests or the whereabouts of the Ordinary.

§ 1 states that the respective priests must have duly (rite) obtained the faculties. This implies that they were found worthy and fit, according to the enactment of the Council of Trent, to obtain the faculties.[8] Therefore Ordinaries are at liberty to subject them to an examination, unless, knowing them personally or from recommendation, they deem this measure superfluous. Now-a-days wireless telegraphy might prove a convenient means of obtaining faculties in case a priest has forgotten to do so, when leaving the port or diocese.

ABSOLUTIO COMPLICIS INVALIDA

CAN. 884.

Absolutio complicis in peccato turpi invalida est, praeterquam in mortis periculo; et etiam periculo mortis, extra casum necessitatis, est ex parte confessarii illicita ad norman constitutionum apostolicarum et nominatim constitutionis Benedicti XIV Sacramentum Poenitentiae, 1 Iun. 1741.

In the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Sacramentum Poenitentiae," the sin from which an accomplice may not be absolved is called "peccatum turpe atque inhonestum contra sextum decalogi praeceptum commissum." That it be such, it must be committed by both parties and constitute a certain, external, and grievous sin on both sides by reason of the internal and external act. The accomplice may be of either sex.[9]

If a confessor attempts to absolve his accomplice in 8 S. O., Aug. 23, 1905 (ibid.).

9 S. O., Sept. 13, 1859 (Coll. P. F., n. 1181), which refers to probatos auctores, and especially to St. Alphonsus; cfr. Noldin, De Sacramentis, n. 384.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

such a sin, his jurisdiction ceases: nulla atque irrita omnino sit, as if it were an absolution imparted by a priest who lacked jurisdiction and the faculty of absolving validly. This invalidity, as stated by law in said Constitution, affects every person involved in such a crime, and comprises the whole act or matter of confession, not only the act of complicity. Whether a confessor who would bona fide absolve his accomplice, either because he did not know the penitent, or was not aware of the law which deprives him of jurisdiction in casu, would absolve validly is a controverted point.[10] The wording of the Constitution in our opinion rather favors the invalidity of such a confession, although the excipere audeat[11] seemingly supposes an act of presumption and voluntary disobedience, which, of course, in a case of ignorance or inadvertence the confessor could not be charged with. If the accomplice should, by reason of forgetfulness or even purposely but bona fide, omit all mention of the complicity, the confession would be valid.[12] If the penitent had already confessed the sin in question to another priest, and was absolved by him, the guilty confessor may afterwards validly and licitly absolve his accomplice, even though the latter should, among other sins, again confess the sin of complicity.[13]

When there is danger of death, the confessor may validly and licitly absolve his accomplice from the sin of 10 Noldin, l. c., n. 385.

11 The phrase ausus fuerit occurs in the clause which states the censure and commences with: et nihilominus; the absolution is not only invalid, but liable to censure. The censure would not, however, be incurred in the controverted case.

12 If the priest accomplice had either directly or indirectly induced his accomplice not to confess this sin, excommunication would follow; cfr. can. 2367, § 2; S. Poenit., Feb. 19, 1896.

13 Noldin l. c., n. 385, says in a note: "Sunt tamen inter recentes praesertim D'Annibale (III, n. 32, 4 Scavini (III, n. 367) et Genicot (II, n. 352), qui confessario potestatem tribuant etiam in peccatum complicitatis, postquam hoc semel directe iam remissum est."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

complicity, if there is real necessity, i.e., according to Benedict XIV,[14] if no other priest, whether with or without jurisdiction, is to be had. But the same Pontiff also foresaw the case of scandal or loss of reputation if another priest, simplex sacerdos, should have to be called. Hence he says: If another priest cannot be called without giving scandal or seriously impairing the reputation of the guilty priest, then the other priest may be considered as not present.

However, the guilty priest, continues the Pope, should not imagine danger of scandal and ill repute, but rather, if it should be necessary, endeavor, as much as lies in him, to prevent and remove by ordinary means the possibility of scandal, so that another priest can be called without causing a stir or surprise. Then is added the clause which our Code has adopted from said Constitution, viz.: Should the priest purposely neglect to employ the means for calling another priest, or put it off maliciously, so that really no urgent necessity would entitle the guilty priest to absolve his accomplice, absolution would indeed be valid, but grievously illicit, and the guilty priest would incur the censure inflicted by law. Thus far the Constitutions which concern our case. For the rest, we refer to can. 2367 and merely add that those who absolve an accomplice "ex ignorantia crassa or supina" incur the censure which the law has established.[15]

14 "Apostolici muneris," Feb. 8, 1745, § 2–4: "Tunc alium sacerdotem perinde haberi, censerique posse, ac si revera abesset, atque deficeret; ac proinde in eo rerum statu, non prohiberi socio criminis sacerdoti absolutionem poenitenti ab eo quoque crimine impertiri. Sciat autem complex ejusmodi sacerdos, et serio animadvertat, fore se re ipsa coram Deo, qui irrideri non potest, reum gravis adversus praedictam nostram Constitut. inobedientiae, latisque in ea poenis obnoxium, si praedictae infamiae, aut scandali pericula sibi ultro ipse confingat, ubi non sunt."

15 S. O., Jan. 13, 1892 (Coll. P. F., n. 1777). A very criminal yet curious proposition (n. 7) is that proscribed by Alexander VII, Sept. 24, 1665 (Denzinger, n. 978).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ADDITIONAL PRAYERS

CAN. 885.

Etsi preces, ab Ecclesia formulae absolutoriae adiunctae, ad ipsam absolutionem obtinendam non sint necessariae, nihilominus, nisi iusta de causa, ne omittantur.

The form of absolution is: "Ego te absolvo a peccatis tuis," and this is essential to the Sacrament.[16] However, there are some other prayers, viz., the Misereatur, Indulgentiam, and the words which precede the formula: Dominus, etc., which, our text says, are joined to the formula of absolution by the Church, and though they are not required for absolution, yet should not be omitted without a just cause.

ABSOLUTION NOT TO BE REFUSED OR DEFERRED

CAN. 886.

Si confessarius dubitare nequeat de poenitentis dispositionibus et hic absolutionem petat, absolutio nec deneganda, nec differenda est.

If the confessor has no reason for doubting the proper disposition of the penitent, and the latter demands absolution, it is neither to be refused nor postponed.

This canon belongs mainly to Moral Theology, because it most intimately affects the conscience. Yet, it is astonishing how many wrong opinions, rejected by the Church, are connected with this subject. As usual, there are [16] The word ego is not strictly essential to the formula of absolution, nor are the words a peccatis tuis; still less the deinde; but they should not be omitted; nihil innovetur, said the S. Rit. C., March 11, 1837 (Decreta Auth., n. 2764). The Passio, etc., is not prescribed, and may therefore be omitted. (Noldin, l. c., n. 237).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

excesses and defects. The former consist in demanding too much of the penitent. Thus Quesnel[17] called it wise, enlightened, and charitable to make penitents wait, to practice humility, to realize their state, to pray for the spirit of contrition and penance, and to make atonement before they are reconciled with God. The Synod of Pistoja[18] rejected attrition and demanded contrition for confession. The Jansenists required satisfaction before absolution could be imparted.[19] It would also be excessively rigorous to refuse absolution in time of sickness to such as were careless about receiving the Sacraments when they were in good health. No one who gives signs of repentance, should be refused absolution.[20]

A gross defect would be to give absolution to such as live in proxima occasione peccandi and make no effort to break the custom or remove the occasion, or such as are ignorant of the necessary mysteries of the Blessed Trinity and the Incarnation.[21] Concerning the necessary belief, a distinction between such articles of faith as are necessary necessitate medii, the two just mentioned, and such as are necessary necessitate praecepti must be made. Without belief in the former, absolution would simply be invalid.[22] If one is culpably ignorant of those articles of faith which are to be believed necessitate praecepti, he may be given absolution only if he is sorry for this culpable ignorance and accuses himself thereof, and also seriously promises to learn what he ought to know.[23]

17 Prop. dam. a Clemente XI, n. 87, "Unigenitus," Sept. 8, 1713 (Denzinger, n. 1302).

18 Prop. dam. a Pio VI., n. 36, "Auctorem fidei" Aug. 28, 1794 (ib., n. 1399).

19 Prop. dam. ab Alex. VIII., n. 15 and 17, Dec. 7, 1690 (ib., n. 1172 f).

20 S. O., May 9, 1821 (Coll. P. F., n. 757).

21 Prop. dam., n. 60–64, March 2, 1679 (Denzinger, nn. 1077 ff).

22 S. C. P. F., April 13, 1807, n. XXI (Coll., n. 692).

23 Benedict XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to Greeks who come to Latin priests for confession,—the case was reported from Constantinople,[24] — it has been decided that they must be asked not only whether they believe what the Greek Fathers believed, but also whether they maintain the faith of "old"[25] Rome, i.e., the Roman Pontiff.

As to apostates from the faith, they should not indiscriminately be refused absolution, but be absolved if they show signs of sincere repentance. They must indeed abjure their apostasy in the presence of the faithful to whom they have given scandal, but it is not necessary that they do so before infidels. They must, however, abstain from every act and sign of infidelity or paganism, so that the infidels gradually learn of the mental and moral change that has come over the former apostate.[26]

With regard to Freemasons and kindred secret societies there are two decisions which concern the Fenians of Ireland and of the U. S. These were declared to belong to sects condemned by the Apostolic Constitutions and their members cannot be absolved unless "they absolutely and positively abandon the society," otherwise absolution is invalid.[27] In general the Holy Office[28] has condemned all societies which plot against the ecclesiastical or civil government, no matter whether their members are bound by an oath of secrecy or not. Here again the question about the Knights Templars, Odd Fellows, Sons of Temperance, and Knights of Pythias recurs, and we must repeat what we have said in our Vol. III, namely, that these organizations are forbidden 24 S. C. P. F., Feb. 4, 1664, ad 2 (Coll., n. 156).

25 The term is a counter-statement of can. 3, Constant. I, and can. 28, Chalced.

26 S. C. P. F., 1629, Dec. 28, 1770 (Coll., n. 481).

27 S. O., June 27, 1838; Jan. 12, 1870 (Coll. P. F., nn. 868, 1350).

28 S. O., Aug. 5, 1840 (ibid., n. 1350, note).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by the Church, but to exclude their members from absolution would be going too far,[29] since the Church has not pronounced them to be under censure. Here it may be well to report a reply given by the Holy Office to a Canadian bishop, who had asked whether or not Catholics who give their name to secret societies merely to avoid material loss, intending to remain good Catholics, could be absolved. The answer was that they may be admitted to the Sacraments, after previous absolution from censures, if necessary, provided that, (1) they separate themselves from the society; (2) they promise not to take any active part in the meetings or celebrations and not to pay the fees; (3) that they remove all occasion of scandal; (4) that they are ready to have their names cancelled from the list as soon as they can do so without serious loss.[30]

These then are the cases which refer more especially to the public discipline of the Church. As to the rules for the postponement of absolution and the treatment of occasionarii and recidivi, the reader must be referred to Moral and Pastoral Theology.[31]

WHOLESOME PENANCES

CAN. 887.

Pro qualitate et numero peccatorum et conditione poenitentis salutares et convenientes satisfactiones confessarius iniungat; quas poenitens volenti animo excipere atque ipse per se debet implere.

According to the quality and number of the sins com-

29 Thus Schieler-Heuser, Theory and Practice of the Confessional, 1905, p. 335, note 126.

30 S. O., March 7, 1883 (Coll. P. F., n. 1593).

31 Cfr. the Instruction of the S. C. P. F., of Oct. 3, 1736 (Coll., n. 321); and Schieler-Heuser, l. c., p. 407 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mitted, and the condition of the penitent, the confessor should impose wholesome and proportionate penances, which the penitent must willingly accept and perform in person.

As the priest is under grave obligation to impose a penance or to demand satisfaction, the penitent is under the same obligation to accept and perform the penance personally, not by a substitute.[32] This obligation arises, not from the essence of Penance, but from the fact that satisfaction is an integral part of the Sacrament. For the significance or purpose of imposing a penance is not only to preserve the new life and to heal infirmity, but also to punish and destroy past sin.[33] From this it is evident why the penance is to be performed personally and that it is a really sacramental satisfaction or atonement for sins.[34]

At the same time the Code states that these penances should be proportionate to the sins committed and to the condition of the penitent, a point which is amply explained by the moralists.[35]

THE CONFESSOR A JUDGE AND PHYSICIAN

CAN. 888.

§ 1. Meminerit sacerdos in audiendis confessionibus se iudicis pariter et medici personam sustinere ac divinae iustitiae simul et misericordiae ministrum a Deo constitutum esse ut honori divino et animarum saluti consulat.

32 Trid., sess. 14, c. 8, de poenit.

33 Ibid. and prop. damn., Sept. 24, 1665, n. 15 (Denzinger, n. 986).

34 Prop. damn. in the "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, n. 35 (Denzinger, n. 1328).

35 Cfr. Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moral, 1916, p. 688 f.; Schieler-Heuser, l. c., p. 256 ff.; and the Instructions of the S. C. P. F. of Oct. 3, 1736, and April 29, 1784 (Coll., nn. 321, 569).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Caveat omnino ne complicis nomen inquirat, ne curiosis aut inutilibus quaestionibus, maxime circa sextum Decalogi praeceptum, quemquam detineat, et praesertim ne iuniores de iis quae ignorant imprudenter interroget.

The confessor shall remember that he is a judge and physician appointed by God to administer divine justice as well as mercy, in order to provide for God's honor and the welfare of souls.

He shall be careful never to ask the name of an accomplice, nor to detain the penitent with inquisitive and useless questions, especially concerning the sixth commandment, and above all he shall not imprudently ask young people about things they are ignorant of.

Benedict XIV issued three Constitutions [36] to eradicate an evil which had taken root in Portugal, namely, the practice of some confessors to ask for the name of the accomplice and to refuse absolution if the penitent refused to reveal it. The Pontiff forbade this abuse under pain of suspension from the faculty of hearing confessions and other still severer penalties. Those who defended the proposition condemned by the Holy See were subject to excommunication latae sententiae Romano Pontifici simpliciter reservatae.[37] Though this penalty does not appear in our Code the grievous obligation and liability to punishment remain. It is not permitted to ask the name or residence of an accomplice, or to inquire into any circumstances that might indirectly lead to the manifestation of his or her name.[38]

36 "Suprema," July 7, 1745; "Ubi primum," June 2, 1746; "Ad eradicandum," Sept. 28, 1746.

37 Pius IX, "Apostolicae Sedis," Oct. 2, 1869, § II, 1.

38 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 6, de Poenit. (St. Aug.); c. 12, X, V, 38; Benedict XIV, "Apostolica Constitutio," June 26, 1749, §§ 19, 20; De Syn. Dioec., XI, 2, 18.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

That the confessor should act as judge and physician is evident from the purpose of confession, which is not only to render a verdict, but also to apply the necessary means against the wounds inflicted by sin and against relapse.[39] Of course, the confessional should not be made a pulpit: the practice of preaching in it might deter people from going to confession.

THE SEAL OF THE CONFESSIONAL

CAN. 889.

§ 1. Sacramentale sigillum inviolabile est; quare caveat diligenter confessarius ne verbo aut signo aut alio quovis modo et quavis de causa prodat aliquatenus peccatorem.

§ 2. Obligatione servandi sacramentale sigillum tenentur quoque interpres aliique omnes ad quos notitia confessionis quoquo modo pervenerit.

§ 1. The sacramental seal is inviolable, and hence the confessor shall be most careful not to betray the penitent by any word or sign or in any other way for any reason whatsoever.

§ 2. The obligation of keeping the sacramental seal binds also interpreters and all other persons who may in any way have acquired knowledge of confession.

As long as public confession, at least for public and heinous crimes, and consequently public penance were in vogue, the sacramental seal naturally was not often mentioned. But when, after the incident at Constantinople,[40] auricular confession became more frequent, nay common, the clergy had to be advised and enjoined to take 39 Cfr. Schieler-Heuser, Theory and Practice, pp. 435 ff.

40 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, p. 203 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

heed lest they revealed anything that had been confessed in secret. St. Augustine demands of the priest that he, like a wise and perfect physician, first heal his own sores and then cure the wounds of others, and not make them known.[41] Leo the Great indicates the reason why auricular confession and the subsequent secrecy were commendable when he says men are more readily induced to confess their sins if their conscience is kept from the ears of the people.[42] A very remarkable text is that of the Decretals which says that what the priest knows from confession, he knows not as a (public) judge, but as God.[43] Hence under no pretext can the confessor be forced to reveal the crimes confessed to him.[44]

The seal of the confessional rests on natural, divine, and ecclesiastical law. The natural law dictates that an entrusted secret should never be revealed; it is privileged knowledge which even the civil courts respect in publicly acknowledged persons for the welfare of the community. The divine law demands that what is connected with a divine institution, such as confession, should be kept from profane ears, or, as the text above quoted says, that the secrets of God should not be revealed unless He gives permission to do so. But it would be absurd to assert that Christ permits such a revelation, because He knew that confession was a grievous burden, which would become intolerable if it impaired the penitent's good name. The divine precept of confessing even secret sins also demands absolute secrecy.

The ecclesiastical law inflicts the severest punishments on the transgressors of this divine command, subjecting 41 C. 7. C. 3, q. 7; cfr. Reg. S. Bened., c. 46.

42 C. 89, Dist. 1, de Poenit.

43 C. 2, X, I, 31.

44 C. 13, X, V, 31.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

those who directly violate the seal of confession to that form of excommunication which is most especially reserved to the Apostolic See.[45]

The seal is violated directly if a sin confessed in the confessional and the name of the penitent is revealed; indirectly, if from the confessor's way of acting or speaking there is danger that the sin of the penitent be made known or that confession itself becomes hateful. It would be an indirect violation if the priest would ask questions in such a loud voice that the bystanders could understand them, or if he would use gesticulations known to bystanders as indicative of certain sins.

The custom of giving certificates (schedula confessionis) to those of the faithful who are admitted to Holy Communion has been deservedly rebuked.[46] However, it is permissible to give a certificate which testifies to the fact that the bearer has received both the Sacrament of Penance and Holy Communion. Another custom was also reproved by the S. Congregation. Some missionaries were accustomed to put exactly as many particles on the patena as there had been persons absolved and admitted to Holy Communion. This they could not do except by using sacramental knowledge, and the practice was therefore rebuked as an abuse.[47]

From all that has been said it appears how careful the Church is in guarding the sacramental secret. No power on earth can compel the confessor to reveal anything he has heard in the confessional.

§ 2 obliges by virtue, not of the divine, but of the natural and ecclesiastical law, which latter threatens severe punishment against transgressors, i.e., such as obtain and

45 Can. 2369.

46 S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1906 (Coll., n. 683).

47 S. C. P. F., Feb. 29, 1836 (Coll., n. 846).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google make use of the knowledge obtained in confession. Thus, if a confessor directly or indirectly reveals anything out of confession, the hearers are bound to keep such knowledge to themselves. Interpreters are strictly bound to silence; bystanders who may perchance hear something said in confession are likewise obliged to secrecy.[48] Theologians and consultors are bound by the present law unless the one seeking advice frees them from this obligation. One who finds a list of sins drawn up for confession, is bound to keep it secret.[49] As to superiors, the following canon regulates their obligations.

USE OF KNOWLEDGE GAINED THROUGH CONFESSION FORBIDDEN

CAN. 890

§ 1. Omnino prohibitus est confessario usus scientiae ex confessione acquisitae cum gravamine poenitentis, excluso etiam quovis revelationis periculo.

§ 2. Tam Superiores pro tempore exsistentes, quam confessarii qui postea Superiores fuerint renuntiati, notitia quam de peccatis in confessione habuerint, ad exteriorem gubernationem nullo modo uti possunt.

§ 1. The confessor is strictly forbidden to make use of the knowledge gained from confession, if this use involves injury (gravamen) to the penitent, even though the seal of confession were not endangered.

Sacramental knowledge is, as it were, divine knowledge, and therefore must be kept as a divine secret. Hence, though a confessor knows one to be guilty of a crime, he is not allowed to rebuke him publicly or to excommunicate him, even if he is accused by others and apparently no

48 S. C. P. F., Sept. 6, 1630 (Coll., n. 61).

49 Cfr. Noldin, l. c., n. 425; Schieler-Heuser, l. c., p. 466 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

violation of the seal would follow.[50] The sole reason here given why the use of confessional knowledge is absolutely interdicted, is the damage or trouble (gravamen) that may accrue to the penitent.[51] Gravamen, literally, means heaviness; metaphorically trouble or complaint, either in the spiritual or the material life.[52] Therefore incautious remarks or personal references or intimations must be avoided. Defamatory remarks about individuals or communities which are the result of hearing confessions must be avoided. Even in his sermons the priest must beware of describing details which might point to a particular family or individual. All these are gravamina, which cause aversion to confession.

How serious this obligation is may be illustrated by the following case proposed by moralists.[53] If the confessor knows from confession that his life is at stake, he may indeed make his escape if he can do so without endangering the seal of confession or damaging the penitent; but if he cannot escape without violating the seal or causing a gravamen to the penitent, the confessor must face his fate.

§ 2. Superiors who are actually such at the time, as well as confessors who afterwards become superiors, are not allowed to make use of confessional knowledge for the external government of their subjects. This law was given by Clement VIII, 1593, and ratified by Urban VIII, from whom our text is almost verbally taken.[54]

Note that our canon speaks of superiors generally, though the decree of Clement VIII was intended chiefly

50 C. 2, X, I. 31.

51 Prop. damn. a S. O., Nov. 18, 1682 (Denzinger. n. 1087).

52 S. C. P. F., Feb. 29. 1836 (Coll., n. 846). The moralists are rather reticent about the nature of the gravamen.

53 Cfr. Schieler-Heuser, l. c., p. 482; Noldin, l. c., n. 431.

54 Cfr. Bizzarri, Collectanea, pp. 246 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for religious superiors. The Code therefore includes all superiors, whether they are already in office or to be afterwards elected. Hence bishops, religious superiors, directors of seminaries and colleges, vicars general, and also those who are employed by the Roman Congregations are included.

It is the use of sacramental knowledge that is forbidden. Thus a superior, whose knowledge is based solely on confession, cannot make use of it for purposes of external government; for instance, he cannot remove a minor official from office; he cannot remove a pastor who accused himself of a sin which would render him unfit for continuing as pastor; he cannot forbid him the sacraments, if publicly approached, even at the risk of sacrilege; he is not allowed to treat him unkindly or to withdraw from him his confidence or a post of trust; he may not change a previous arrangement after hearing confession, even though this arrangement had not yet been made public.

If a superior has reliable knowledge obtained outside the confessional, he may, of course, make use of it, provided that this extra-sacramental knowledge is the motive of his action.[55] If this were not the case, the superior could not, for instance, remove a priest from the office of confessor for occult crimes known to him outside of confession.[56]

[55] Thus the moralists in general.
[56] S. C. EE. et RR., July 2, 1627 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 24).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NOVICE-MASTERS AND DIRECTORS NOT TO HEAR CONFESSIONS

CAN 891

Magister novitiorum eiusque socius, Superior Seminarii collegiive sacramentales confessiones suorum alumnorum secum in eadem domo commorantium ne audiant, nisi alumni ex gravi et urgenti causa in casibus particularibus sponte id petant.

A logical consequence of § 2, can. 890 is that, as far as possible, every danger of using sacramental knowledge should be removed. A radical means is to forbid those directly concerned with disciplinary government to hear confessions. These are masters of novices and their socii, as well as the superiors or directors of seminaries and colleges. These, says can. 891, should not hear the confessions of their subjects who live together with them in the same house, unless the subjects themselves, for a grave and urgent reason, and in particular cases, ask them to hear their confessions. This demand must come freely and spontaneously and not be effected by insinuation or advice or threats or coaxing.

This enactment was first made for the superiors of the seminaries and colleges of Rome. It contained the phrase: "excepto aliquo raro necessitatis, de quo eius conscientia oneratur." This may explain the wording of our text: "in particular cases of urgent and grave necessity."[57] Thus the above mentioned superiors — novice masters are really the superiors of the novices —[58] are not allowed habitually to hear the confessions of their subjects, and the latter are not allowed to ask for it regularly.

57 S. O., July 5, 1899 (Coll. P. F., n. 2057).

58 S. O., Dec. 20, 1899 (Anal. Eccl., Vol. 8, 55).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Holy Office, after (Aug. 23, 1899) extending the decree of July 5, 1899, to religious congregations,[59] declared officially (Dec. 20, 1899) that the religious orders might continue to be governed by the decree of Clement VIII, which ordained that the novices must confess to their novice-master, whereas the religious congregations were to obey the decree of July 5 and Aug. 23, 1899, which forbade that practice. The Code draws no distinction between orders and congregations, and consequently all religious communities must now abide by the law which forbids the novice-master to be the habitual confessor of the novices who live in the same house with him or his socius. A travelling novice stopping for a short time at a religious house, may choose the novice-master of that house for his confessor. A religious superior may be confessor of the students who live in the college if the latter is separated from his own dwelling place. But if the superior is at the same time the director of the seminary or college, can. 891 applies to him, even though he has his living-room in the convent, for as director he is supposed to live habitually with the students.

THE DUTY OF HEARING CONFESSIONS

CAN. 892

§ 1. Parochi aliique quibus cura animarum vi muneris est demandata, gravi iustitiae obligatione tenentur audiendi sive per se sive per alium confessiones fidelium sibi commissorum, quoties ii audiri rationabiliter petant.

§ 2. Urgente necessitate, omnes confessarii obliga-

[59] Anal. Eccl., Vol. VII, 329.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tione tenentur ex caritate confessiones fidelium audiendi, et in mortis periculo omnes sacerdotes.

§ 1. Pastors and others entrusted with the care of souls, by virtue of their office are strictly obliged in justice to hear the confessions of the faithful committed to their care as often as the latter reasonably demand to be heard. This obligation, which is personal, may be complied with through a substitute.

Here the legislator enjoins pastors in particular to perform the office of confessor, albeit not only pastors in the strict sense of the word, but also quasi-pastors, and all to whom the care of souls is entrusted (assistants, curates, etc.), are bound by a strict and grievous obligation to hear confessions. For their office has been given them for this purpose, since all the faithful are obliged to confess their sins at least once a year during the paschal time. There is then a real obligation resting upon these priests to perform what charity, religion and their official character demand of them. And in performing this duty no discrimination is to be made between persons agreeable and disagreeable or with reference to social, financial, or moral conditions.[60]

The text says: "if reasonably demanded." The parish priest, like everybody else, is entitled to reasonable treatment. Thus to keep order it is reasonable to set apart certain hours for confession, provided, of course, they are chosen with due regard to the circumstances of persons and places. It is also reasonable to choose a heated chapel, or even the school, if it has a confessional, for hearing confessions in winter. Needless to add, a zealous pastor will never refuse to hear confessions even outside the hours set by him in case of individual demand or necessity.[61] An orderly congregation and an orderly pastor will keep regular hours, and a reasonable rule will preserve him from annoyance. The text further says: "sive per se sive per alium." A pastor's obligation of hearing the confessions of his people is personal because attached to his office, which is generally bestowed for personal qualities (intuitu personae). Hence it is the pastor's duty to hear confessions unless he is lawfully prevented. For a legitimate reason, such as hard hearing, or pastoral business, or sickness, or a legitimate vacation, the pastor may send his assistants to fill his place. These assistants, too, are obliged, by virtue of the care of souls entrusted to them, to hear confessions, and their obligation also is grievous, unless they be employed solely for saying Mass, or the diocesan statutes, or their letters of appointment exempt them from the obligation of hearing confessions. In the latter case the assistant could not be forced by the pastor to hear confessions. Neither may beneficiaries, who are not obliged either by the rules of the foundation or by their benefice, be compelled to discharge the office of confessor.

60 Clement XII, "Compertum," Aug. 24, 1734, §§ X, XII; Benedict XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744, §§ 26, 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The legislator has foreseen a case which may occur, and in § 2 adds a new regulation: "In urgent cases all confessors and in case of danger of death, all priests, are obliged in charity to hear confessions." An urgent case is one in which no time is to be lost, for instance, in epidemics, war, and also, perhaps, when there is a great concursus populi that could not have been foreseen, or if those bound in justice to hear confessions are suddenly and lawfully prevented. In such cases the duty of hear-

61 Of course, we do not mean that a pastor is obliged to hear every scrupulous person or devotula at any time. Pastors are obliged to hear confessions in case of contagious diseases; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 19, 6 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing confessions obliges omnes confessarii, i.e., all priests who possess the necessary jurisdiction. License may be presumed. As to religious, consult can. 608. Where there is danger of death, charity compels all priests to offer their services.

Exempt religious, at home, or in their regular residence, have to go to confession to the appointed confessors, with due regard to can. 519. When travelling, they formerly had to confess to their socius, provided they had one and he was idoneus. If they had no companion, or the socius was not idoneus, they could confess to any other priest, either secular or religious, even though the latter had no approbatio Ordinarii,[61a] i.e., no jurisdiction in the sense of the Code. Can this practice be continued? The answer, we believe, should be as follows, salvo meliore iudicio. If this common doctrine is based on law, and not on mere privileges, the practice cannot be continued, because it is manifestly against the Code, which requires express jurisdiction in any case. If, however, the practice is based on privileges, it may be continued, because the Code has not done away with all the privileges granted to regulars; see can. 613. As far as we could gather from authors, the practice was based upon privileges. Of course, we suppose this one, too, would have to be submitted to the inspection and approbation of the S. C. of Religious.

61a See Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., p. 328 n. 640; Noldin l. c., n. 360.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE RESERVATION OF SINS

CAN. 893.

§ 1. Qui ordinario iure possunt audiendi confessiones potestatem concedere aut ferre censuras, possunt quoque, excepto Vicario Capitulari et Vicario Generali sine mandato speciali, nonnullos casus ad suum avocare iudicium, inferioribus absolvendi potestatem limitantes.

§ 2. Haec avocatio dicitur reservatio casuum.

§ 3. Quod attinet ad reservationem censurarum, servetur praescriptum can. 2246, 2247.

Those who possess ordinary power for granting faculties to hear confession or to inflict censures, are also empowered to call certain cases before their tribunal, thus restricting the power of absolving vested in their inferiors. However, vicars capitular and vicars general may not use this power of restricting without a special mandate. This avocatio or restriction of cases is called reservation. Concerning the reservation of censures, see can. 2246, 2247.

It is not a mere coincidence that reservation of certain, especially public and heinous, sins was not generally applied before the twelfth century, when the penitential discipline, which, according to our views, was rather severe from the seventh to the eleventh century, began to be systematized and organized. Public penance was of long duration and austere in character, especially for apostasy, homicide, and moechia. A special kind of penalty consisted in protracted pilgrimages to some well-known shrine.[62] Among these the tombs of SS. Peter and Paul in Rome were most frequently chosen. There was a reason for this choice. It not infrequently happened that the bishops, who at that time administered the public discipline of penance, were in doubt as to what kind of penance to impose for a specific crime which was not mentioned in the penitential books and imposed a pilgrimage to Rome with the express command that the penitent present himself before the Pope, in order to await his verdict. The Pope either sent the penitent back to his bishop to receive absolution after the penance imposed had been complied with, or reserved the penance and absolution to himself. This was the original avocatio criminum graviorum or causarum maiorum, of the existence of which there are testimonies in the early centuries. Thus St. Cyprian asked the "Apostolic Lord" what to do with the apostates of the persecution; Himerius of Tarragona and Exuperius of Toulouse wished to know of Innocent I how they should proceed against clerics who had violated the law of celibacy. Even Cerdo and the two other Gnostics who were excommunicated by their bishops sought absolution from the Roman Pontiff. Leo I and Gelasius I state it as a practice — which was acknowledged by the synod of Sardica, A. D. 341 — that the Apostolic See took cognizance of the "maiora peccata." Gregory I did so in the case of Hadrian, bishop of Thebes.[63] And if we go still further back, we find that 62 Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen der Abendländ. Kirche, p. 104; "Qui moechator matris est, III annis poeniteat cum peregrinatione perenni." See also pp. 113, 186, 259, 265, 310. Hausmann, Geschichte der päpstl. Reservatfälle, 1868, pp. 35 ff. The practice commenced in Ireland and England.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

63 Cfr. c. 17, C. 9, q. 3; c. 52, C. 16, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the leniency of Pope Zephyrin (201–217) provoked the sarcasm and anger of Tertullian,[64] because it ran counter to the rigoristic tendency of a powerful party that had representatives even in Rome.

All this clearly shows that the Roman Pontiffs were conscious of their spiritual power. Excommunications inflicted post factum formed the first layer of reserved cases. From here it was but one step to the infliction of such penalties after the crime was committed and the determination of the penalty and the reservation of absolution for such who would commit such crimes. Here we have the origin of the distinction between a censura lata a lege and a censura lata ab homine. The crime furnished the guage for determining the penalty. If punished ad libitum by either pope or bishop after it had been committed, it was known as a penalty inflicted by the judge (ab homine); but if the judge merely applied a penalty already determined by law, it was a censura (generally) a lege.[65]

To return to the Middle Ages, we said that pilgrimages were frequently imposed as means of atonement for grievous crimes, and that they were most commonly made to Rome, the See of the Vicar of Christ. Such pilgrimages were at that time, i.e., in the 10th and 11th centuries, considered the most efficacious and often the only means of bringing criminals, especially homicides, who then were rampant, to their senses. Disorder and lack of respect for authority grew to such an extent that in England, northeastern France, Germany, and Italy, crimes against the fifth and seventh commandments were frequently committed even against the lower and higher clergy. To counteract this lawlessness, many synods were held in the countries named, and the Second Lateran Council, in 64 De Pudicitia, c. 5.

65 Hausmann, l. c., p. 22.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1139, summed up their enactments in the well-known decree which constitutes the privilegium canonis.[66] This is the first case of a reservation established by general law.[67] From the twelfth to the fourteenth century papal reserved cases were as yet few, but their number grew considerably after heresies became more wide-spread. A tentatively fixed number first appears in the so-called "Bulla Coenae" or "Bulla in Coena Domini," of which the written original dates from 1364, under Urban V. It mentions seven cases reserved to the Apostolic See. No adequate distinction between episcopal and papal cases can be discerned during this period. One rule indeed was strictly inculcated, viz., that a simple priest, even if he were a pastor, could not impose penance for grievous sins, but had to refer all such cases to the bishop or, in more serious instances, to the Pope. After the "Babylonian Captivity" the catalogue contained in the "Bulla Coenae" was enlarged, first under Julius II (1503–1513), then under Paul III (1536), until Urban VIII, in 1627, put the final touches to it. It now contained twenty cases, and no change has been made in this solemn document since.[68]

Modern times required a different treatment, and this was applied by Pius IX in his Constitution "Apostolicae Sedis," of Oct. 12, 1869, which introduced the new penal code containing reserved censures. This, too, is now superseded by the Code. Ad quid perditio haec? one may ask. We will answer this question; for unless we touched upon it, at least briefly, the reservation of cases could not 66 Can. 15; c. 29, C. 17, q. 4; see this Commentary, Vol. II, p. 58 f.

67 Hausmann, l. c., p. 66 ff.

68 Ibid., p. 88 ff. The Bull was called "in Coena Domini," because the list of grievous crimes was read on Maundy Thursday and those guilty of these sins were declared unworthy to receive Holy Communion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be understood. Although the cases reserved to the Roman Pontiff in the first seven or eight centuries appear to have belonged to the external judiciary or executive power, yet the juridical basis for the court of conscience was not only acknowledged, but included, in the plenitude of the primacy. The very fact that cognizance could or should be taken of the criminal causae maiores [69] by the Supreme Pontiff pre-supposed that the right or power of absolving was believed to be vested in him. Besides, excommunication required a judiciary sentence, which, though mainly concerned with the external government of the Church, implied absolution in the true sense of the word, i.e., for the court of conscience. And in the forum internum, too, there is a reservation of sins, properly so-called. That the two fora, like the two powers, papal and episcopal, were not always clearly distinguished, is easily understood.

After these preliminary remarks the text of our canon requires only a few observations.

1. The persons who are vested with the power of reserving cases are those who, iure ordinario, are entitled to grant the power of hearing confession or inflicting censures. These words emphasize an enactment of the Council of Trent,[70] which, after stating that it is conducive to morality that certain heinous sins should not be absolvable by every priest, but only by those of the highest authority, i.e., the Pope and the bishops, declares: "If any one saith that bishops have not the right of reserving cases to themselves, except as regards external polity, and therefore the reservation of cases does not hinder a priest from truly absolving from reserved cases, let him be anathema." [71] The right of the Pope and the bishops

69 Cfr. c. 52, C. 16, q. 1.
70 Sess. 14, c. 7, de poenit.
71 Ibid., can. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to reserve cases to themselves is based upon the judicial character of the Sacrament of Penance.[72] But this reason does not explain why simple priests, even though they be pastors,[73] cannot exercise this right. Therefore another element must be added: the jurisdiction of the primacy contains the plenitude of power, and the jurisdiction of the bishops, even though given immediately by God, depends on the will of the Sovereign Pontiff, who therefore may communicate it as and when he wills.[74] This is required by the unity of church government and the hierarchic order. Now the grant of faculties is part and parcel of that external forum which is ruled by those in power, and from this simple priests are excluded. By that we do not mean that reservation belongs solely to the external polity. For as the power of forgiving and retaining sins is an outgrowth of jurisdiction, so too, is reservation.

A third element is the need of determining which sins are heinous and extraordinarily grievous. This power certainly belongs to him who is the supreme judge in matters of faith and morals i.e., to the magisterium ecclesiasticum, from which simple priests, as such, are excluded.

Hence the power of reserving cases must be vindicated:

(1) to the Pope, because of the plenitude of his power over the whole Church and every part of it;

(2) to the bishops, each for his respective territory. As this prerogative belongs to them as Ordinaries, it might also be claimed by the vicar-general, were it not that positive law makes the valid and licit exercise of this power dependent upon the special mandate of the bishop.

Concerning the vicar capitular or administrator, our 72 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. III, p. 129.

73 Errors of those suspected of the heresy of Wiclif and Hus, n. 25 (Denzinger, n. 529).

74 Palmieri, De Poenitentia, p. 179.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

text says that he, too, needs a special mandate to exercise the power of reserving cases. But from whom? From the Apostolic See. At least this seems to be the most reasonable answer, as the chapter could not possibly grant that power. Benedict XIV says that though the power of granting indulgences flows from jurisdiction and not from the order, yet it is an extraordinary power attached to the episcopal dignity.[75] The same reasoning may be applied here by analogy, which in this instance is perfectly legitimate.

(3) Although this is true concerning vicars, it has been decided, and is expressly stated in can. 896, that exempt religious superiors enjoy the power of reserving cases among their own subjects. These superiors possess quasi-episcopal jurisdiction;[76] no other superiors are mentioned, nor may this power be extended to others, as the text says: "those who, iure ordinario, are entitled to grant faculties."

Febronius and his followers pretended that the right of reserving cases had devolved from the bishops to the Pope, and was based on mere custom, which might change with times and circumstances, and even be reasonably abolished.[77] However, this is not only perverting history, but is dogmatically wrong. The Pope's right of reserving cases existed before that of the bishops, who would surely not have applied for faculties to the Apostolic See had they not acknowledged a higher power in St. Peter. Of course, we do not mean to deny that the practice of reservation developed according to the exigencies of the times.

75 De Syn. Dioec., II, 9, 7; cfr. c. 12, X, V, 31.

76 Clement VIII, "Sanctissimus," May 26, 1593; S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 21, 1624 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 246); S. C. C., June 1584; April 1587 (Richter, Trid., p. 85, n. 1); Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., V, 4, 2.

77 Prop. Synodi Pistorien. dam.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ONLY ONE SIN PROPERLY RESERVED TO THE HOLY SEE

CAN. 894.

Unicum peccatum ratione sui reservatum Sanctae Sedi est falsa delatio, qua sacerdos innocens accusatur de crimine sollicitationis apud iudices ecclesiasticos.

Only one sin is, as such, reserved to the Holy See, to wit, falsely accusing an innocent priest of the crime of solicitation before the ecclesiastical court.

Solicitation here is understood as an external and grievously culpable provocation to a sin against the sixth commandment, perpetrated in the confessional, or in the act of confession, even though the confessor has no jurisdiction or does not impart absolution, and even though the provocation may not be effective. Solicitation may be made to a person of either sex.[78] If a person not solicited would thus accuse an innocent priest of solicitation in the ecclesiastical court, his crime would be reserved to the Holy See, even though no censure were attached to it.[79] Neither ignorance nor doubt as to the law of reservation or the fact of the grievousness of the sin of false accusation, excuses from this reservation, which is also incurred if the accusation to the ecclesiastical court is made by an intermediary.[80]

The ecclesiastical court is the Ordinary of the diocese or the Inquisitors, where these still perform their functions.[81] The accusation may also be made to the diocesan chancellor or to the rural dean, or, in the case of an assist-in the "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, n. 47 f. (Denzinger, n. 1407 f).

78 S. O., Feb. 11, 1661. It is not solicitation if a priest abuses knowledge gained in the confessional for soliciting a person afterwards; Lehmkuhl, II, n. 975 f.

79 But there is a censure attached to it; see can. 2363.

80 Benedict XIV, "Sacramentum Poenitentiae," June 1, 1741, § 3.

81 Ibid. § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ant, to the pastor; but if it is made orally to one of these, it should be put into writing and immediately forwarded to the Ordinary.[82] After accusation has been made in this formal way, the sin is committed and reserved.

Note that the accusation must concern a priest. Consequently, to accuse a cleric who heard confessions either in jest, or by mistake, or for the sake of practice, would not be a reserved case. It would be a reserved case, however, to falsely accuse a priest, even though he had no faculties for hearing confession. The intention of calumniating the priest need not be foremost in the accuser's mind,[83] but may be merely concomitant.

This law binds all Catholics and concerns all Catholic priests of whatever rite.[84]

This crime is specially reserved to the Holy See, and is never included in the faculties granted for absolving cases reserved to the Apostolic See.[85] Hence, to obtain absolution from this sin, even if the censure was not incurred or has been removed, application must be made to the S. Poenitentiaria, either personally or through the confessor. Fictitious names should be used in the petition.

RESERVATION TO BE MADE AT THE SYNOD

CAN. 895

Locorum Ordinarii peccata ne reservent, nisi, re in Synodo dioecesana discussa, vel extra Synodum auditis Capitulo cathedrali et aliquot ex prudentioribus ac probatioribus suae dioecesis animarum curatoribus,

82 Can. 1936.

83 Noldin, l. c., n. 393, seems to over-emphasize the fact of calumny.

84 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § IX, n. V; S. O., June 13, 1710; S. C. P. F., Aug. 6 1885, n. 2 (Coll., nn. 279, 1640).

85 S. O., June 27, 1866 (Coll. P. F., n. 1294).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vera reservationis necessitas aut utilitas comprobata fuerit.

Local Ordinaries should not reserve sins, unless the matter has been discussed at a diocesan synod, or consultation with the Cathedral Chapter and some of the more prudent and experienced directors of souls, has made evident the necessity or utility of a reservation.

Benedict XIV explains the reasons why reservations should be made at the diocesan synod. First, he says,[86] because a synod offers the best opportunity for discussion, since as a rule many worthy and experienced priests are present on that occasion. Secondly, in order that the pastors who enjoy jurisdiction may have no reason to complain of an undue restriction of their power. For they are supposed to be present at the synod and therefore have a chance to object or demand more solid reasons for an intended reservation. Lastly, because a reservation made at the synod is more in accord with a condition of stable and permanent law than one made by the bishop alone.

No doubt these reasons prompted the Holy Office to issue the decree of July 13, 1916, which furnished the text for our canon.[87] The best occasion, therefore, for establishing reserved cases is at a diocesan synod; but, as Benedict XIV adds, such a measure must be taken with great caution lest the sacramental seal be endangered.[88]

Another way of setting up such cases is after obtaining the advice (not consent) of the cathedral chapter, or, with us, of the diocesan consultors.[89] The bishop must call a meeting of these because the text says: capitulum. To this meeting he may also call other priests who have

86 De Syn. Dioec., V, 4, 3.
87 A. Ap. S., VII, 313.
88 De Syn. Dioec., V, 4, 3.
89 Can. 427.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

charge of souls. A decree of 1602 says that men distinguished by piety and learning should be called, in order to examine and discuss the matter thoroughly.[90] Our text reads: animarum curatores, a general term which is evidently used to exclude the idea that only pastors are to be invited. Assistants, confessors of religious, missionaries, etc., may be heard, provided they belong to the "more prudent and tried" class, and are or were actually engaged in the care of souls.

EXEMPT RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 896

Inter Superiores religionis clericalis exemptae unus Superior generalis, et in monasteriis sui iuris Abbas, cum proprio cuiusque Consilio, peccata, ut supra, subditorum reservare possunt, firmo praescripto can. 518, § 1, 519.

Among the superiors of exempt clerical institutes, the superior general, and in autonomous monasteries the Abbot, with his counsellors, may reserve sins of their subjects, with due regard, however, to can. 518, § 1, and to can. 519.

Clement VIII and a decree of the S. C. of Bishops and Regulars had emphasized, not the power of exempt religious, for this follows from exemption itself, but the need of prudence and moderation in reserving cases, the number of which was reduced to eleven,[91] but is still more restricted by can. 897.

The superiors to whom can. 896 applies are those of 90 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 26, 1602 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 13 f.).

91 Clement VIII, "Sanctissimus," May 26, 1593; S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 21, 1624 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 246 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exempt clerical orders or congregations. Superiors of exempt lay or of non-exempt clerical congregations do not enjoy the power of reserving cases. For the latter class the Ordinary may establish reservations, as also the Apostolic See when approving the Constitutions.

In centralized religious orders the superior general alone can reserve cases. In doing so, he must proceed like the bishop, i.e., consult with his counsellors and, if he wishes, with others who are experienced in the direction of souls. It is true he is not bound by their advice, for the text of can. 895, to which our canon refers, does not require their consent. But it would be folly and a grievous transgression of a serious law in a serious matter not to obtain the advice of the counsellors.

The abbot of an autonomous monastery must proceed in the same manner. By the way it may be noted that neither the Abbot Primate of the Benedictine Order, nor the Abbot President of each congregation, has any power with regard to reserving cases.

Our canon, lastly, draws attention to can. 518, § 1, and can. 519. The former prescribes, in accordance with an enactment of Clement VIII, that a number of confessors shall be appointed in each house for absolving from reserved cases. Can. 519 grants to any priest approved by the Ordinary the right of absolving any religious from cases reserved by the religious superior.[92]

NUMBER AND QUALITY OF RESERVED CASES

CAN. 897

Casus reservandi sint pauci omnino, tres scilicet vel, ad summum, quatuor ex gravioribus tantum et atrocioribus criminibus externis specifice determinatis; ipsa

[92] Cfr. Vol. II, p. 152 ff. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google vero reservatio ne ultra in vigore maneat, quam necesse sit ad publicum aliquod inolitum vitium exstirpandum et collapsam forte christianam disciplinam instaurandam.

CAN. 898

Prorsus ab iis peccatis sibi reservandis omnes abstineant quae iam sint Sedi Apostolicae etiam ratione censurae reservata, et regulariter ab iis quoque quibus censura, etsi nemini reservata, a iure imposita sit.

The cases to be reserved shall be few, namely, three, or at most four, of the more grievous and atrocious external crimes, specificially determined. The reservation itself should not remain in force longer than is necessary to uproot some inveterate public crime and to restore Christian discipline.

But Ordinaries, and religious superiors as well, shall refrain from reserving sins already reserved to the Holy See by reason of the censures attached to them, and, as a rule, shall not reserve sins which the law has laid under censure, even though this censure be not reserved to any one in particular.

These two canons define the number and quality of the sins that may be reserved and the purpose of reservation, and declare which sins should not be made reserved cases.

1. The number is reduced to four, at the highest, beyond which neither Ordinaries nor exempt religious superiors may go. Rome had more than once on previous occasions declared that the number of reserved cases should be very small (paucissimos) and selected with great discrimination, lest reservation result in spiritual injury rather than benefit. It also enjoined that the con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ditions of each province and the character of the people should be taken into consideration.[93]

2. The quality of the sins that may be reserved is described by four attributes: they must be particularly grievous, atrocious, external, and specified crimes. Although no definite rule can be formulated by which the grievousness and hideousness of a crime could be exactly determined, yet the habitual proclivity of a certain nation to a certain crime would be a sufficient reason for reserving that sin in order to break their obstinacy by making it difficult to obtain absolution.[94] Hence, as stated above, local conditions should be studied. No reservation should be attached to sins from which no absolution is given except under the condition of restitution, or to sins into which ordinary persons often fall. "In peccatis etiam carnalibus reservandis multâ utantur circumspectione, propter periculum scandalorum in iis maxime personis, in quas ob accessum ad confessarios extraordinarios, vel frequentem reditum ad ordinarios, suspicionis aliquid cadere potest." [95]

Broadly it may be stated that sins which are grievous by reason of their very nature or betray an atrocious character on account of the damage done to ecclesiastical discipline and the welfare of souls, may be reserved.

This is confirmed by the addition of the word external. For although, as some theologians say, internal sinful acts may in summo iuris rigore be reserved, yet it has never been Roman practice to reserve merely mental sins, for instance, internal heresy.[96] Note, however, that external is not the same as notorious or public. A sin may be 93 S. C. EE. et RR., Jan. 6, 1601; Nov. 26, 1902 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 13 ff.).

94 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec. X, 5, 4.

95 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 26, 1602 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 14).

96 Benedict XIV, l. c., V, 5, 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

committed externally, yet be unknown to any one except the person who committed it. A crime, however, is always supposed to be external, for it is a delictum publicum, at least in the wider sense.

The Code requires that the crimes be specified or specifically determined. As sins are specified by their opposition to certain definite virtues or laws, and by the different objects comprised by the various virtues, so also should reservation be specific.[97] The quality and mode of a crime determine its specific nature and also the manner of reservation, whether or not under censure. Thus adultery, if it became rampant in a province, or diocese, or city, might become a matter for reservation; also incendiarism, burglary or bank-robbing.

The text says further that reservation should cease as soon as its purpose is attained. This is the case when an inveterate vice is extirpated and Christian discipline restored. Here the principle holds goods: Reservation, if uselessly protracted, might do more harm than good.

3. Canon 898 distinguishes between sins under censure reserved to the Holy See and sins under censure reserved to no one in particular. From reserving sins of the first kind, Ordinaries and religious superiors should abstain entirely; from reserving sins reserved under censure to no one they should refrain as a rule. This law rests on the regula iuris 54 in 6°: "Qui prior est tempore, potior est iure," provided, of course, that all other things are equal.[98] As the common law is supposed to be prior to any particular law or jurisdiction, inferiors should cede power to the superior. But the cases reserved to no one suffer an exception, for the text says: as a rule (regulariter).

97 Marc, Institut, Moral. Alphons., 1898, I, n. 324.

98 Reiffenstuel, In Reg. Juris, 54 in 60, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"Frequency, scandal or another reason"[99] may advise reservation by the Ordinary besides the one imposed by common law, and in that case such a double reservation would be admissible.

It may be helpful to mention the cases which are reserved under censure.

I. Specialissimo modo reserved to the Apostolic See are:

1°. Species consecratas desecrantes (can. 2320);

2°. Violentas manus iniicientes in Romanum Pontificem (can. 2445);

3°. Absolventes vel absolvere fingentes complicem (can. 2367);

4°. Directe violantes sigillum confessionis (can. 2369).

II. Speciali modo reserved to the Apostolic See are:

1°. Apostatae, haeretici, schismatici (can. 2394);

2°. Edentes, defendentes, legentes, retinentes, libros eorum, qui haeresim vel schisma propugnant (can. 2318);

3°. Laici celebrationem Missae vel confessionem simulantes (can. 2322);

4°. Violentas manus iniicientes in Cardinales, Legatos Ap. Sedis, vel Episcopos (can. 2343);

5°. Provocantes ad concilium generale (can. 2332);

6°. Recurrentes ad laicam potestatem ad litteras apostolicas impediendas vel acta quaelibet (can. 2333);

7°. Impedientes immunitatem ecclesiasticam (can. 2334);

8°. Violantes privilegium fori quoad praelatos superiores (can. 2340);

9°. Usurpantes vel detinentes bona ad Ecclesiam Romanam pertinentia (can. 2345);

[99] S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 26, 1602 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 14).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

10°. Falsarii litterarum apostolicarum (can. 2360);

11°. Falso denuntiantes sacerdotem innocentem de sollicitationis crimine (can. 2363).

III. Simpliciter reserved to the Apostolic See are:

1°. Quaestum facientes ex indulgentiis (can. 2327);

2°. Nomen dantes sectae massonicae etc. (can. 2335);

3°. Absolvere praesumentes ab excommunicatione Sedi Apostolicae specialissimo vel speciali modo reservata (can. 2338, § 1);

4°. Impendentes auxilium vel favorem excommunicato vitando in delicto excommunicationis (can. 2338, no. 2);

5°. Violantes privilegium fori in praelatos episcopis inferiores (can. 2341);

6°. Clausuram papalem violantes et moniales exeuntes, (can. 2342);

7°. Duellum perpetrantes et cooperantes (can. 2351);

8°. Qui invalidum matrimonium attentant ex ordine clericorum vel religiosorum et personae cum ipsis contrahentes (can. 2388).

IV. Nemini reservatae are the following excommunications:

1°. Qui ausi fuerint mandare tradi sepulturae ecclesiasticae contra can. 1240 praescriptum (can. 2339);

2°. Alienantes absque beneplacito apostolico (can. 2347);

5°. Cogentes ad statum clericalem vel religiosum (can. 2352).

V. Cases reserved to the Ordinary by law:

1°. Those mentioned under can. 2319 concerning marriage before a non-Catholic minister, etc.;

2°. Conficientes falsas reliquias (can. 2326);

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3°. Violentas manus iniicientes in clericos (can. 2343, § 4);

4°. Procurantes abortum, matre non exceptâ, effectu secuto (can. 2350);

5°. Professi simpliciter matrimonium contrahentes et personae contrahentes cum ipsis (can. 2388);

6°. Apostata religiosus, qui pertinet ad ordinem exemptum vel non exemptum, si pertinet ad religionem exemptam, excommunicatio reservata est Superiori religioso maiori (vel abbati monasterii sui iuris) (can. 2385).

This conspectus shows who possesses the power of reserving and which cases should not be reserved, because already reserved by law. But those mentioned under IV as "nemini reservatae" may, if frequency or scandal should necessitate such a measure, be reserved also by the Ordinary, as such. The cases placed under that heading are worthy of close inspection, especially at the time of canonical visitation of religious institutes.

It may also be opportune to indicate some cases which the Code does not expressly lay under censure, but in regard to which it explicitly states that the Ordinary may punish the transgressors "also by censure" (etiam censura).

1°. Those who trade in Mass stipends (can. 2324);

2°. Those who pertinaciously refuse to obey the legitimate injunctions of the Roman Pontiff or of the Ordinary (can. 2331);

3°. Those who have received legacies or bequests or donations for pious or charitable purposes and refuse to comply with the obligation of applying them to said purposes (can. 2348);

4°. Those who live in simultaneous bigamy (can. 2356).

In all these cases Ordinaries would act in conformity with the Code if they reserved them to themselves, even

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by previously promulgating the censure. Only one rule they should keep in view: the necessity or utility of reservation, and after the evil has been cured, they should remove the censure. A very opportune measure was taken by the bishops of Holland in their Lenten Pastoral for 1919. They forbade Catholics to join or remain in any socialist or anarchistic union or club, under penalty of refusal of absolution. The same penalty was threatened against those who regularly read anarchistic or socialist literature, or who professed subversive doctrines. This joint procedure was perfectly legitimate and may be justified on the basis of can. 2335.

If we may venture to suggest the cases which exempt religious superiors may eventually reserve, the following taken from the decree of Clement VIII, in a modified form, might be proposed:

1°. Gravis transgressio voti paupertatis, amounting to a sum which formerly was reserved to the S. Penitentiary, say, about $50.

2°. Peccatum contra votum castitatis perpetratum cum religiosa femina, vel etiam repetita sodomia, vel concubinatus.

3°. Qui Romano Pontifici vel Superiori religioso aliquid legitime praecipienti vel prohibenti secundum regulam et constitutiones in materia gravi, e.g., missionis, scholae, officiorum, non obtemperant pertinaciter et cum scandalo aliorum sive extraneorum sive religiosorum.

4°. Falsificatio manus aut sigilli officialium monasterii aut conventus, aut litterarum vel actorum ecclesiasticorum tam publicorum quam privatorum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROMULGATION AND ABSOLUTION OF RESERVED CASES

CAN. 899.

§ 1. Statutis semel reservationibus quas vere necessarias aut utiles iudicaverint, curent locorum Ordinarii ut ad subditorum notitiam, quo meliore eis videatur modo, eaedem deducantur, nec facultatem a reservatis absolvendi cuivis et passim impertiant.

§ 2. At huiusmodi absolvendi facultas ipso iure competit canonico poenitentiario ad normam can. 401, § 1, et habitualiter impertiatur saltem vicariis foraneis, addita, praesertim in locis dioecesis a sede episcopali remotioribus, facultate subdelegandi toties quoties confessarios sui districtus, si et quando pro urgentiore aliquo determinato casu ad eos recurrant.

§ 3. Ipso iure a casibus, quos quoquo modo sibi Ordinarii reservaverint, absolvere possunt tum parochi, aliive qui parochorum nomine in iure censentur, toto tempore ad praeceptum paschale adimplendum utili, tum singuli missionarii quo tempore missiones ad populum haberi contingat.

§ 1. Cases reserved for reasons of necessity or utility should be brought to the knowledge of their subjects by the Ordinaries, who should not grant indiscriminate faculties to absolve from them.

This rule was made by the Council of Trent[1] and insisted upon by the S. Congregation.[2] But a distinction must be made as to the manner in which the cases are reserved. If they are reserved at a diocesan synod, promulgation is supposed to be effected after the Ordinary has put his signature to the synodal acts, and no fur-

1 Sess. 14, c. 7, de poenit.
2 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 26, 1602 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 14).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ther publication is required, unless a clause to this effect appears in the synodal acts.[3] If the cases were reserved at a meeting of the consultors, they must be brought to the notice of the clergy[4] by an official circular letter, issued by the Ordinary or his chancellor.

The text furthermore says that faculties for absolving from reserved cases should not be granted indiscriminately. To do so would render reservation ludicrous and frustrate its purpose.

§ 2. The Canonicus Poenitentiarius has by law the faculty of absolving from the cases reserved to the bishop. This canon penitentiary may belong to a cathedral or to a collegiate church, both of whom enjoy the power of absolving by virtue of their office and of law, which is expressed in this canon as well as in can. 401, no. 1. Besides, the legislator wishes that the faculty of absolving from these reserved cases should be habitually delegated to the rural deans, who should also be given the power of subdelegating toties quoties confessors of their districts, especially in parishes distant from the episcopal see, whenever these confessors have recourse to the deans for individual and urgent cases.

Note well the difference between the faculties habitually given to the rural deans and the faculties given to confessors in distant parishes. The latter must be applied for in each single case, and can be granted only if the case is urgent. The application must be sent to the rural dean either in writing or orally; by telephone only if there is an absolute necessity and no violation of the sacramental seal need be feared. Any pastor or assistant, in fact, any confessor, may foresee the cases, and

[3] See can. 362.

[4] The clergy should, therefore, make these cases known to the people, for the term "subditi" comprises all the faithful.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hence apply for the faculty before going into the confessional. One thing is certain, viz., that the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to the Ordinary should not be imparted habitually to all pastors, or curates, or assistants, but only in individual cases. Habitual faculties are to be given only to the rural deans.

The question may be asked: Which are the reserved cases from which the Poenitentiarii (by law) and the rural deans (in virtue of habitual faculties) may absolve? The answer is not as evident as one might wish, and it is therefore with some misgiving that we state our own view.

1°. It is certain that the cases are included which the Ordinary has reserved to himself, to wit, the three or four cases exclusive of the six mentioned in the preceeding canon under V.

2°. The Canon Poenitentiarius may absolve, not only from the three or four cases reserved by the Ordinary to himself, but also from the six cases mentioned under V. This we deduce from the wording of can. 401, § 1, where he is said to have jurisdiction by law to absolve from all sins and censures reserved to the bishop (episcopo reservatis) and from can. 899, § 2: "ipso iure ordinario competit."

3°. The bishop may habitually delegate the rural deans to absolve, not only from the three or four cases he has reserved to himself, but also from the six cases mentioned under V as reserved to the Ordinary by law. For can. 2253 says clearly that the one to whom a censure is reserved by law, or his delegate, may absolve from the same.

4°. It matters not whether the Ordinary reserves his own cases under censure or not, or whether he reserves censures nemini reservatae.

§ 3 concerns pastors and all who, in law, go by the name of pastors, hence also missionaries. Pastors are defined in can. 451, where it is laid down that in law those, too, go by the name of pastors who govern quasi-parishes where the hierarchic order is not completely established or restored, and likewise vicars of parishes who are endowed with full parochial powers.[5] These are further determined in can. 471–473, viz., the actual pastors of incorporated parishes, vicars ad interim, and administrators. Concerning temporary substitutes there might perhaps be a doubt. Yet if the last clause of can. 474 is not applicable, i.e., if neither the Ordinary nor the pastor has excepted any parochial right, we believe that they may safely be called pastors under the law. But assistants or curates are not comprised here, because they do not go by the name of pastors in law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Missionaries are those who give temporary missions to the people. Retreat masters are not included here, unless they give retreats to the whole parish or perhaps to a class or group of members, say, young men or women.

All these may absolve by law from any case which the Ordinary has reserved to himself in any shape or form, during the whole time set for fulfilling the paschal duty. Missionaries enjoy the same power, also by law, during the time of a mission. The cases are those which the Ordinary has reserved to himself, i.e., the three or four which are reserved not to or by the Apostolic See, or by law to the Ordinary.[6] But it does not matter —quoquo modo — whether they are reserved as simply reserved cases, or under censure. By law signifies that no delegation or express concession is needed. Hence any missionary who has received express jurisdiction from the Ordinary for hearing confessions in the diocese or parish

[5] See our Commentary, Vol. II, p. 559 ff.

[6] S. O., July 13, 1916 (A. Ap. S., VIII, 314): "Quaevis Ordinariorum reservatio ipso iure," etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

where he is to give a mission, may absolve from the cases reserved by and to the Ordinary, even though this faculty is not mentioned in the general (but express) grant of faculties. Pastors, and all those who go by the name of pastors, may licitly and validly absolve from cases reserved to and by the Ordinary by the very fact that they hear confessions during the paschal season. If this season is extended by the Ordinary, e.g., from Laetare to Trinity Sunday, they may during this whole period make use of the power granted by law without further application to the Ordinary. They may also absolve the same persons several times during this period, for the stress is on the time, not on the number of absolutions.

WHEN RESERVATIONS CEASE OR LOSE THEIR FORCE

CAN. 900

Quaevis reservatio omni vi caret:

1.° Cum confessionem peragunt sive aegroti qui domo egredi non valent, sive sponsi matrimonii ineundi causa;

2.° Quoties vel legitimus Superior petitam pro aliquo determinato casu absolvendi facultatem denegaverit, vel, prudenti confessarii iudicio, absolvendi facultas a legitimo Superiore peti nequeat sine gravi poenitentis incommodo aut sine periculo violationis sigilli sacramentalis;

3.° Extra territorium reservantis, etiamsi dumtaxat ad absolutionem obtinendam poenitens ex eo discesserit.

All reservations cease or lose their force:

1°. When those who go to confession are sick and cannot leave the house, or if they are about to be married;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2°. As often as the lawful superior refuses a faculty asked for in a particular case, or when, according to the prudent judgment of the confessor, the faculty cannot be asked of the lawful superior without great inconvenience to the penitent or without danger of violating the sacramental seal;

3°. Outside the territory of the one who has reserved the case, even though the penitent has repaired thither solely for the purpose of obtaining absolution.

"Quaevis reservatio," says the Code, whereas the decree of the Holy Office from which the text is taken adds: "quaevis Ordinariorum reservatio," which is certainly the meaning of this canon; we can hardly believe that papal reservations cease under the conditions mentioned, because papal reservations with one exception (see can. 894), all have censures attached, for the absolution of which canons 2253 f. must be consulted.

1. The aegroti, or sick persons, are not further described, and hence we may assume that any kind or degree of sickness suffices, provided only it detains the patient at home, even though it exists only in the imagination, as is sometimes the case with hysterical women. Parties before marriage are also benefited, but it must be ineundi causa, i.e., for the purpose of marriage. We would not exclude the case of a marriage that has to be rectified as to its validity. The absolution from censure mentioned in can. 2319, § 1, n. 1, cannot be imparted because it is reserved to the Ordinary by law, not by himself.

2. The second number mentions refusal of the lawful superior to grant the faculty. Whether this refusal be reasonable or unreasonable, formal or informal, matters not for the purpose in question, for the confessor is the best judge whether the persons are deserving of absolution, and authority has been safeguarded by the petition.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Another reason which causes a reservation to cease is the inconvenience of the penitent. But this must be great. A little wait could not be called a great inconvenience for city folk. But if one living in the country would have to call again, this might be a great inconvenience. It might also be a great inconvenience to come again for a man or woman who is known as a rare churchgoer; for in that case gossip might easily result.

The danger of violating the seal of the confessional is another reason for the cessation of a reservation. This would be present if the person who committed the reserved crime were known to the Ordinary, or if circumstances might point to his identity, or if he would be the only one to go to confession (and wanted to receive Holy Communion), while the confessor had to leave the confessional and go to the telephone. The confessor should prudently judge whether the seal is endangered in any case.

3. The last number applies the benefit of cessation even to the case formerly called in fraudem legis. A person who leaves the diocese where he knows that his case is reserved, and goes to another diocese where the case is not reserved, may be absolved validly and licitly. This is a change of legislation, as formerly such an absolution was invalid.[7] But peregrini are bound by the reservations of the place in which they confess (Com. Interpret. C. I. C., Aug. 17, 1919; see Irish Eccles. Record, XIV, 330).

[7] Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 7; S. C. C., Sept. 16, 1649 (Richter, Trid., p. 85, n. 8).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

THE SUBJECT OF PENANCE

MATTER AND INTEGRITY OF CONFESSION

CAN. 901.

Qui post baptismum mortalia perpetravit, quae nondum per claves Ecclesiae directe remissa sunt, debet omnia quorum post diligentem sui discussionem conscientiam habeat, confiteri et circumstantias in confessione explicare, quae speciem peccati mutent.

CAN. 902.

Peccata post baptismum commissa, sive mortalia directe potestate clavium iam remissa, sive venialia, sunt materia sufficiens, sed non necessaria sacramenti poenitentiae.

Whoever after Baptism has committed mortal sins not yet directly forgiven by the keys of the Church, must confess them and explain the circumstances which may change the species of sin. The accusation must be preceded by a careful examination of conscience. Necessary matter, therefore, are mortal sins not yet forgiven, whereas sins committed after Baptism, whether grievous but already directly forgiven by the power of the keys, or only venial, are sufficient matter for the Sacrament.

Like every other sacrament, Penance consists of matter and form. The latter, according to the teaching of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Church,[1] is the act of absolution. As to the matter, there is a controversy in regard to the proper constituents, but it is safe[2] to say that the acts of the penitent, to wit, contrition, confession and satisfaction, are, as it were, the proximate matter of the sacrament, while the sins are the materia remota or circa quam.

Can. 901 states that all mortal sins committed after Baptism must be confessed. As Penance is applied by a judicial act, it follows that to the sacred tribunal must be submitted all those sins which constitute matter for juridical cognizance, in other words, all mortal sins, because these prevent man from attaining eternal salvation and make him an object of divine wrath. It was these sins which Christ intended when He instituted this sacrament and which He commanded to be directly submitted to the power of the keys. Directly to submit these sins to the power of keys means to accuse oneself of them before the appointed judge and to receive absolution from him by an exercise of jurisdiction.[3] Indirectly mortal sins may be forgiven concomitantly, as when a penitent omits a sin through inculpable ignorance, or forgetfulness, or inability, or when a confessor, for weighty reasons, imparts absolution though not empowered to do so.[4] No one mortal sin can be forgiven without the others.

Can. 901, then, requires that confession be integral, i.e., comprise all mortal sins according to number and species. The number the penitent is obliged to state as far as he can recollect it, and if the exact number cannot be given, he should say "about," or "at least," or "more

1 Decretum pro Arm. (Denzinger, n. 594); Trid., sess. 14, c. 3, de poenit.

2 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. III, p. 76 ff.

3 Palmieri, De Poenitentia, p. 99 ff; p. 359 ff.

4 Schieler-Heuser, Theory and Practice, p. 41.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or less."[5] Accuracy is also required in stating the species,[6] for it is the species which determines the nature of a sin, whether it is opposed to a special virtue, or to specific objects of a virtue, or to a specific commandment. Not only must the ultimate species (infima species) be stated, but the specific circumstances, too, must be explained. These are such as alter the species of a sin, and are attached to persons (e.g., sacred persons), places or objects. For instance, an act of violence done in church, or a theft committed of sacred things.[7] The integrity of confession may never be dispensed with, not even when there is a great multitude of penitents, as may happen on feast days.[8] If one is lawfully excused from making a complete confession, for instance, on account of danger of death, he is obliged to mention the sins omitted in his next confession.[9] This, however, does not mean that a penitent who has made a confession as completely as he was able, is obliged to make another confession to supply the number. Unnecessary and inculpable scruples are to be discarded. In saying this we do not, of course, approve the Quietists' quaint and unqualified self-annihilation which would render a soul advanced in sanctity the purely passive and insensible instrument of even notably immoral acts.[10]

Can. 902 states which acts constitute sufficient but not necessary matter for confession. They are the mortal sins already directly forgiven, and venial sins. This is the doctrine of the Council of Trent.[11] Venial sins may 5 Prop. Lutheri damn., n. 8 (Denzinger, n. 632); Schieler-Heuser, l. c., p. 163.

6 Trid., sess. 14, c. 5, de poenit.

7 Prop. damn., Sept. 24, 1665, n. 24 sq.; prop. damn. March 4, 1679, n. 49 sq. (Denzinger, n. 995 f.; 1066 f.)

8 Prop. damn. March 4, 1679, n. 59 (Denzinger, n. 1076).

9 Prop. damn. Sept. 24, 1665, n. 11 (ibid., n. 982).

10 Prop. damn. Nov. 20, 1687, n. 47, 48, 60 (ibid., n. 1134 f.; 1147).

11 Sess. 14, c. 5, de poenit.; cfr. Pohle-Preuss, l. c., p. 62.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be forgiven, but they cannot be retained, since they do not entail eternal damnation. On the other hand the custom of confessing them is praiseworthy, and there is no reason to fear that the Sacrament may be rendered contemptible by the confessing of venial sins, as the synod of Pistoja falsely asserted.[12]

CONFESSING THROUGH AN INTERPRETER

CAN. 903.

Qui aliter confiteri non possunt, non prohibentur, si velint, per interpretem confiteri, praecavendo abusus et scandala, firmo praescripto can. 889, § 2.

Those who are unable to confess otherwise, may, if they wish, confess through an interpreter, provided abuses and scandals are avoided, with due regard to can. 889, § 2.

The canon says, they may, but not, they are obliged to confess through an interpreter. For although confession is necessary by divine command, and, at least indirectly, necessitate medii, for salvation, yet there is a distinction between actual submission to the power of the keys and submission in desire (in voto). The latter means that one is ready to subject himself to confession if he can do so in the proper and ordinary way and an occasion offers.[13] However, confessing through an interpreter is an extraordinary and, considering human reluctance in matters of conscience, a very burdensome means. Therefore it cannot be held that God meant to impose such an obligation on men, especially since an act of contrition,— provided confession is not spurned for other reasons,— can effect justification.

12 Prop. damn., "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, n. 30 (Denzinger, n. 1402).

13 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VII, 15, 8; VII, 16, 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The interpreter must observe the seal of confession. This is a grievous obligation.

By the way it may be stated that the term "interpreter" is to be understood strictly of a person, not of any other means, such as a letter, a telegram or a telephone message, etc.

OBLIGATION OF DENOUNCING SOLLICITATION

CAN. 904.

Ad normam constitutionum apostolicarum et nominatim constitutionis Benedicti XIV Sacramentum poenitentiae, I Iun. 1741, debet poenitens sacerdotem, reum delicti sollicitationis in confessione, intra mensem denuntiare loci Ordinario, vel Sacrae Congregationi S. Officii; et confessarius debet, graviter onerata eius conscientia, de hoc onere poenitentem monere.

In accordance with the Apostolic constitutions, especially that of Benedict XIV, "Sacramentum Poenitentiae," June 1, 1741, a penitent is obliged to report, within a month, any priest guilty of solicitation in confession. The report must be made either to the local Ordinary or to the Holy Office, and every confessor has the strict obligation to admonish his penitent of this duty.

The obligation of reporting priests who solicit a penitent ad turpia in the act, or on occasion, or under pretext of confession, is a grievous one, as will be seen from the instructions of the Holy Office quoted below. First we will give a few decisions referring to our case. Alexander VII, on Sept. 24, 1665, condemned[14] the two following propositions:

Prop. 6: "Confessarius, qui in sacramentali Confes-

[14] See Denzinger, nn. 977 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sione tribuit poenitenti chartam postea legendam, in qua ad venerem incitat, non censetur sollicitasse in confessione, ac proinde non est denuntiandus."

Prop. 7: "Modus evitandi obligationem denuntiandae sollicitationis est, si sollicitatus confiteatur cum sollicitante: hic potest ipsum absolvere absque onere denuntiandi."

To the question proposed to the Holy Office, whether or not the expression, "simulantes confessiones audire" is to be understood conjointly of solicitation and confession, either real or feigned, the answer was: Either suffices. This must evidently be taken as bearing on confession. The same must be said of the answer given to the second question proposed on the same occasion: if a confessional (i.e., confession-room) is also used as a parlor, and solicitation is made there, this would entail the obligation of denouncing the guilty priest.[15] This, we say, must also be considered as connected with confession. For the mere fact that the parlor also serves as a quasi-confessional would certainly not be sufficient to connect solicitation with confession.

The same S. Congregation has excused and exempted women from the obligation of denouncing if they live far from the seat of the Ordinary or the place where the denunciation should be made.[16] However the obligation revives[17] when the danger or impediments to the journey cease, and Ordinaries should, as far as possible, see to it that such impediments are removed.[18]

The priest who hears the confession of a person who 15 S. O., April 28, 1700 (Coll. P. F., n. 248). The so-called parlor was really the "confession-room," of a convent, such as cloistered nuns have in some countries.

16 S. O., Jan. 22, 1727 (Coll. cit., n. 308).

17 S. O., May 20, 1842 (ibid., n. 949).

18 S. O., Feb. 20, 1866 (ibid., n. 1282).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

has been solicited must admonish him or her of the grave obligation of reporting the guilty priest within a month from the date when he or she learned or first realized the duty of denunciation. Should the penitent refuse to denounce the culprit, absolution must be denied after a repeated effort to induce him or her to comply with the obligation.

The place where denunciation is to be made is the Ordinariate or the Holy Office in Rome.[19] There is no intermediary instance or authority, and religious superiors are not allowed to interfere in this matter. The Ordinary, however, may delegate another priest to hear the case and to employ a third as notary. But no other persons are to be admitted as witnesses, except, of course, such as testify to the character of the priest and the person solicited. Anonymous denunciations are not to be accepted, and the obligation itself is personal, i. e., incumbent on the person solicited.

The interrogatory to be made by the bishop or his delegate, follows below. The obligation of denouncing culpable priests of solicitation in the act of hearing or on the pretext or occasion of confession binds all the faithful of both sexes and of every rite, Latin and Oriental.[20]

INSTRUCTIO S. OFFICII (FEB. 20, 1866)

1. Personae sive mares sive feminae, quaecumque illae sint, ad turpia sollicitatae in Confessione vel occasione aut praetextu Confessionis, quemadmodum enucleate in memorata Constitutione praecipitur, rem ad Sanctam Sedem vel ad loci Ordinarium deferre debent.

2. Denunciare oportet quemcumque sacerdotem, etiam iuris-

19 The address is: Sant' Uffizio, Via del Sant' Uffizio 5, Roma, Italy.

20 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § IX, n. V; "Apostolici muneris," Feb. 8, 1745, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dictione carentem, vel etiam poenitentis sollicitationi consentientem, quamvis statim dissentientem de turpi materia loqui, illius complementum ad aliud tempus differentem, et non praebentem absolutionem poenitenti.

3. Huiusmodi denunciationes a nemine absque culpa letali omitti possunt. Qua de re poenitentes debent admoneri, neque ab iis admonendis instruendisque eorum bona fides excusat.

4. Sacerdotes ad sacras audiendas confessiones constituti, qui de hac obligatione poenitentes suos non admonent, debent puniri.

5. Poenitentes admoniti, et omnino renuentes, nequeunt absolvi; qui vero ob iustam causam denunciationem differre debent, eamque quo citius poterunt faciendam spondent serioque promittunt, possunt absolvi.

6. Denunciationes anonymae contra sollicitantes ad turpia nullam vim habent: denunciationes enim fieri debent in iudicio, nempe coram Episcopo eiusve delegato cum interventu ecclesiastici viri, qui notarii partes teneat, et cum iuramento, et cum expressione et subscriptione sui nominis; nec sufficit si fiat per apochas vel per litteras sine nomine et cognomine auctoris. Ceterum prohibetur, ne in recipiendis denunciationes praeter iudicem et notarium, virum utrumque ecclesiasticum, speciali et scripto exarata Episcopi deputatione munitum, testes intersint. Cavendum quoque ne ex denunciantibus quaeratur, num sollicitationi consenserint: et convenientissimum foret, si de huiusmodi consensu, quantumvis sponte manifestato, nihil notetur in tabulis.

7. Denunciationis onus est personale et ab ipsa persona sollicitata adimplendum. Verum si gravissimis difficultatibus impediatur, quominus hoc perficere ipsa possit, tunc vel per se, vel per epistolam, vel per aliam personam sibi benevisam suum adeat Ordinarium, vel sanctam Sedem per sacram Poenitentiariam, vel etiam per hanc supremam Inquisitionem, expositis omnibus circumstantiis, et deinde se gerat iuxta instructionem quam erit acceptura. Si vero necessitas urgeat, se gerat iuxta consilia et monita sui confessarii. Ast si nullo impedimento detenta denunciationem omnino renuat, in hoc casu aliisque supra memoratis, laudandus est confessarius, qui operam suam poenitenti non denegaverit, et vel Ordinarium vel Sanctam Sedem pro opportunis providentiis consuluerit, suppresso tamen poenitentis nomine.

8. Non infrequenter occurrit casus, ut confessarius aliusve ecclesiasticus vir ab Episcopis (quorum utique haec potestas

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

est) deputetur ad denunciationes recipiendas in re ad sollicitationis crimen spectante absque interventu notarii. Huic instructioni folium adiicitur circa modum, quo hisce in casibus confici denunciatio debet.[21]

INSTRUCTIO S. OFFICII (JULY 20, 1890)

Modula Examinis Per Generalia Assumendi

Vigore epistolae Sacrae Supremae Congregationis datae sub die . . . (vel vigore decreti Illustrissimi ac Reverendissimi Domini Archiepiscopi Ordinarii) vocata personaliter comparuit coram Illustrissimo ac Reverendissimo Domino N. N. sistente in Cancellaria (vel in sacrario, aut in collocutorio monialium seu piae domus) in meique etc.

N. N. nubilis (vel uxorata) degens in hac civitate N. N., in paroecia N. N., filia (vel uxor) N. N., aetatis suae . . ., conditionis civilis (aut agricolae, aut famulatui addictae) cui delato iuramento veritatis dicendae, quod praestitit tactis SS. Dei Evangeliis, fuit Quest. An sciat vel imaginetur causam suae vocationis et praesentis examinis? — Ans. . . . Q. A quot annis usa sit accedere ad sacramentum Poenitentiae? — Ans. . . . Q. An semper apud unum eundemque confessarium sacramentum Poenitentiae receperit, vel apud plures sacerdotes: insuper an in una eademque, vel in pluribus ecclesiis? — Ans. . . . Q. An a singulis quibus confessa est sacerdotibus exceperit sanctas admonitiones, et opportuna praecepta, quae ipsam examinatam aedificarent, et a malo arcerent, et quatenus etc.— Ans. . . . Notandum: si responsio fuerit affirmativa, id est si dicat, se bene semper fuisse directam, tunc interrogatur sequenti modo: Q. An sciat vel meminerit aliquando dixisse vel audivisse, quod quidam confessarius non ita sancte et honeste sese gesserit erga poenitentes, quin murmurationes, seu verba contemptibilia contra ipsum confessarium prolata fuerint: ex. gr., quod ipsa examinata, ab uno vel a pluribus poenitentibus, atque ab uno abhinc anno, vel a quattuor aut tribus mensibus similia audierit? — Notandum: Si post hanc interrogationem et animadversionem examinata negare pergat, claudatur actus consueta forma, quae ad calcem huius instructionis prostat. At si quidquam circa aliquem confessarium, iuxta ea de quibus interrogatur, aperuerit, ulterius interrogabitur prout sequitur: Q. Ut exponat nomen,

21 Coll. P. F., n. 1282.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cognomen, officium, aetatem confessarii, et locum seu sedem Confessionis; an sit presbyter saecularis vel Regularis, et quatenus etc.— Ans. . . . Q. Ut exponat seriatim, sincere et clare ea omnia, quae in sacramentali confessione vel antea vel postea vel occasione confessionis audierit a confessario praedicto minus honesta: vel an ab eodem aliquid cum ipsa inhoneste actum fuerit nutibus, tactibus seu opere, et quatenus, etc.— Notandum: hoc loco iudex solerte curabit ut referantur iisdem verbis, quibus confessarius usus fuerit, sermones turpes, seductiones, invitamenta conveniendi in aliquem locum ad malum finem, aliaque omnia, quae crimen sollicitationis constituunt, adhibita vernacula lingua in qua responsiones sedulo et iuxta veritatem exarabuntur; animum addat examinatae, si animadvertat, eam nimio timore aut verecundia a veritate patefacienda praepediri, eidem suadens omnia inviolabili secreto premenda esse. Denique exquiret tempus a quo sollicitationes inceperint, quamdiu perduraverint, quoties repetitae, quibus verbis et actibus malum finem redolentibus expressae fuerint. Cavebit diligenter ab exquirendo consensu ipsius examinatae in sollicitationem, et a quacumque interrogatione, quae desiderium prodat cognoscendi eiusdem peccata.— Q. An sciat vel dici audierit praedictum confessarium alias poenitentes sollicitasse ad turpia; et quatenus eas nominet (atque hic iubebit nomen, cognomen, et saltem indicia clariora, quibus aliae personae sollicitatae detegi possint).— Notandum: Si forte inducantur aliae personae sollicitatae, erit ipsius iudicis eas prudenter advocare, et singillatim examinare iuxta formam superius expositam.— Ans. . . . Q. De fama praedicti confessarii tam apud se quam apud alios? — Ans. . . . Q. An praedicta deposuerit ex iustitiae et veritatis amore, vel potius ex aliquo inimicitiae vel odii effectu, et quatenus, etc.— Ans. . . . Quibus habitis et acceptatis dimissa fuit iurata de silentio servando iterum tactis SS. Dei Evangeliis, eique perlecto suo examine in confirmationem praemissorum se subscripsit (si fuerit illiterata, dicatur) et cum scribere nesciret, fecit signum Crucis. (Subscriptio personae examinatae.)

Acta sunt haec per me N. N., cancellarium vel notarium ad hunc actum assumptum.[22]

22 Ibid., n. 1732.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONFESSIONS MAY BE MADE IN ANY RITE

CAN. 905

Cuivis fideli integrum est confessario legitime approbato etiam alius ritus cui maluerit, peccata sua confiteri.

All the faithful are free to confess their sins to any lawfully approved confessor whom they prefer, even though he belong to another rite.

It has always been the practice of the Church to allow the greatest possible liberty in such a delicate matter, and since the administration of this Sacrament involves no difference of rite, the choice of confessors is perfectly free,[23] and neither the higher nor the lower clergy are empowered to forbid their subjects to go to a confessor of another rite.[24] Neither are priests of the Latin Rite obliged to query penitents of an Oriental rite concerning their belief in such articles of faith as the Roman Pontiff, the processio Spiritus Sancti, the veneration of Saints, consecration in leavened bread, or purgatory, unless the confessor has a well-founded doubt concerning the penitent's orthodoxy.[25] The practice of obliging parishioners to make their paschal confession to their pastor or his substitute has been officially declared intolerable.[26]

23 S. C. P. F., June 2, 1835 (Coll., n. 839).

24 S. C. P. F., Dec. 11, 1838 ad 3^m f. (Coll., n. 879).

25 S. C. P. F., Jan. 22, 1688; April 16, 1862 (Coll., n. 1227).

26 S. C. P. F., Sept. 17, 1792 (Coll., n. 610).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE ANNUAL CONFESSION

CAN. 906.

Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis, idest ad usum rationis, pervenerit, tenetur omnia peccata sua saltem semel in anno confiteri.

All the faithful without distinction of sex, are obliged to confess all their sins once a year as soon as they have reached the age of discretion.

This text is taken from the famous Decretal which entered the eighth canon of the Council of Trent.[27] The duty has also been imposed on the missionary countries of China, India, etc., and missionaries of both the secular and the regular clergy are obliged to insist upon its fulfillment.[28] The obligation commences from the time the child begins to reason, i. e., with us about the seventh year, sooner or later. Parents, confessors, directors or tutors, and pastors are under obligation to see to it that the children comply with this duty.[29]

Does the obligation bind even if no mortal sins have been committed? There is no strict obligation by divine law to confess any but mortal sins, yet the positive law of the Church obliges in this case. An analogy is easily found in the obligation of confession for gaining a plenary indulgence.[30]

Note that whereas Communion is prescribed for the paschal time, there is no period assigned for complying with the duty of annual confession and therefore the 27 C. 12, X, V, 38; Sess. 14, can. 8, c. 5, de poenit.

28 S. O., March 23, 1656; Nov. 13, 1669; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645; Sept. 21, 1840 (Coll., nn. 126, 189, 114, 913).

29 S. C. Sacr., Aug. 8, 1910, nn. I, IV (A. Ap. S., II, 582).

30 Benedict XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 77. It appears to us that if the legislator had no strict obligation in view, he would have added the clause: salvo praescripto can. 902.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google pastor is at liberty to choose for the first confession of the children some other time of the year.

SACRILEGIOUS CONFESSION

CAN. 907.

Praecepto confitendi peccata non satisfacit, qui confessionem facit sacrilegam vel voluntarie nullam.

He who makes a sacrilegious or wilfully invalid confession does not comply with the duty of confessing his sins. The contrary proposition was proscribed by the Holy Office [31] in 1665. One who has made a sacrilegious or voluntarily invalid confession has to go to confession again, worthily and validly, in order to comply with the law of the Church as embodied in can. 906.

31 Cfr. prop. damn., n. 14 (Denzinger n. 985).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER IV

THE PLACE FOR HEARING CONFESSIONS

CAN. 908.

Sacramentalis confessionis proprius locus est ecclesia vel oratorium publicum aut semi-publicum.

The proper place for sacramental confession is the church, or a public or semi-public oratory.

This canon excludes private oratories, yet no rigid exclusion is intended, as is apparent from the text itself, which merely says: proprius locus, the proper place. This is also the intent of the Roman Ritual,[32] as Benedict XIV insinuates.[33] Hence any reasonable cause would justify hearing confession in a private oratory, for instance, if the family wished to prepare for Holy Communion.

CAN. 909

§ 1. Sedes confessionalis ad audiendas mulierum confessiones semper collocetur in loco patenti et conspicuo, et generatim in ecclesia vel oratorio publico aut semi-publico mulieribus destinato.

§2. Sedes confessionalis crate fixa ac tenuiter perforata inter poenitentem et confessarium sit instructa.

CAN. 910

§ 1. Feminarum confessiones extra sedem confessionalem ne audiantur, nisi ex causa infirmitatis aliave

32 Rit. Rom., tit. III, c. 1, de Sacr. Poenit., n. 7.

33 "Magno cum," June 2, 1751, § 20.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verae necessitatis et adhibitis cautelis quas Ordinarius loci opportunas iudicaverit.

§ 2. Confessiones virorum etiam in aedibus privatis excipere licet.

The confessional for hearing women's confessions must always be placed in an open and visible place, generally in the church or public or semi-public oratory assigned to women; it must have an immovable grate with small holes.

Women's confessions should not be heard outside the confessional, except in case of sickness or for other reasons of necessity, and under such precautions as the local Ordinary may deem opportune.

Men's confessions may be heard also in private homes. The assignment of a special place, or chapel, or room for hearing women's confessions is not customary in our country, nor have we seen it in vogue in other countries as a rule. It is different with Sisters, and especially cloistered nuns. These sometimes have special rooms, which are properly designated as confession-rooms, built within the enclosure, or at least in such a way that the nuns remain intra septa, whilst the confessor is outside. Such confession-rooms may be provided also for women who live in convents either as mere inmates or students (conservatori, ritiri). These rooms should serve as confessionals only, and are considered such for the Sisters as well as for the women or young ladies living in the convent.[34] Where no such special confession rooms are assigned for women, they must be heard in the church or oratory, where the confessor and penitent may be seen.

Women are not allowed to enter a convent of re-

[34] S. O., Nov. 25, 1874 (Coll. P. F., n. 1424). If solicitation would take place in such a room, the obligation of denouncing would certainly result.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ligious, where, for instance, only two or three priests dwell. If the chapel or oratory of these Fathers is located in the interior of the house, women may go by the public and direct way into the chapel, but no further, and there make their confessions. If there is no chapel attached to the hospice or residence of the missionaries, the confessional should be put in an open and accessible place, as near as possible to the gate or door. The Ordinary or local superior should assign the place and see to it that the rules are properly observed.[35]

The confessional itself should be furnished, if possible, with an iron grate[36] so fixed that it cannot be moved, and perforated with holes not bigger than the ring finger.[37] That a veil should be placed before it, is not prescribed. But the grate is of obligation everywhere, in all parts of the world. Where there is no stable oratory the women may cover their faces with a veil.[38]

Except in case of sickness, women's confessions shall not be heard outside the confessional. The term sickness includes old age, decrepitude, and deafness.[39] Whenever sick persons are heard outside the usual confessional, the door of the room should be left open, so that the confessor and the penitent can be seen from afar.[40] This may sometimes be impracticable in the case of hard-hearing penitents. For the rest, the precautions to be taken are left to the judgment of the Ordinary.

Here an additional remark may find a place. It con-

35 S. C. P. F., Aug. 26, 1780 (Coll., n. 545).

36 Ibid.

37 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 22, 1645 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 26). This decision prescribes only a stole, but no surplice; and in case of sickness or necessity the regular habit without stole is sufficient.

38 S. C. P. F., March 17, 1785 (Coll., n. 572).

39 S. C. P. F., Sept. 21, 1840 ad 8 (Coll., n. 913).

40 S. C. P. F., April 13, 1807, n. XIII; Feb. 12, 1821 (Coll., nn. 692, 754).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cerns can. 522, which allows female religious to go to any confessor approved by the local Ordinary for hearing women's confessions, and declares such a confession, made in any church or semi-public oratory, to be valid and licit. Does this also apply to the Sisters' own chapel? We answer, yes. Can. 522 speaks of any church or semi-public oratory, and revokes every contrary privilege. Besides, can. 519 should disperse all doubt as to the perfect liberty of religious in matters of conscience. If a religious, even though exempt, may go, in his own house, to any approved confessor, why should that liberty be denied to Sisters in their chapel? The decree of Feb. 3, 1913, cannot be urged against the decree of Aug. 5, 1913.[41]

41 Cfr. A. Ap. S., V, 62, 431. The argument that the Code was prepared while that decree was published has no juridical value.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER V

INDULGENCES

ART. I

GRANT OF INDULGENCES

CAN. 911

Omnes magni faciant indulgentias seu remissionem coram Deo poenae temporalis debitae pro peccatis, ad culpam quod attinet iam deletis, quam ecclesiastica auctoritas ex thesauro Ecclesiae concedit pro vivis per modum absolutionis, pro defunctis per modum suffragii.

An indulgence is a remission before God of temporal punishment due to sins, the guilt of which is already forgiven or wiped out. The source of indulgences is the treasury of the Church. They are granted by the ecclesiastical authority in favor of the living as well as of the dead, but to the former are applied by way of absolution, whilst the latter obtain their benefits only by way of suffrage. Indulgences should, therefore, be highly esteemed by all the faithful.

1. An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishments which remain after the guilt (culpa or reatus) of sin has been taken away, either by sacramental absolution or by an act of perfect contrition.[1] It is a valid absolution, before God, from the punishments which a man

1 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. III, pp. 232 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

would have to expiate, either in this world by voluntary acts of penance, or in purgatory by involuntary suffering. It is, we say, valid before God as well as before the Church, although applied extra-sacramentally.

2. The source and foundation of indulgences is the inexhaustible treasury of the Church,[2] which consists of the sum-total of the superabundant merits of our Lord and His Saints, stored away for the benefit of the living as well as the dead, in as far as they are capable of receiving them.

3. The authority which dispenses these treasures is the Catholic Church, to whom God has entrusted the keys of His kingdom, acting through the Pope and the bishops, who possess the power of the keys.

4. The beneficiaries of this thesaurus are the living faithful and the souls in Purgatory, with this difference that the former are benefited in the form of a remission or grant from the treasury as well as by an act of jurisdiction (per modum absolutionis), whereas the dead can receive the grant of remission only through the intercession of the living (per modum suffragii) because they are, at least directly, beyond the jurisdiction of the Church.

5. Indulgences should be greatly esteemed by all. The reason is partly selfish,— but, then, "charity begins at home"— and partly of an objective doctrinal character, based on history. Self-love teaches us to choose the lesser evil, and indulgences are certainly an easier means of satisfying the justice of God than compulsory expiation. Besides, by making proper use of indulgences, we show our gratitude and esteem for the immense treasury of merits stored up in the Church. This certainly was the intention of all ages, whether we look to the intercession of the martyrs who offered libelli pacis to apostates who wished to be reconciled or whether we accompany public sinners on their pilgrimages, or the crusaders on their journey to the Holy Land. The idea remains the same: forgiveness, not of sins as such, but of the severe punishments meted out in the penitential books and by the ecclesiastical authorities. No doubt the ransom from penance as well as the works prescribed were liable to abuses and misconstruction, but the Church and her approved teachers always sought to enlighten the people and stem the mischief. Abuses attach themselves to the most sacred things. That they were connected with indulgences did not justify Wiclif in saying that "it is foolish to believe in the indulgences granted by the Pope and the bishops." [3]

[2] This notion was first systematically applied by Alexander of Hales (XIIIth cent.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

WHO MAY GRANT INDULGENCES

CAN. 912.

Praeter Romanum Pontificem, cui totius spiritualis Ecclesiae thesauri a Christo Domino commissa est dispensatio, ii tantum possunt potestate ordinaria indulgentias elargiri, quibus id expresse a iure concessum est.

Besides the Roman Pontiff, to whom the stewardship of the whole spiritual treasury of the Church is entrusted by Christ our Lord, only those can by their ordinary power grant indulgences who are expressly authorized to do so by law.

Since the grant of indulgences is an act flowing from jurisdiction, not from the power of order,— because indulgences for the living are given in the form of absolution,— it follows that:

[3] Prop. dam., n. 42 (Denzinger, n. 518).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1°. The Pope may grant indulgences for the whole Church, without any limit as to kind, place, and persons.

2°. Archbishops and bishops[4] may grant indulgences in their respective provinces and dioceses, the former of 100 days, the latter of fifty days. These indulgences are called local because they apply only to the territory over which these prelates have jurisdiction.

3°. Cardinals[5] may grant a two hundred days' indulgence, toties quoties, in any place, (titular church or institution) and to any person under their jurisdiction and protection.[6] Their power also is an ordinary one by law.

Besides these no other prelates by law enjoy the power of granting indulgences. Thus it has been decided that no titular bishop, who is at the same time auxiliary to another bishop, may grant an indulgence of forty days in the diocese in which he is auxiliary.[7]

Apostolic Delegates who have received faculties from the Pope for granting indulgences, should abstain from attaching such to devotional objects or acts of piety which have already been thus enriched by a bishop within his territory.[8]

Bishops and archbishops may attach the indulgence which the law empowers them to grant on the occasion of solemn functions, to images or statues, provided the material is such as prescribed by the Church. These indulgences of 50 or 100 days may be gained by the faithful who recite the prayers prescribed before said statues or images. But these prelates are not allowed to grant more than 50 or 100 days.[9]

4 See can. 274, n. 2; can. 349, § 2, n. 2.

5 Can. 239, § 1, n. 24.

6 If they grant an indulgence of the same number of days outside the place of their jurisdiction or protection, this may be gained only by those present; ibid.

7 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 12, 1878, ad 4 (A. S. S., 11, 153 ff.).

8 Ibid.

9 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 24, 1846;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 913.

Inferiores Romano Pontifice nequeunt:

1.° Facultatem concedendi indulgentias aliis committere, nisi id eis a Sede Apostolica expresse fuerit indultum;

2.° Indulgentias concedere defunctis applicabiles;

3.° Eidem rei seu actui pietatis vel sodalitio, cui iam a Sede Apostolica vel ab alio indulgentiae concessae sint, alias adiungere, nisi novae conditiones adimplendae praescribantur.

Prelates of inferior rank to the Pope:

1°. Cannot impart to others the faculty of granting indulgences, unless they have an express indult to that effect from the Apostolic See;

2°. Cannot grant indulgences applicable to the poor souls;

3°. Cannot attach additional indulgences to an object, or an act of piety, or a confraternity which have already been indulgenced by the Holy See or some other prelate, unless new conditions are prescribed.

The first clause of this canon is intended to prevent abuses. It renders control easier and the sources of abuses more readily discoverable.

No. 2 is based on the view that the supreme dispenser alone may exercise (indirect) power over those who are withdrawn from the proper jurisdiction of the Church.[10]

As to no. 3, two decisions will help to illustrate it.

Feb. 22, 1847 (Prinzivalli, Resolutiones seu Decreta Authentica S. C. Indulg., Romae 1862, nn. 571, 583). The materials permitted are wood, ivory, iron, steel, stone, marble; excluded are lead, zinc, glass, gypsum, paper, pasteboard; cfr. Beringer, Die Ablässe, 10th ed., p. 302.

10 The question whether indulgences for the dead attain their purpose infallibly is controverted (cfr. Pohle-Preuss, l. c., p. 201 f.); but acts of charity will certainly be rewarded.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Titius, a pious citizen of Marseilles, had an image of the Blessed Virgin, which had been enriched with an indulgence of forty days, granted to all who would recite certain prayers before it. As often as a bishop came to the city, Titius asked him to attach forty more days. They did it willingly, but the S. Congregation declared all these indulgences except the forty days granted by the local Ordinary invalid.[11]

The Ordinary may, however, attach additional indulgences to a pious object, such as beads or crosses, or to works of piety, for instance, the support of good literature, or to a sodality, over and above those already granted by the Holy See, provided he prescribes new conditions, e.g., additional prayers or some other good work. The successor may, moreover, grant new indulgences to things or persons indulgenced by his predecessor, under the same condition, viz., that new works or prayers be performed.[12] But no bishop can increase the extent of an indulgence by dividing the same act into different parts, for instance, attaching fifty days to every word of the Hail Mary.[13]

THE PAPAL BLESSING

CAN. 914.

Benedictionem papalem cum indulgentia plenaria, secundum praescriptam formulam, impertiri possunt Episcopi in sua quisque dioecesi bis in anno, hoc est die sollemni Paschatis Resurrectionis et alio die festo sollemni ab ipsis designando, etiamsi iidem Missae sollemni adstiterint tantum; Abbates autem vel Prae-

11 S. C. Indulg., Dec. 17, 1838 (Prinzivalli, l. c., n. 480).

12 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 12, 1878, ad 1 et 3 (A. S. S., 11, 153 f.).

13 Ibid., ad 5 (l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

lati nullius, Vicarii et Praefecti Apostolici, etsi episcopali dignitate careant, id possunt in suis territoriis uno tantum ex sollemnioribus per annum diebus.

CAN. 915.

Regulares, qui privilegium habent impertiendi benedictionem papalem, non solum obligatione tenentur servandi formulam praescriptam, sed hoc privilegio uti nequeunt, nisi in suis ecclesiis et in ecclesiis monialium vel tertiariorum suo Ordini legitime aggregatorum; non autem eodem die et loco quo Episcopus eam impertiat.

Every bishop may impart the papal blessing in his own diocese with a plenary indulgence, according to the formulary prescribed (in the Pontificale Romanum) twice a year: once on the feast of Easter, and once on another day, which they themselves may designate, even though they should only assist at the solemn Mass. The same may be imparted, but only on one of the more solemn feasts of the year, by abbots or prelates nullius, by vicars Apostolic and prefects Apostolic, even though they are not endowed with the episcopal dignity.

Regulars who have the privilege of imparting the papal blessing, are not only obliged to use the formula prescribed, but may use the privilege only in their own churches or in the churches of moniales and tertiaries lawfully aggregated to their order, and are not allowed to give the papal blessing on the same day and in the same place on which the bishop imparts it.

Before the occupation of Rome, in 1870, the popes were wont to bless the people solemnly on Maundy Thursday and Easter (at St. Peter's), on the feast of the Ascension (at the Lateran), and on that of the Assumption (at St.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Maria Maggiore). On these occasions the pope ascended the balcony and solemnly blessed the people gathered on the plaza before the basilica. Sometimes others were delegated to impart this blessing. Regulars obtained a special privilege or indult for this purpose under certain conditions imposed by Benedict XIV and Clement XIII.[14] A Constitution of Clement XIII gave to patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops the faculty of imparting the papal blessing twice a year. Coadjutor bishops have this power (see can. 913) only if they obtained it expressly from the Apostolic See. Clement XIII expressly says: "as long as they rule over their respective churches," from which it is clear that titular bishops who do not actually govern a diocese are not entitled to impart the papal blessing.

The days on which the papal blessing may be imparted are Easter Sunday and some other solemn feast day to be designated by each prelate ad libitum. A solemn feast-day is one of obligation, which is certainly the intention of the grantor, because the blessing is given for the benefit of the people gathered in church on such holy days, as the Constitution of Clement XIII says.

The prescribed formula is that found in the Pontificale Romanum. None other is to be substituted.[15] Even if the people leave, or the custom exists of leaving after the Pontifical Mass, the Apostolic brief must be read in the Latin wording of the Pontificale and in the vernacular.[16] There is no excuse for curtailing this ceremony, for the reading of both texts takes only about three minutes. In 14 "Exempla Praedecessorum," March 29, 1748; "Inexhaustum," Sept. 3, 1762.

15 S. Rit. C., May 23, 1835 (Dec. Auth., n. 2720).

16 S. Rit. C., Dec. 7, 1884 (Dec. Auth., n. 2871). According to a decision of S. C. Indulg., June 30, 1840 (Prinzivalli, n. 501), all that is required for validity is that the indulgence be imparted by papal delegation. The formula see in Pontificale Rom., P. III.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the mean while the people may pray for the Holy Father and the Church.

The S. Congregation has given permission to aged prelates to impart the papal blessing even when they have not themselves pontificated but merely assisted at Mass.[17] This is now the general law, and the privilege is not conditioned upon ill health. But a bishop can not grant this indulgence if he is entirely absent from the solemn Mass.

Inferior Prelates, as mentioned in the second clause of can. 914, are bound by the same conditions as bishops, but are, as the "Inexhaustum" of Clement XIII ruled, allowed to impart the papal blessing only once a year on a feastday.

Can. 915 mentions regulars who have obtained the privilege of imparting the papal blessing. Benedict XIV as well as Clement XIII desired their privileges to remain intact. The term "regulars" must be strictly interpreted, and not taken as synonymous with exempt. Not all regulars have obtained this privilege. We know that, for instance, Benedictine abbots have had to apply for it and obtained it ad decennium.

The regulars who have the privilege must observe the conditions set forth in our text, to wit:

1. They must use the prescribed formula. As there are several formulas, a distinction is necessary.

(a) Benedict XIV ("Exemplis Praedecessorum," March 19, 1748) prescribed a special form of imparting the papal blessing for regulars,[18] which is still to be observed when the blessing is solemnly given. A reasonable doubt arises as to whether this form must be observed by prelates or abbots who pontificate and impart the papal blessing after a pontifical Mass or Vespers. While it is

17 S. Rit. C., Jan. 15, 1847 (Dec. Auth., n. 2925).

18 Cfr. Rituale Rom., tit. VIII, c. 32 (Ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 260 f.),

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

true that Benedict XIV prescribed the above-mentioned formula for all regular orders, "mendicant as well as non-mendicant, monastic as well as clerical," he says in the same Constitution that abbots may bless the people in the churches fully subject to them when they exercise pontifical functions. Hence it appears more reasonable to assume that they should make use of the form prescribed in the Pontificale Romanum, and not of the form prescribed for regulars by Benedict XIV. But this rule must strictly be observed: prelates with the right to pontificals may not use the form of the Pontificale if they do not pontificate themselves, but in that case must employ the form of the Rituale Romanum, as prescribed by Benedict XIV.

(b) When the general absolution, or the papal blessing with plenary indulgence, may be given according to a privilege obtained from the Holy See,[19] there are available two different formulas[20] prescribed by Leo XIII, "Quo universi," July 7, 1882. The first begins with the words, "Ne reminiscaris," the second with, "Intret oratio." The latter, according to some decisions of the S. Congregation of Indulgences, should be applied in all religious congregations with simple vows which are not Tertiaries of a religious order, and all secular Tertiaries, for instance, of the Franciscans and Oblates of St. Benedict. The first-mentioned formula should be applied in all religious orders and such religious congregations with simple vows as are tertiaries of a religious order, for instance, Franciscan and Benedictine Sisters.[21]

2. Regulars may impart the papal blessing in their own

19 O.S.B. may impart it five times a year: on Ash Wednesday and on the four vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, Assumption, and All Saints; S. C. Indulg., Jan. 10, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., 14, 31).

20 Rit Rom., ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 134 f.

21 S. C. Indulg., Dec. 18, 1885; Aug. 18, 1903; Nov. 11, 1903 (A. S. S., 18, 413; 36, 498. We venture to say that it would be more churches, i.e., such as are fully incorporated with the monastery or order; in churches of moniales who are under their jurisdiction, and, finally, in the churches of Tertiaries who are lawfully aggregated to their order. Tertiaries are legitimately aggregated as soon as the superior general has issued the decree of aggregation. (Tertiaries must here be understood of religious in the sense of can. 492, § 1). The papal blessing in the sense of general absolution with plenary indulgence may be imparted by any priest approved for hearing confessions, whether secular or religious, if the regularly appointed priest is absent for any reason.[22] Regular superiors may delegate a priest of their order who has no faculties for hearing confessions to impart the general absolution with plenary indulgence to secular Tertiaries in churches belonging to the regulars.[23] The one who imparts it to Tertiaries may also gain the indulgence,[24] provided, of course, he has complied with the prescribed conditions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The number of times and the occasions on which regulars may impart the solemn papal blessing were determined by Leo XIII. In his "Quo universi," 1882, he permitted regulars to give the blessing twice a year and emphasized that they must abstain from giving the solemn blessing on the same day on which and in the same town or city where, the Ordinary makes use of the same privilege. In eodem loco here means a town or city, not a parish. In a large city there may be many parishes, and if the bishop gives the papal blessing in one of them, the regulars are not allowed to give it in another.[25] conformable to the Code if the first formula would be used by all religious, and the second by all secular Tertiaries, religious sodalities, and confraternities.

22 S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), Dec. 15, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 22).

23 S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), May 28, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 347).

24 See Beringer, l. c., ed 13, p. 338.

25 S. C. Indulg., May 20, 1896; Beringer, l. c., p. 339.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

To complete these comments it may be added that the bishop, too, who imparts the papal blessing gains the indulgence attached to it. Those who take part in the celebration from a window of a house situated on the place where the blessing is given may gain the indulgence attached to the same. But this blessing does not involve absolution from censures or penalties. The same is true of the general absolution.[26]

PRIVILEGED ALTARS

CAN. 916.

Episcopi, Abbates vel praelati nullius, Vicarii ac Praefecti Apostolici et Superiores maiores religionis clericalis exemptae, possunt designare et declarare unum altare privilegiatum quotidianum perpetuum, dummodo aliud non habeatur, in suis ecclesiis cathedralibus, abbatialibus, collegiatis, conventualibus, paroecialibus, quasi-paroecialibus, non autem in oratoriis publicis vel semi-publicis, nisi sint ecclesiae paroeciali unita seu eiusdem subsidiaria.

Bishops, abbots or prelates nullius, Apostolic vicars and prefects, and the major superiors of exempt clerical religious may designate and declare one altar daily privileged forever in their cathedral, abbatial, collegiate, conventual, parochial, and quasi-parochial churches, provided there be no privileged altar in said churches as yet. In public or semi-public oratories, unless they are united to a parish church or serve as its subsidiaries, no privileged altar may be assigned by the prelates mentioned.

No traces of papal concessions of a privileged altar

26 Clement XIII, "Inexhaustum," Sept. 3, 1762. For the papal blessing in articulo mortis see Rit. Rom., tit. V, c. 6 (ed. Pustet, p. 113).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can be found before the end of the XVth century. Severe conditions were set up under Paul V (1605–1621) for obtaining this privilege, which was only given to churches where forty Masses could be celebrated daily. Succeeding popes, especially Benedict XIII and Clement XIII, mitigated this rigor by granting the privilege to all patriarchal, metropolitan, cathedral, collegiate, abbatial and parish churches.[27]

What is a privileged altar and what its purpose? The S. Cong. of Indulgences has declared: "As far as the intention of the grantor and the power of the keys extend, a plenary indulgence must be understood which in itself would be sufficient to forthwith free the soul from the pains of purgatory; but as far as the efficacy of the application is concerned, it is an indulgence the measure of which must be left to the divine mercy and acceptance."[28] In other words: the intention of the Church, which can never be entirely frustrated, is to liberate a determined soul from Purgatory, but whether this is fully achieved, must be left to God. The practical conclusion is that repeated Masses offered upon such an altar guarantee surer acceptance, and repetition is not superfluous.

The prelates who may assign such a privileged altar are: bishops, prelates nullius, Apostolic vicars and prefects, and the major superiors of exempt clerical orders. This classification is explained elsewhere as comprising all prelates who enjoy ordinary jurisdiction.[29] However, the vicar-general is not included, and may therefore not designate a privileged altar; for this privilege, says the 27 "Omnium saluti," Aug. 20, 1724; Decree of May 19, 1759 (Prinzivalli, n. 242).

28 S. C. Indulg., July 28, 1840 (Prinzivalli, n. 502).

29 S. C. Indulg., June 7, 1842 (Prinzivalli, n. 531).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

S. Congregation, is given rather as a personal favor.[30]

The churches in which such privileged altars may be designated are cathedral, abbatial, collegiate, conventual, parish and quasi-parish churches. This is a complete enumeration.

If a cathedral church serves at the same time as a parish church, two privileged altars are not allowed.[31] Hence neither an abbey nor a collegiate church may have two privileged altars, at least by common law. One is the rule. If more are desired, a special indult should be asked for.

The text excludes public and semi-public oratories, except when such an oratory serves as ecclesia filialis of the principal or mother-church and parochial functions, such as funeral services, baptism, administration of the Holy Eucharist, are performed therein. The same rule applies to subsidiary chapels, for instance, during repairs of the parish church, and to chapels which may be called subsidiary in perpetuum on account of the distance from the parish proper; — provided always that parochial functions are held therein.[32] Purely semi-public oratories, such as we have in this country for religious communities, hospitals, or asylums, do not comply with the conditions laid down in our text.

What qualifications an altar must have to be declared privileged, is not determined in our text. We believe that the conditions formerly required still hold good. They are: (1) that the altar be fixed or stable, i.e., irremovable, with an altar stone consecrated though not necessarily irremovable. It is not required that the altar be of marble 30 S. C. Indulg., May 24, 1843 (ibid., n. 553).

31 S. Congr. Indulg., Sept. 18, 1776 (ibid., n. 365).

32 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 30, 1760; Nov. 27, 1764 (Prinzivalli, nn. 246, 257).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or stone. (2) The second condition is that the altar be not portable. The privilege is attached not to the stone, but to the altar, and cannot therefore be transferred by changing the stone.[33]

Can. 917.

§ 1. Die Commemorationis omnium fidelium defunctorum, omnes Missae gaudent privilegio ac si essent ad altare privilegiatum celebratae.

§ 2. Omnia altaria ecclesiae per eos dies quibus in ea peragitur supplicatio Quadraginta Horarum, sunt privilegiata.

On All Souls' Day all Masses enjoy the same privilege as if they were said on a privileged altar. All the altars of a chuch in which the Forty Hours' Devotion is held, are privileged during the days of this devotion.

Concerning the application on All Souls' Day a remark, although theological rather than canonical, may not be amiss. It appears that the Mass on that day can be applied for all the souls in purgatory. Yet it is the constant and common teaching of the Church that the application is made only for one soul, even when the Mass is said for the dead in general.[34] Hence, even if the privilege for a community or confraternity is worded in the plural: "pro animabus presbyterorum, perinde suffragentur, ac si ad altare privilegiatum celebratae fuissent,"[35] the benefit of the indulgence attached to the privileged altar is in fact applied only to one individual soul. Therefore, besides the intention for all the dead, it is 33 Schneider, Rescripta Auth. S. C. Indulg., 1885, n. 405; Beringer, l. c., p. 462 f.

34 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 29, 1864; Dec. 19, 1885 (A. S. S., 18, 340); Beringer, l. c., ed. 13, p. 469 f.

35 S. C. Indulg., July 16, 1765 (Rescripta, n. 228).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

well, though not necessary, to make a special intention for a particular soul.

CAN. 918.

§ 1. Ut indicetur altare esse privilegiatum, nihil aliud inscribatur, nisi: altare privilegiatum, perpetuum vel ad tempus, quotidianum vel non, secundum concessionis verba.

§ 2. Pro Missis celebrandis in altari privilegiato nequit, sub obtentu privilegii, maior exigi Missae eleemosyna.

In order to indicate the fact that an altar is privileged nothing else is required but the inscription: Altare privilegiatum, whether perpetual or for a certain time, daily or not, according to the wording of the grant.

For Masses celebrated on a privileged altar no higher stipend may be charged because of the privilege.

The latter rule was made by the S. Congregation of Indulgences when, in extending the indulgence of the privileged altar to all Masses said on All Souls' Day,[36] it stated that only a synodal or usual stipend may be received. Our Code adds the words: "sub obtentu privilegii," which means that nothing more may be demanded on account of the altar being privileged, because this would be simony. If the privilege is personal, it is lost by asking more; if it is local, the indulgence is not gained.[37]

[36] S. C. Indulg., May 19, 1761 (Prinzivalli, n. 250).

[37] S. C. P. F., Aug. 13, 1774 (Coll., n. 507).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROMULGATION OF INDULGENCES

CAN. 919.

§ 1. Novae indulgentiae, ecclesiis etiam regularium concessae, quae Romae promulgatae non sint, ne pervulgentur, inconsulto ordinario loci.

§ 2. In edendis libris, libellis, etc., quibus concessiones indulgentiarum pro variis precibus aut piis operibus recensentur, servetur praescriptum can. 1388.

CAN. 920.

Qui a Summo Pontifice impetraverint indulgentiarum concessiones pro omnibus fidelibus, obligatione tenentur, sub poena nullitatis gratiae obtentae, authentica exemplaria earundem concessionum ad Sacram Poenitentiariam deferendi.

New indulgences not published at Rome, may not be promulgated without the consent of the local Ordinary. This law is binding also on regulars.

In publishing books, pamphlets, etc., which contain indulgences for various prayers and pious works, can. 1388 must be observed.

Those who have obtained from the Sovereign Pontiff indulgences intended for all the faithful are obliged under penalty of nullification of the favor granted, to send an authentic copy of the same to the Sacred Penitentiary.

In ancient times alms were collected for the crusades and buildings for charitable purposes. The collectors were often entrusted with the preaching or promulgation of indulgences. Abuses of a grievous nature crept in, and greed exploited the most sacred things. The Council of Trent [38] endeavored to remedy these abuses by making

38 Sess. 21, c. 9, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the promulgation of indulgences dependent on the co-operation of the local Ordinaries and two canons. But simpletons — we have no other name for those who hunt up every indulgence and believe every scrap of paper which pretends to convey some extraordinary spiritual favor [39] — are still rampant, and hence the rules of the Code are timely.

New indulgences are those which have not yet been promulgated at Rome, and are therefore not registered in the office of the S. Congregation of Indulgences. Since the establishment of the official Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1909) it is easy to know what indulgences are authentically promulgated.

Indulgences are generally granted in forma gratiosa, and do not therefore, per se, require an executor. However, if the rescript contains a favor destined for the public welfare, such as an indulgence, it must be presented to the Ordinary for recognition. This does not mean that the indulgence could not validly be gained if the Ordinary would fail to recognize it, unless indeed there is attached an invalidating clause to that effect.[40] A pastor, therefore, who receives from Rome an indulgence for his parish, may not publish it before his Ordinary has been informed or advised.[41] Neither may regulars or religious communities promulgate indulgences which they have received without the consent of the local Ordinary. No exemption may be rightfully claimed from this law.[42] The Ordinary is the one in whose diocese the religious 39 See, for instance, the facts reported by Beringer, l. c., p. 118 f.: an indulgence of 80,000 years for one prayer!

40 The invalidity is stated neither by the Council of Trent, nor by the Apostolic See (Beringer, l. c., p. 112), nor by our text.

41 S. O., July 8, 1846, ad 1, (Coll. P. F., n. 1008).

42 Trid., sess. 21, c. 9, de ref.; S. C. C., June 21, 1760 (Richter, Trid., p. 123, n. 3).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

have their house or church and, according to can. 198, § 1, also the vicar-general, the administrator, a prelate nullius, an Apostolic vicar or prefect.

A strict prohibition to publish indulgences formerly bound confraternities,[43] to whom no spiritual favors or indulgences could be communicated without the formal recognition and knowledge of the Ordinary. Now, however, all that is required is that the Ordinary take cognizance of the indulgence — praevia cognitione Ordinarii.[44]

No recognition or cognizance by the Ordinary is required for promulgating indulgences granted by the Pope "Urbi et orbi." To gain these it suffices that the faithful be certain that the grant has been made by the Pontiff.[45] Thus a religious superior, also of a female congregation, or a pastor, upon reading in the Acta Ap. Sedis of an indulgence granted "Urbi et orbi," may apply it at once to his congregation.

Can. 920 embodies a law partly contained in a decree of Benedict XIV, Jan. 19, 1746, recalled to the knowledge of the bishops by Pius X, and finally by the present Pontiff. The respective documents ordain that general concessions of indulgences intended for all the faithful must be submitted to the S. Poenitentiaria. A general indulgence is one that can be gained by all the faithful everywhere and at any time (universis catholici orbis christifidelibus). A particular indulgence is one that can be gained either by belonging to a certain confraternity or by using a specified devotional object, or one granted to a certain person. Thus Pius X was wont to grant to [43] Clement VIII, Dec. 7, 1604, § 7.

[44] S. C. Indulg., Jan. 8, 1861; (Beringer, l. c., p. 539, 551).

[45] S. C. Indulg., July 1, 1839, ad 6 (Prinzivalli, n. 491).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

priests orally the faculty of attaching the toties quoties indulgence to crucifixes. Such particular indulgences or faculties need not be reported to the above-named Sacred Congregation. Neither need indulgences granted to a certain diocese, or confraternity, or order, or religious congregation, if not intended for all the faithful, be referred to Rome. But all general indulgences must be reported. This rule was made to eradicate abuses and scruples which may arise from a publication made without the knowledge of the S. Congregation.[46]

The Code requires that authentic copies of the concessions granted be submitted to the S. C. This means that either the original grant, as issued by Rome, or in case this is impossible or impracticable, an authenticated copy be sent to Rome. Any ecclesiastical notary may make the copy. A photographic reprint would also be considered authentic. The texts of Pius X and Benedict XV only mention documenta exhibenda, but failure to send the document — which Pius X demanded to be done within six months from the date of issuance — would entail invalidity of the indulgence.

To return to can. 919, § 2, the following remarks concerning the publishing of books, pamphlets, or leaflets, or summaries of indulgences, may prove useful. The Code refers to can. 1388, which requires the permission of the local Ordinary, according to the well-known Constitution of Leo XIII, "Officiorum ac munerum," Jan. 25, 1897, n. 17. But § 2 of can. 1388 also requires the express permission of the Holy See for the publication, in any language, of an authentic collection of prayers or good works 46 S. C. Indulg., April 14, 1856 (Prinzivalli, n. 556); Benedict XIV, Jan. 19, 1746; Pius X, "Cum per Apostolicas," April 7, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 225); Benedict XV, "Quandoquidem," Sept. 16, 1915 (A. Ap. S., VII, 457 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to which the Apostolic See has attached indulgences, of a list of Apostolic indulgences, and of a summary of indulgences which have been previously collected but never approved, or are for the first time collected. Hence every new collection or new list (elenchus) or summary of indulgences which has not yet been approved by the S. C. Indulg., needs the express permission of the Holy See[47] and of the Ordinary. If an indulgence, or a list, or summary, or collection of indulgences which have been approved by the S. Congregation, or are taken from an Apostolic brief or rescript, is to be printed or published, the Ordinary may give permission to do so without submitting the same to the S. Congregation, unless a special prohibition has been issued.[48] Religious superiors may have a summary of the indulgences granted to confraternities established by their institute printed and circulated with the approval or visum of the Ordinary.[49]

PLENARY INDULGENCES

CAN. 921.

§ 1. Indulgentia plenaria concessa pro festis Domini Nostri Iesu Christi vel pro festis Beatae Mariae Virginis, intelligitur concessa dumtaxat pro festis quae in calendario universali reperiuntur.

§ 2. Concessa indulgentia plenaria vel partialis pro festis Apostolorum, intelligitur concessa dumtaxat pro eorum festo natali.

§ 3. Indulgentia plenaria concessa ut quotidiana perpetua vel ad tempus visitantibus aliquam ecclesiam vel publicum oratorium ita intelligenda est ut quacun-

47 S. C. Indic., Aug. 7, 1897 (Coll. P. F., n. 1978).

48 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 22, 1858 (Prinzivalli, n. 674).

49 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 8, 1861 (Prinzivalli, n. 689); Beringer, l. c., p. 116.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google que die, sed semel tantum in anno, ab unoquoque fideli acquiri possit, nisi aliud in decreto expresse dicatur.

A plenary indulgence is the remission of the whole debt of temporal punishment due to sin. To gain it fully, one must be free from all affection for sin.

A partial indulgence is the remission of a part of the temporal punishment due to sin, and is gauged by the public penances or penitential canons of the early Church. In this sense a partial indulgence is indeed a remittance of penances imposed by the former penitential discipline and valid before the external forum of the Church, but it would be wrong to imagine that this is its only effect. Even a partial indulgence signifies and effects the remittance of temporal punishments due to sin before God or in the court of conscience. Consequently, an indulgence of seven years means a remission of the temporal punishments which were formerly imposed by the ecclesiastical authority, for instance, seven years of fasting twice a week on bread and water, but as effective of true remission.[50]

Canons 921 sqq. lay down certain rules for the understanding and gaining of indulgences granted for certain feasts, sacred places and objects, as well as with regard to the time of gaining them.

§ 1 of can. 921 says that if a plenary indulgence is granted for the feasts of our Lord or of the Blessed Virgin, it must be understood only of those feasts which are assigned in the general calendar of the Church, to wit: Christmas, the Circumcision (New Year's) the Epiphany, Easter Sunday, the Ascension, and Corpus Christi; or the feasts of the Immaculate Conception, the Purification, the Annunciation, the Nativity and the Assump-

50 Pohle-Preuss, l. c., III, p. 238 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion of the Bl. Virgin Mary.[51] Other feasts mentioned in private calendars, for instance those of religious, are not included in this grant.

§ 2 provides that an indulgence, whether plenary or partial, granted for the feasts of the Apostles, must be understood of the main or spiritual birthday feasts, not of other incidental feasts, therefore not of St. Peter's Chair or Chains, St. Paul's Conversion, etc.[52]

§ 3 declares that if a plenary indulgence is granted as daily forever or for a certain time (quotidiana perpetua vel ad tempus), this means that the faithful who visit the resp. church or public oratory may gain said plenary indulgence on any day,— weekday or Sunday,— but only once a year, unless the wording contains an extending clause. Therefore, if the grantor intends to grant an indulgence for every day, he must explicitly say so.[53]

THE TRANSFER OF FEASTS AND INDULGENCES

CAN. 922.

Indulgentiae adnexae festis vel sacris supplicationibus vel precibus novendialibus, septenariis, triduanis, quae ante aut post festum vel etiam eius octavario perdurante peraguntur, translatae intelliguntur in eum diem, quo festa huiusmodi legitime transferantur, si festum translatum habeat officium cum Missa sine sollemnitate et externa celebratione ac translatio fiat in perpetuum, vel si transferatur sive ad tempus sive in perpetuum sollemnitas et externa celebratio.

To understand this canon it had best be divided into three parts:

51 S. C. Indulg., Sept. 18, 1862.
52 Ibid., Beringer, l. c., p. 105.
53 S. C. Indulg., March 15, 1852 (Prinzivalli, n. 624).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The indulgences here mentioned may be plenary or partial, and are granted for certain feasts, processions, or prayers recited during a certain time, three, seven or nine days. These processions or prayers (novenas, triduums or septenaries) may be performed either before or after the principal feast or during its Octave.

2. If a feast is legitimately transferred to another day, the indulgences, too, may be gained on that day. This is a general rule, established by the decree of Aug. 9, 1852.[54]

3. Here a distinction must be made as to transfer and solemnity: (a) If the feast has its office and Mass — although without solemnity and external celebration — and is transferred to another day in perpetuum, or forever, the indulgences are to be gained only on the day to which the feast is transferred. Thus, for instance, if the feast of a Saint is transferred forever to a day which would not otherwise be his dies natalis, the indulgence granted for his feast is also transferred.[55]

(b) If the feast is transferred as to its solemnity and external celebration, either accidentally, i.e., ad tempus, or forever, in perpetuum, the indulgence can be gained only on the feastday thus transferred.

A feast may be transferred ad tempus on account of a concurring feast. Example: On All Souls' Day a plenary indulgence toties quoties may be gained. However, it may happen that Nov. 2nd falls on a Sunday. In that case the indulgence can be gained on Monday, Nov. 3, because it is attached, not to Nov. 2nd, but to All Souls' Day.[56] Note that only a Sunday may interfere with the celebration of All Souls' Day, which is a first-class festi-

[54] Prinzivalli, n. 627.

[55] S. O., June 13, 1912, ad 1 (A. Ap. S., VI, 624).

[56] S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), Dec. 14, 1916 (A. Ap. S., IX, 179).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

val, and hence all particular feasts proper to certain places, churches, religious orders, and congregations, must make way for All Souls' Day and therefore be transferred to another day.[57]

A feast is transferred in perpetuum generally to a Sunday, for instance, the feast of SS. Peter and Paul, Epiphany (in France), etc. On that day, therefore, the solemnity and external celebration take place as if it were the proper day, even though the office and the Mass have been said on the latter. It may be asked: What does external celebration mean? It means the special prayers, solemn functions, and gathering of the faithful in church, exposition of the Saint's image or picture,[58] etc. The transfer of the indulgences takes place for religious orders or congregations no matter whether the transfer of the feast itself is made for the whole order or only for a province or house by reason of the diocesan or provincial directory.[59] And the members must follow the directory of their respective province. The faithful may gain the indulgences attached to a visit of a church of religious either on the day on which the diocese, or on the day on which the religious themselves celebrate the feast, but not on both.[60]

THE DAY FOR GAINING INDULGENCES

CAN. 923.

Ad lucrandam indulgentiam alicui diei affixam, si visitatio ecclesiae vel oratorii requiratur, haec fieri 57 S. Rit. C., Feb. 28, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 186).

58 Cfr. Ephemerides Liturgicae, 1892, p. 700, which says that it is immaterial whether all these or only parts occur.

59 S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), June 13, 1912, ad 2 (A. Ap. S., IV, 624).

60 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 12, 1878; Beringer, l. c., p. 111.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

potest a meridie diei praecedentis usque ad mediam noctem quae statutum diem claudit.

To gain an indulgence which is attached to a certain day, if visiting a church or oratory is required, the visit may be made from noon of the preceding day until midnight of the day proper. This rule applies to all indulgences, plenary, partial, toties quoties, to such already granted or yet to be granted, no matter how the time or day may be designated.[61] Thus, for instance, the toties quoties indulgence granted for All Souls' Day may be gained from noon, Nov. 1st, to midnight, Nov. 2nd.

LOSS OF LOCAL AND REAL INDULGENCES

CAN. 924.

§ 1. Ad norman can. 75, indulgentiae adnexae alicui ecclesiae non cessant, si ecclesia funditus evertatur rursusque intra quinquaginta annos aedificetur in eodem vel fere eodem loco et sub eodem titulo.

§ 2. Indulgentiae coronis aliisve rebus adnexae tunc tantum cessant, cum coronae aliaeve res prorsus desinant esse vel vendantur.

§1. Indulgences attached to a church are not lost even if the church is entirely destroyed, provided it is rebuilt within the space of fifty years on the same or nearly the same place, and under the same title.

This is according to can. 75. If the new church would be built under the same title, for instance, Holy Rosary, on the same place where the old one stood, or not more than twenty or thirty paces distant therefrom, the indulgence would not be lost.[62] But if the new church, though 61 S. O. (Sect. Indulg.), Jan. 26, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 64).

62 S. C. Indulg., March 29, 1886 (A. S. S., 19, 93f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

under the same title, would be built on the cemetery, the indulgence would be lost.[63] The same title must be attached to the whole building. Therefore it would not be sufficient to retain the indulgence if the new church were built on the same spot, but under a different title, even though a chapel or altar under the old title were erected in the new church.[64]

§ 2. Indulgences attached to rosaries (beads) and other objects are lost only if the beads or objects are destroyed or sold. If blessed crucifixes or crosses perish entirely, the indulgences attached to them are lost, but if only a small portion is destroyed or lost, this part may be renewed without losing the indulgences. If the cross is removed only temporarily, for a special reason, no new blessing is required.[65] If crosses or images of the XIV Stations are removed for a time and replaced, the indulgences are not lost. If the crosses of the XIV Stations, — not the images, which are not necessary for the indulgences,— are entirely destroyed or decayed, the indulgences are lost; if only a small portion is destroyed this may be repaired.[66] It is similar with beads. If the single beads are torn asunder but collected again and put on a new string, the indulgences are not lost, even though four or five new beads would have to be added.[67]

The selling of such articles entails entire loss of the indulgences, no matter whether a profit was made or not.[68] The Code says nothing of giving them away, and therefore we may conclude that, unless the article together with the indulgences is the exclusive property of any one

63 S. C. Indulg., Aug. 9, 1843, ad 2 (Prinzivalli, n. 557).
64 Beringer, l. c., p. 70.
65 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 30, 1839, ad 5 (Prinzivalli, n. 686).
66 S. C. Indulg., Sept. 20, 1839 (ibid., n. 694).
67 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 10, 1839 (ibid., 682).
68 S. C. Indulg., Dec. 14, 1722 (ibid., n. 50).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

person, the indulgences are not lost if the article is given to another.[69]

ARTICLE II

THE GAINING OF INDULGENCES

CAN. 925.

§ 1. Ut quis capax sit sibi lucrandi indulgentias, debet esse baptizatus, non excommunicatus, in statu gratiae saltem in fine operum praescriptorum, subditus concedentis.

§ 2. Ut vero subiectum capax eas revera lucretur, debet habere intentionem saltem generalem eas acquirendi et opera iniuncta implere statuto tempore ac debito modo secundum concessionis tenorem.

To be capable of gaining an indulgence for onself one must be baptized, not excommunicated, in the state of grace at least when he complies with the last work prescribed, and a subject of the grantor. To really gain the indulgences the capable subject must have at least the general intention of gaining them and comply with the conditions prescribed at the time and in the manner prescribed in the grant.

The text distinguishes between the capability of gaining indulgences and the actual gaining of them. The only capable subject is a baptized Catholic who is not excommunicated, for a non-Catholic can hardly be styled subditus concedentis. That the state of grace is necessary appears from the nature of an indulgence as a remission of temporal punishment after the guilt of mortal sin has been wiped out. But the state of grace is required only 69 Somewhat different Beringer, l. c., p. 359, but he wrote before the Code was promulgated.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for the last act to be performed. Benedict XIV says that if one were not in the state of grace when making the visits of the churches prescribed for gaining the jubilee indulgence, but made a worthy confession and communion before he makes the last visit, he would gain the indulgence.[70] Of course, this is only the limit, not an example for imitation.

Another condition is that one must be a subject of the grantor. Therefore a bishop may grant indulgences only to his own diocesans, and a strange bishop could not, even with the consent of the local Ordinary, grant indulgences to one not of his diocese.[71]

For the actual gaining of indulgences the following conditions are required.

(a) One must have at least a general or habitual intention of gaining all indulgences which one may obtain. This lasts until formally revoked. But if Mass is said on a privileged altar, no special intention is required, nor even the general one of gaining the indulgence attached to that altar.[72]

(b) The prescribed works must be performed within the time prescribed, which, as said above, runs from noon to midnight. But if a special hour is stated, this must be observed.[73] Besides, the good works must be performed in the manner prescribed. Thus, as a rule, the prayer "Sacrosanctae" must be recited kneeling; yet if one is legitimately prevented, e.g., by sickness or physical inability, from bending the knees, he may gain the indulgence walking or standing.[74] The indulgences attached to the 70 "Convocatis," Nov. 25, 1749, n. XLVII; "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 75.

71 S. C. Indulg., Dec. 17, 1838 (Prinzivalli, n. 480); Jan. 12, 1878, ad 2 (A. S S., 11, 153 f.).

72 S. C. Indulg., March 12, 1855 (Prinzivalli, n. 661).

73 S. C. Indulg., March 7, 1771, ad 4 (ibid., n. 511).

74 S. C. Indulg., July 5, 1855; Jan. 7, 1856 (ibid., nn. 652, 654).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Rosary and the Hail Mary may be gained by those who recite these prayers alternately.[75] If a member of a confraternity, sodality, or congregation, for reasons of sickness or imprisonment, cannot pay the prescribed visit to a church, he may gain the indulgence if he devoutly performs the other works described.[75] For the rest, the tenor of each rescript must be carefully inspected and its regulations observed.

CAN. 926.

Plenaria indulgentia ita concessa intelligitur ut si quis eam plenarie lucrari non possit, eam tamen partialiter lucretur pro dispositione quam habet.

A plenary indulgence is understood to be granted in such a way that if one cannot gain it in its entirety, one may gain it partially, in proportion to his disposition. See can. 921.

CAN. 927.

Nisi aliud ex concessionis tenore appareat, indulgentias ab Episcopo concessas lucrari possunt tum subditi extra territorium, tum peregrini, vagi omnesque exempti in territorio degentes.

Unless the tenor of the grant sounds differently, indulgences granted by the bishop may be gained by his subjects also when outside their own diocese. Peregrini, vagi, and all who live in a territory may gain the indulgences granted for that territory. This, of course, is to be understood of indulgences that are not merely local; for local indulgences cannot be gained outside the place to which they are attached.

75 S. C. Indulg., March 1, 1820 (ibid., n. 420).

76 S. C. Indulg., Aug. 2, 1760 (ibid., n. 248).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 928.

§ 1. Indulgentia plenaria, nisi aliud expresse cautum sit, acquiri potest semel tantum in die, etsi idem opus praescriptum pluries ponatur.

§ 2. Partialis indulgentia, nisi contrarium expresse notetur, saepius per diem, eodem opere repetito, potest lucrifieri.

Unless the contrary is expressly stated, a plenary indulgence may be gained only once a day, even though the same works are performed several times. But a partial indulgence may be gained as often as the works prescribed are repeated, unless the contrary is expressly stated.

The first clause is taken from a decree of the S. Congregation, which mentions a visit to a church or another good work to which a plenary indulgence is attached. This indulgence, says the decree, may be gained only once a day.[77] Whether several different plenary indulgences may be gained on the same day by performing different works prescribed, although only one confession and communion is made, is another question.[78] Our Code only mentions idem opus, the same work, and hence it would be possible to gain several plenary indulgences on one day.

77 S. C. Indulg., March 7, 1678; Benedict XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 84.

78 Beringer, l. c., ed. 13, p. 107, affirms, and S. C. Indulg., Jan. 12, 1878, ad 3, (Coll. P. P., n. 1486) favors the view.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VISIT OF A SEMI-PUBLIC ORATORY

CAN. 929.

Fideles utriusque sexus qui, perfectionis studio vel institutionis seu educationis aut etiam valetudinis causa in domibus ecclesia vel publico sacello carentibus, de consensu Ordinariorum constitutis, vitam communem agunt, itemque personae omnes ad illis ministrandum ibidem commorantes, quoties ad lucrandas indulgentias praescribatur visitatio alicuius ecclesiae non determinatae, vel indeterminati alicuius publici oratorii, visitare queunt propriae domus sacellum in quo obligationi audiendi Sacrum iure satisfacere possunt, dummodo cetera opera iniuncta rite praestiterint.

Up to the year 1909 practice and the law prescribed a visit to a public oratory, but several indults were granted enabling the inmates of religious institutes and seminaries to gain the indulgence in their own chapels.[79] Out of these indults developed the general grant,[80] given in the year 1909, which has entered our Code. The meaning of can. 929 is that:

(a) All the faithful of both sexes, who lead a life in common, either as religious or as inmates of an institution, a place of study, a hospital, or asylum for the aged or disabled, may gain an indulgence for which the visit of a public oratory is prescribed,

(b) By visiting the semi-public oratory[81] or chapel in the house in which they reside, if this house has no public oratory or church attached, provided the house has been

79 Beringer, l. c., p. 87.

80 S. O., Jan. 14, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I. 210).

81 To visit a church or chapel, if one be physically or morally near it; Beringer, l. c., p. 86 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

established with the consent of the Ordinary and is considered a religious institute.

(c) The same indulgence may be gained in the same way by all who wait on or serve the members of such a house and reside therein,

(d) But this favor can be made use of only if the church or public oratory, the visit of which is prescribed for gaining the indulgence, is not determined or designated. Hence, if the visit of a certain church or oratory, for instance, the parish church, or the church of a religious order, were expressly prescribed, the indulgence could not be gained in the manner described above.

(e) Finally, in order to gain the indulgence in the above-named semi-public oratory, the other works or conditions imposed must be complied with.

We may add that all who are chronically or continually ill or prevented by some other physical obstacle from visiting a church or public oratory, may gain the indulgence by contritely confessing their sins and, instead of receiving Holy Communion and visiting a public oratory, performing some other good works which the confessor may impose on them.[82] This privilege was extended to all sick and aged persons who live in a community and under a rule — therefore also to religious societies which are not religious communities in the strict sense,— and who cannot make the prescribed visit. For these the confessor may prescribe other pious works.[83]

82 S. C. Indulg., Sept. 18, 1862 (Coll. P. F., n. 1231).

83 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 16, 1886 (Coll. P. F., n. 1649).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INDULGENCES APPLICABLE TO THE DEAD

CAN. 930.

Nemo indulgentias acquirens potest eas aliis in vita degentibus applicare; animabus autem in purgatorio detentis indulgentiae omnes a Romano Pontifice concessae, nisi aliud constet, applicabiles sunt.

No one who gains indulgences can apply them to other living persons, but he may apply all indulgences granted by the Roman Pontiff to the poor souls in Purgatory, unless a contrary provision has been made. The first part of this law is clearly intended to remove abuses. It has a dogmatical bearing, because the living gain indulgences by way of absolution, which is a strictly personal affair, whereas the poor souls receive the benefit of indulgences by way of suffrage and are in the state of grace. The text says that all indulgences granted by the Roman Pontiff are applicable to the souls in Purgatory. By decree of Sept. 30, 1852, the S. Congregation had declared that all indulgences contained in the so-called Raccolta could be applied to the poor souls.[84] This application must not be understood as if the living person first gains the indulgence for himself, and then transmits it to the poor souls, but in this sense, that he may gain it either for himself or for the dead.[85]

84 Prinzivalli, n. 628.

85 Beringer, l. c., p. 73. The first genuine document of a papal grant of indulgences applicable to the poor souls is that of Callistus III, 1457; Beringer, p. 51 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONFESSION AND COMMUNION

CAN. 931.

§ 1. Ad quaslibet indulgentias lucrandas confessio forte requisita peragi potest intra octo dies qui immediate praecedunt diem cui indulgentia fuit affixa; communio autem in pervigilio eiusdem diei; utraque vero etiam intra subsequentem totam octavam.

§ 2. Pariter ad lucrandas indulgentias pro piis exercitiis in triduum, hebdomadam, etc., ductis concessas, confessio et communio fieri etiam potest intra octavam quae immediate sequitur exercitium expletum.

§ 3. Christifideles qui solent, nisi legitime impediantur, saltem bis in mense ad poenitentiae sacramentum accedere, aut sanctam communionem in statu gratiae et cum recta piaque mente recipere quotidie, quamvis semel aut iterum per hebdomadam ab eadem abstineant, possunt omnes indulgentias consequi, etiam sine actuali confessione quae ceteroquin ad eas lucrandas necessaria foret, exceptis indulgentiis sive iubilaei ordinarii et extraordinarii sive ad instar iubilaei.

§ 1. If confession is required for gaining an indulgence, it may be made within the eight days immediately preceding the day to which the indulgence is affixed; Communion may be received on the day before the feast; both confession and communion may be received during the entire octave. For instance, one may receive Holy Communion on the feast of All Saints, in order to gain the toties quoties indulgence of All Souls' Day. But if All Souls' should fall on a Monday and All Saints' on a Saturday, Holy Communion would have to be received on Sunday, for this is the day before the feast to which the indulgence is affixed.[86] Confession, if prescribed as a condition for gaining the indulgence, must be made sacramentally within eight days preceding the day to which the indulgence is attached.[87] We mention sacramental confession because this is intended by the legislator as an opus praescriptum.[88] However, if the penitent would have no sins at all, not even venial sins, to confess, or if he would confess a venial sin for which the confessor would think it opportune not to impart absolution, sacramental absolution would not be required for gaining the indulgence.[89]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code adds that both confession and Communion may be made within the octave following the feast day proper. This is a new law, at least we could not find any text corroborating this enactment. It can apply only to feasts which have an octave, and hence we hardly believe that the Portiuncula or All Souls' Day indulgence could be gained by going to confession and Communion during the eight days following Aug. 2nd or Nov. 2nd. Yet we do not state this opinion without misgiving, especially because of § 2, which rules that indulgences granted for pious exercises conducted during a triduum or a week may be gained if the prescribed confession and Communion are made during the octave immediately following the close of these devotions. Of course in that case the visit of the church or attendance at these pious exercises is required during the time these devotions are held. But confession and Communion would then be the last work required for gaining the indulgence.

86 S. C. Indulg., Oct. 6, 1870 (Coll. P. F., n. 1358).

87 S. O. (Sect. Indulg), April 23, 1914 (A. Ap. S., VI, 308).

88 Benedict XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec 3, 1749, § 77.

89 S. C. Indulg., Aug. 20, 1822, ad 2 (Prinzivalli, n. 432).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3 provides that those who are accustomed to go to confession at least twice a month, or to communicate daily in the state of grace and with an upright and holy intention, although they do not receive one or the other time a week, may without confession gain all the indulgences for which confession is prescribed as a necessary condition. From this favor are excluded indulgences of the ordinary and the extraordinary jubilee.[90]

Clement XIII had already granted indulgences to those who go to confession weekly. Pius X extended this privilege to daily or quasi-daily communicants.[91] Therefore in our text two classes are distinguished: (a) Those who go to confession twice a month — which means every two weeks[92] and (b) those who communicate daily or almost daily. For the latter no certain time for confession is prescribed, as they are presumed to be in the "state of grace." Monthly confession would be sufficient. But from this favor are excluded jubilee indulgences, for which the Sovereign Pontiff is entitled to impose confession as a special work.[93]

PRESCRIBED WORKS

CAN. 932.

Opere, cui praestando quis lege aut praecepto obligatur, nequit indulgentia lucrifieri, nisi in eiusdem concessione aliud expresse dicatur; qui tamen praestat

90 An ordinary jubilee is one granted at stated periods. Boniface VIII decreed (c. 1, Extrav. Comm., V, 9) that such a one should be held every 100 years. Later one was celebrated every 33 years, and finally every 25 years, as decided by Paul II in 1470. An extraordinary jubilee is one held on special occasions, e. g., the accession of a pope, or his golden sacerdotal jubilee.

91 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 14, 1906 (Coll. P. F., n. 2228).

92 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 25, 1885 (ibid., n. 1653).

93 Benedict XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 77 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google opus sibi in sacramentalem poenitentiam iniunctum et indulgentiis forte ditatum, potest simul et poenitentiae satisfacere et indulgentias lucrari.

CAN. 933.

Uni eidemque rei vel loco plures ex variis titulis adnecti possunt indulgentiae; sed uno eodemque opere, cui ex variis titulis indulgentiae adnexae sint, non possunt plures acquiri indulgentiae, nisi opus requisitum sit confessio vel communio, aut nisi aliud expresse cautum fuerit.

No indulgence can be gained by performing a good work to which one is obliged by law or precept, unless the grant expressly admits such duplication. Thus fasting in Lent cannot be taken as fasting for gaining an indulgence. A priest cannot comply with the condition of saying certain prayers for gaining an indulgence by reciting the Breviary.[94] But religious may perform the pious devotions which they are wont to perform, not as strict obligation, but in virtue of their constitutions, with the intention of gaining indulgences, which they thus really gain,[95] provided it is not the Breviary or Holy Office which they are bound to recite by common law (can. 610).

Those, however, who perform a good work imposed as a sacramental penance may thereby comply with the penance and gain the indulgence, if said good work be indulgenced.

To one and the same object or place indulgences may be attached on various titles, but by one and the same good work, to which by reason of different titles indul-

94 S. C. Indulg., May 29, 1841, ad 2 (Prinzivalli, n. 511).
95 Beringer, l. c., p. 81.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gences are attached, these various indulgences cannot be gained unless the work prescribed be confession or communion, or unless the rescript read otherwise. Thus if a plenary indulgence is attached to a church by reason of the patronal feast and for the Portiuncula indulgence, all these may be gained by one confession and Communion, unless confession is required for other reasons, i.e., to put one into the state of grace. But the prayers or good works must be repeated for every indulgence.[96]

CAN. 934.

§ 1. Si ad lucrandas indulgentias oratio in genere ad mentem Summi Pontificis praescribatur, mentalis tantum oratio non sufficit; oratio autem vocalis poterit arbitrio fidelium deligi, nisi peculiaris aliqua assignetur.

§ 2. Si peculiaris oratio assignata fuerit, indulgentiae acquiri possunt quocunque idiomate oratio recitetur, dummodo de fidelitate versionis constet ex declaratione vel Sacrae Poenitentiariae vel unius ex Ordinariis loci ubi vulgaris est lingua in quam vertitur oratio; sed indulgentiae penitus cessant ob quamlibet additionem, detractionem, vel interpolationem.

§ 3. Ad indulgentiarum acquisitionem satis est orationem alternis cum socio recitare, aut mente eam prosequi, dum ab alio recitatur.

§ 1. If general prayers for the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff are prescribed for gaining an indulgence, mental prayer is not sufficient; vocal prayers may be chosen ad libitum by the faithful, unless some special oration is prescribed.[97] Mental prayer is praiseworthy, but to gain indulgences, vocal prayers are required, that [96] S. C. Indulg., May 29, 1841; Jan. 12, 1878 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1486 ad 3).

[97] Benedict XIV, "Convocatis," Nov. 25, 1749, § LI.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is to say, the words must be uttered exteriorly, though they need not be audible. How many "Our Fathers" and "Hail Marys" should be recited the S. Congregation refused to decide.[98] Any prayer may be chosen, provided, of course, it be orthodox and approved by the Church. The general intention of the Holy Father is the exaltation of the Church, the propagation of the faith, the uprooting of heresies and schisms, the conversion of sinners, and peace and concord among the nations.

§ 2. If a special prayer is prescribed, the indulgence may be gained by reciting that prayer in any language, provided the accuracy of the translation is assured by a declaration of either the S. Poenitentiaria or the Ordinary of any diocese where the language is spoken. But all indulgences cease if any addition, subtraction or interpolation is made to the required prayers. Concerning the quality of the prayer it may be worth while to add a few remarks on the Officium Parvum B. M. V. A plenary indulgence may be gained by those who recite this office daily for one month; seven years and seven quadragenes (i.e., 490 days of the old fast) for reciting it once a day. Formerly this office had to be said in Latin, but Leo XIII permitted it to be recited, privately, in the vernacular without losing the indulgence.[99]

For the approval of translations the diocesan ordinaries are competent. The text says: unius ex Ordinariis, one of the Ordinaries. Hence if the Ordinary of one diocese in our country approves an English translation of a prayer, it is sufficient for all dioceses where English is [98] S. C. Indulg., May 29, 1841; Sept. 13, 1888 (Coll. P. F., nn. 922, 1693).

[99] S. C. Indulg., April 30, 1852; Dec. 29, 1864; Sept. 13, 1888; Aug. 18, 1903 (Coll. P. F., Vol. II, p. 699).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spoken, even across the sea. The Ordinary is the one in whose diocese the English translation is either printed or published.[1]

The last clause of § 2 speaks of addition, diminution, and interpolation, all of which processes are prohibited under penalty of depriving a prayer of its indulgences. Such an addition, for instance, is the repetition of the mysteries in saying the Holy Rosary.[2] No particular rescript can abolish this general law, unless it be granted after the promulgation of the Code.

§ 3. To gain an indulgence it is enough to recite the prescribed prayer alternately with a companion, or to follow it in one's mind while another recites it. Thus by reciting the Rosary or the Angelus in common or together with others the indulgences may be gained by all who participate in the recitation,[3] and even by those who follow the one who recites the prayers only mentally, not orally.

COMMUTATION OF PIOUS WORKS

CAN. 935

Pia opera ad lucrandas indulgentias iniuncta, confessarii possunt in alia commutare pro iis qui, legitimo detenti impedimento, eadem praestare nequeant.

Pious works imposed for gaining indulgences may be commuted by the confessor into other good works for those who are lawfully prevented from performing the good works prescribed.

1 Can. 1390.

2 There is absolutely no foundation for the assumption that a particular decision or indult given for any diocese or for a particular language, can be transferred to other dioceses and other languages. If no other reason, at least the danger of exposing the faithful to losing the indulgence should stop this practice.

3 S. C. Indulg., 1820, ad 4 (Prinzivalli, n. 420).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Thus, as mentioned above, sick and aged persons who cannot visit a prescribed church may have that requirement changed into some other good work.[4] Christians in China and Siam, who were members of the Confraternity of the Holy Rosary, but unable to recite the beads in common, were permitted to have this work changed into other works of charity and religion.[5] A commutation may be granted by the confessor also outside the confessional,[6] but not beyond the limits set by the papal constitutions or rescripts.[7]

MUTES

CAN. 936

Muti lucrari possunt indulgentias adnexas publicis precibus, si una cum ceteris fidelibus in eodem loco orantibus mentem ac pios sensus ad Deum attollant; et si agatur de privatis orationibus, satis est ut eas mente recolant signisve effundant vel tantummodo oculis percurrant.

Mutes may gain the indulgences attached to the recital of public prayers if together with the other faithful they assist and raise their mind and senses to God; as to private prayers it is sufficient that they recollect them in their mind and follow them either by signs or with their eyes (if they are able to read).

They need not pronounce the prayers or move their lips; nor need they recur to the confessor in each case; the law grants them this facility for gaining indulgences.[8]

4 S. C. Indulg., Jan. 16, 1886, ad 2 (Coll. P. F., n. 1649).

5 S. C. P. F., Sept. 19, 1773 (Coll., n. 499).

6 S. C. P. F., Feb. 20, 1801 (Coll., n. 657).

7 Benedict XIV, "Inter praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 52 f.

8 S. C. Indulg., Feb. 16, 1852; July 18, 1902 (Coll. P. F., n. 2147).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE V

EXTREME UNCTION

CAN. 937

Extremae unction is sacramentum conferri debet per sacras unctiones, adhibito oleo olivarum rite benedicto, et per verba in ritualibus libris ab Ecclesia probatis praescripta.

The Sacrament of Extreme Unction must be administered by the sacred anointments, with duly blessed olive oil, and by pronouncing the words prescribed in the rituals approved by the Church.

This Sacrament, as the Council of Trent[1] defines, was instituted by our Lord and promulgated by St. James the Apostle in his Epistle, which Luther rejected as apocryphal. The remote matter is pure olive oil, to the exclusion of all other oils, such as that made from nuts, sesame, cottonseed. The proximate matter is the act of anointing the body. What parts of the body must be anointed, or how many anointings constitute the essence of the Sacrament, cannot be determined with certainty from the ancient rituals, as they show a great diversity.[2] However, since in case of necessity (can. 947), a single unction is admitted as valid, it would be presumptuous to demand more. Ordinarily, and outside the case of necessity, the separate anointment of the seats of the five 1 Sess. 14, c. 1: can. 1–3, de extrema Unct.

2 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, p. 19; J. Kern, S. J., Tract. de Sacr. Extr. Unct., 1907.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

senses,— sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch,— constitutes the proximate matter of Extreme Unction.[3] The form of the Sacrament consists in the words used at the anointings, as prescribed by the Roman Ritual.[4] [3] Decr. pro Arm. (Denzinger n. 595).

[4] Tit. V, c. 1, n. 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE MINISTER OF EXTREME UNCTION

CAN. 938

§ 1. Hoc sacramentum valide administrat omnis et solus sacerdos.

§ 2. Salvo praescripto can. 397, n. 3, 514, §§ 1–3, minister ordinarius est parochus loci, in quo degit infirmus; in casu autem necessitatis, vel de licentia saltem rationabiliter praesumpta eiusdem parochi vel Ordinarii loci, alius quilibet sacerdos hoc sacramentum ministrare potest.

CAN. 939

Minister ordinarius ex iustitia tenetur hoc sacramentum per se ipse vel per alium administrare, et in casu necessitatis ex caritate quilibet sacerdos.

Every priest, and no one but a priest, may validly administer this sacrament. This follows from James V, 14 f., and was expressly defined by the Council of Trent.[1] Since every priest may validly administer this sacrament, it follows that excommunicated, suspended, interdicted or degraded priests are not excluded, though such, of course, cannot confer it licitly, as it flows from the power of order, not of jurisdiction. And because no one but a priest may confer Extreme Unction, no inferior cleric, though otherwise of the highest rank, can validly admin-

1 Sess. 14, c. 4, de extr. Unct.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

ister it. Not even the Pope could grant this power to a cleric who is not endowed with the priestly character. The singular (sacerdos, priest) must not be understood as if several priests could not administer this sacrament conjointly, as is customary with the Greeks, among whom seven priests together confer this Sacrament. This custom has not been reproved by the Church, but the Greeks are held to believe that one priest is sufficient to administer Extreme Unction validly and licitly.[2]

The ordinary minister of Extreme Unction is the priest of the parish where the sick person resides. In case of necessity, however, any priest may administer this Sacrament.

Since the administration of Extreme Unction is strictly a parochial right, it is by law [3] reserved to the pastor, and assistant priests or curates must have the pastor's permission to exercise it. This permission may be given habitually. Besides, the diocesan statutes or letter of appointment [4] may determine whether assistants have the right. The oeconomus, or temporary administrator, of a parish enjoys full parochial rights and may therefore give permission to administer this Sacrament [5] to another priest. Regulars have been enjoined time and again [6] not to interfere with this right. Secular Tertiaries are not allowed to receive this Sacrament at the hands of the Friars Minor.[7] To canons of cathedral as well as collegiate chapters this Sacrament must be administered by the pastor in whose parish they have their domicile.[8] Ex-

2 Benedict XIV. "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § V, n. III; "Ex quo," March 1, 1756, § 45.

3 See can. 462.

4 Can. 476, § 6.

5 Can. 473; S. C. C., Sept. 12, 1874 (A. S. S., VIII, 129 f.).

6 C. 1, Clem. V, 7; S. C. C., June 7, 1698, etc.; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VIII, 4, 7; IX, 16, 2.

7 S. Rit. C., June 20, 1609 ad 1 (Dec. Auth., n. 271).

8 S. Rit. C., March 17, 1663, ad 4; May 13, Dec. 18, 1756 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1255, 2441).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

empt from these rules is the Ordinary of the diocese, to whom the dignitaries or canons, according to rank and precedence, should administer Extreme Unction.[9] Besides can. 514 must here be applied, as explained elsewhere.[10]

The ordinary minister, says can. 939, is obliged in justice to administer Extreme Unction either himself or by a substitute. In case of necessity every priest is bound by charity to administer this Sacrament. This law was inculcated by Clement XII and Benedict XIV, who exhorted missionaries not to discriminate between rich and poor, as even pagan physicians do not disdain to minister to the lower classes (Pariahs).[11]

That great canonist and Pontiff, Benedict XIV, also discussed the question whether a pastor is obliged to administer Extreme Unction to such as are afflicted with a contagious or epidemic disease. After having quoted several authors, among them Suarez and Silvius, he concludes that sound theology answers in the affirmative, but adds that the pastor may send another priest and that all reasonable precautions should be taken to avoid contagion.[12]

9 Can. 397, n. 3.

10 Cfr. Vol. III, 141 ff., of this Commentary.

11 See the Constit. quoted by Gasparri ad l. c.

12 De Syn Dioec., XIII, 19, 8–10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

THE SUBJECT OF EXTREME UNCTION

CAN. 940

§ 1. Extrema unctio praeberi non potest nisi fideli, qui post adeptum usum rationis ob infirmitatem vel senium in periculo mortis versetur.

§ 2. In eadem infirmitate hoc sacramentum iterari non potest, nisi infirmus post susceptam unctionem convaluerit et in aliud vitae discrimen inciderit.

Extreme Unction may be administered only to faithful Catholics who have reached the age of discretion and are in danger of death on account of sickness or old age. The Sacrament may not be repeated in the same sickness, unless the patient has recovered after receiving Extreme Unction and his condition has again become critical.

The term faithful Catholic includes neophytes, i.e., persons newly baptized, though concerning these, the Holy Office has decided that they may receive the Sacrament only if they are sufficiently instructed to receive it with profit and have the intention of receiving it for the benefit of their souls.[1]

The subject of Exreme Unction must have reached the age of discretion, i.e., about the seventh year. It is the purpose of this Sacrament, as the form, Indulgeat, etc., indicates, to wipe out actual sins committed by the bodily 1 S. O., May 10, 1703 ad 8; April 10, 1801, ad 1; S. C. P. F., Sept. 26, 1821 (Coll., nn. 256, 1213, 708).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

senses, which could not be accomplished in infants.[2] The same rule applies to those who have been insane from childhood,[3] though if the disease was contracted after the age of discretion, Extreme Unction can be administered.

The person to whom Extreme Unction is administered, must be sick or so old that the danger of death is at least very probable. The Greeks were accustomed to administer this Sacrament also to the healthy, but the Church has never tolerated the custom.[4] Those who are not sick, though exposed to probable or certain danger of death (soldiers, condemned criminals, travellers engaged in a dangerous journey, etc.) cannot receive this Sacrament.[5] Neither may women at childbirth, unless some extraordinary and serious illness should accompany the labor pains.[6]

The text says ob senium, including those who are in danger of death on account of old age. Benedict XIV says that people of advanced age die easily, and old age leads to a dissolution of the bodily faculties.[7] But some signs of approaching dissolution, such as fainting or sinking spells, should appear before Extreme Unction is given. Old age is generally held to commence with the sixtieth year, which also frees from the obligation of fasting.

§ 2 forbids repetition of Extreme Unction in the same sickness. Benedict XIV, after an interesting historical investigation, says:[8] If the crisis is passed, but the pa-

2 S. Thom., Com. in. Sent., IV, dist. 23, q. 3, art. 2; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VIII, 6, 1; S. C. Sacr., Aug. 8, 1910, n. VIII (A. Ap. S., II, 583).

3 Benedict XIV, l. c., VIII, 6, 3 f.

4 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § V, n. II.

5 Rit. Rom., tit. V, c. 1, n. 9.

6 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VIII, 5, 1.

7 Ibid., n. 2.

8 Ibid., VIII, 8, 3, where he mentions the fact that the monks of Hirsau used to anoint their sick brethren every three years.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tient has not entirely recovered, and suffers a serious relapse, Extreme Unction may be administered without hesitation. If the pastor is in doubt whether the crisis is a new one, or a continuation of the former, he should incline to repeated administration, because this is more in conformity with the ancient practice of the Church. It is not necessary to await the last stage of danger, or even the critical moment, and consumptives, etc., may be anointed even if there is no immediate danger. This rule applies especially in missionary countries, where priests are not always to be had.[9]

CAN. 941

Quando dubitatur num infirmus usum rationis attigerit, num in periculo mortis reipsa versetur vel num mortuus sit, hoc sacramentum ministretur sub conditione.

When it is doubtful whether the sick person has attained the use of reason — not the age of discretion — or whether he or she is really in danger of death, or already dead, Extreme Unction should be conferred conditionally.

According to high medical authority death sometimes does not occur for an hour or more after a man has drawn his last breath, and hence Extreme Unction may be administered during the interval.

CAN. 942

Hoc sacramentum non est conferendum illis qui impoenitentes in manifesto peccato mortali contumaciter perseverant; quod si hoc dubium fuerit, conferatur sub conditione.

9 S. C. P. F., Feb. 10, 1801 (Coll., n. 651).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This Sacrament may not be administered to those who stubbornly and manifestly live in the state of grievous sin; in case of doubt, however, let it be administered conditionally.

This rule may cause some trouble, especially in the case of Freemasons and persons enrolled in a cremation society. All such persons should be admonished to retract the order they have given to have their bodies cremated. If they refuse, Extreme Unction cannot be administered. When and how the admonition is to be made, is a matter for pastoral prudence; above all, the danger of scandal must be removed.[10]

CAN. 943

Infirmis autem qui, cum suae mentis compotes essent, illud saltem implicite petierunt aut verisimiliter petiissent, etiamsi deinde sensus vel usum rationis amiserint, nihilominus absolute praebeatur.

To those who asked for Extreme Unction at least implicitly or interpretatively whilst in the full possession of their mental faculties, the Sacrament may be administered even though they lose their senses or the use of reason.

This agrees with the advice given to an American bishop who had asked which sacraments may or should be given to consuetudinarii, or recidivi, or such as are utterly careless of their spiritual welfare. The answer was: If they have given signs of repentance, Extreme Unction may be administered.[11] Broadly speaking, it may be said that, unless positive refusal lasting up to the moment of unconsciousness can reasonably be assumed, this Sacrament may be administered.

10 S. O., July 27, 1892, ad 1 (Coll. P. F., n. 1808).

11 S. O., May 9, 1821 (Coll. P. F., n. 757).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 944

Quamvis hoc sacramentum per se non sit de necessitate medii ad salutem, nemini tamen licet illud negligere; et omni studio et diligentia curandum ut infirmi, dum sui plene compotes sunt, illud recipiant.

Although this Sacrament is not absolutely necessary as a means of salvation, yet no one may neglect it; and care and diligence should be taken that the sick receive it while fully conscious.

Although, according to the theologians,[12] it would not be a grievous sin not to receive Extreme Unction, every pastor is under grievous obligation to administer this Sacrament to those who ask for it.[13] Regulars or religious who are missionaries are obliged by a decision of the Holy Office to obey the same law.[14] The Nestorians, and Orientals in general, have been admonished not to be neglectful in the administration of this Sacrament.[15] Bishops should see to it that pastors perform their duty in this regard.[16]

12 Cfr. Noldin, De Sacram., ed. 10, n. 461.

13 S. O., March 23, 1656; S. C. P. F., Sept. 12, 1645 (Coll., nn. 126, 114).

14 S. O., Nov. 13, 1609 (Coll. P. F., n. 189).

15 Benedict XIV, "Ex quo," March 1, 1756, §§ 44, 46; S. C. P. F., July 31, 1902, n. 7 (Coll., n. 2149).

16 Benedict XIV, "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

RITES AND CEREMONIES

OLIVE OIL BLESSED BY THE BISHOP

CAN. 945

Oleum olivarum, in sacramento extremae unctionis adhibendum, debet esse ad hoc benedictum ab Episcopo, vel a presbytero qui facultatem illud benedicendi a Sede Apostolica obtinuerit.

The olive oil to be used in the administration of Extreme Unction must be blessed for that purpose by the bishop or by a priest who has obtained the necessary faculty from the Apostolic See.

Concerning the necessity of using olive oil blessed by a bishop different opinions were held, but it is safe to say that this canon embodies an ancient practice, mentioned by Innocent I as universal in the Western Church.[1] In the Greek Church the priests themselves bless the oil before administering this Sacrament.[2]

CAN. 946

Oleum infirmorum parochus loco nitido et decenter ornato in vase argenteo vel stamneo diligenter custodiat, nec domi retineat nisi ad normam can. 735.

The "oil of the sick" must be preserved in a vessel of silver or white metal (a composition of lead and silver),

1 Innocent I, Ep., ad Decent. Eugub., 25, (Denzinger, n. 60).

2 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § IV, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN and in a neat and properly equipped place; — but it may not be kept at home, except in the case permitted by can. 735 (q.v.).

THE ANOINTINGS

CAN. 947

§ 1. Unctiones verbis, ordine et modo in libris ritualibus praescripto, accurate peragantur; in casu autem necessitatis sufficit unica unctio in uno sensu seu rectius in fronte cum praescripta forma breviore, salva obligatione singulas unctiones supplendi, cessante periculo.

§ 2. Unctio renum semper omittatur.

§ 3. Unctio pedum ex qualibet rationabili causa omitti potest.

§ 4. Extra casum gravis necessitatis, unctiones ipsa ministri manu nulloque adhibito instrumento fiant.

The anointments must be accurately performed, as stated in the Roman Ritual, which prescribes the words, the order and the manner of anointing. In case of necessity one anointment on the forehead with the short formula is sufficient; but the obligation of supplying the other anointments remains when the danger is over. The anointment of the loins is always to be omitted. The anointment of the feet may be omitted for any reasonable cause. Except in case of grave necessity, the anointments must be made by direct touch, without instruments. The Ritual exactly prescribes the manner in which this Sacrament must be conferred. Its prescriptions should be strictly followed. An anointing performed simultaneously by several priests who would divide the sacred function in order to gain time would be valid, but allowed only in case of grave necessity,[3] for which, however, the Code provides more effectively by ordaining that, when there is grave danger, one anointment is sufficient. This must be made on the forehead, with the formula: "Per istam sanctam unctionem indulgeat tibi Dominus quidquid deliquisti. Amen."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A new and welcome regulation is the permission to omit the anointment of the feet for any reasonable motive, which we must leave to pastoral prudence and hygienics to determine.

Concerning the use of an "instrument," e.g., a brush or a piece of cotton (stylus, virgula) or a little stick or twig, this may be allowed in contagious diseases, especially the bubonic plague,[5] but outside such cases of necessity, it is strictly forbidden.[6]

3 Cfr. Anal. Eccl., 1900, Vol. 8, p. 428 f.

4 S. O., April 25, 1906 (Coll. P. F., n. 2233).

5 S. O., July 11, 1754; S. C. P. F., June 21, 1788. (Coll., n. 596).

6 S. Rit. C., May 9, 1857, ad II (Dec. Auth., n. 3051).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VI

HOLY ORDERS

CAN. 948

Ordo ex Christi institutione clericos a laicis in Ecclesia distinguit ad fidelium regimen et cultus divini ministerium.

What was said in Vol. II of this Commentary on the hierarchic distinction between clergy and laity, and the degrees of the hierarchic order, may suffice to illustrate the present canon.[1] It is the hieratic element, the power of order established by Christ himself, which distinguishes the clergy from the laity or ordinary faithful. It is the clergy who govern the faithful and conduct the divine worship. To the clergy is entrusted the government and administration of the mystical and the real body of Christ, whereas the laity cannot validly perform any act of jurisdiction or order.[2] This power is conferred by the Sacrament called Orders. There are various degrees, but conjointly taken, they signify the Sacrament by which a layman is marked with the clerical character, which can never be effaced.

CAN. 949

In canonibus qui sequuntur, nomine ordinum maiorum vel sacrorum intelliguntur presbyteratus, diacon-

1 Vol. II, p. 41 ff.
2 Trid., sess. 23, can. 3, de Sacr. Ord.; cfr. Professio Fidei Waldensibus proposita (Denzinger, n. 370).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

atus, subdiaconatus; minorum vero acolythatus, exorcistatus, lectoratus, ostiariatus.

In the following canons the term higher or sacred orders signifies the priesthood, the diaconate, and the subdiaconate; the term minor orders signifies the offices of acolythe, exorcist, lector and doorkeeper. Here we must again refer to Vol. II.

Subdeaconship, properly speaking, is a major, but cannot strictly be called sacred order because it is not a Sacrament in the true sense of the word.[3]

The episcopate is a Sacrament, but is not enumerated among the higher or sacred orders for the reason that ecclesiastical terminology[4] has drawn a line of distinction between the episcopate, which contains the fullness of the priesthood, and the inferior ranks. Hence the order of the episcopate is marked as an independent and superior dignity or office, a singular institution, for the reason, no doubt, that the bishops are the spiritual fathers of the clergy whom they ordain.

Can. 950

In iure verba: ordinare, ordo, ordinatio, sacra ordinatio, comprehendunt, praeter consecrationem episcopalem, ordines enumeratos in can. 949 et ipsam primam tonsuram, nisi aliud ex natura rei vel ex contextu verborum eruatur.

Though the episcopate stands out prominently, it, too, is conferred by the Sacrament of Holy Orders, and order means a distinct degree of the hierarchic constitution, or of ecclesiastical power in general. In law, therefore, the 3 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, p. 107 f.; c. 11, Dist. 32.

4 C. 4, Dist. 60: "sacros autem ordines dicimus diaconatum et presbyteratum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

terms "ordinare, ordo, ordinatio, sacra ordinatio" comprise not only the orders mentioned in the preceding canon, but also the episcopate and the first tonsure, unless the nature of the thing itself or the context imply a different meaning.

The act by which one receives the episcopate is properly called consecration, but since this act requires the use of the same matter and form which constitute the substance of Holy Orders, it is evident that the general terms: to ordain, ordination, etc., include the episcopal order. The Code does not pretend to solve the controversy concerning the sacramental character of the episcopate or that regarding the essence of the Sacrament — whether it consists in the act of delivering the instruments or in the laying on of the hands, or in both. As to tonsure, we have elsewhere noted that it is not a Sacrament but merely a preparation for Holy Orders.[5]

[5] Cfr. Vol. II, p. 43 f.; Layman, Theol. Moralis, l. V, tr. 9, c. 3, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE MINISTER OF ORDINATION

CAN. 951

Sacrae ordinationis minister ordinarius est Episcopus consecratus; extraordinarius, qui, licet charactere episcopali careat, a iure vel a Sede Apostolica per peculiare indultum potestatem acceperit aliquos ordines conferendi.

The ordinary minister of sacred ordination is every (validly) consecrated bishop, even though he be a schismatic or heretic.

This was defined in the Decree for the Armenians and again by the Council of Trent.[1] However, it must be added that although every validly consecrated bishop may ordain validly, yet he must make use of the proper form in the act of ordination, and have the intention of conferring the power attached to the Sacrament; or rather, let us say, the ordinans must not positively exclude the intention of the Church. From this point of view the Anglican Orders were declared invalid by Leo XIII, in his "Apostolicae curae," of Sept. 13, 1896.[2]

In saying that the bishop is the ordinary minister of the Sacrament of Holy Orders, the Code implicitly admits an extraordinary minister, i.e., one who, though lacking the episcopal character, has obtained the power of ordain-

1 Dec. pro Arm., Denzinger, n. 596; Trid., sess. 23, c. 4; can. 7, de Sac. Ord.

2 See Cath. Encycl., I, 491 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing either by law, or by a special indult of the Apostolic See.

By law the following are extraordinary ministers of sacred ordination:

(a) The Cardinals, who have the privilege of conferring the tonsure and minor orders, provided the promovendus can show a dimissorial letter from his Ordinary. It is, of course, supposed that Cardinals are endowed with the priestly character; and if so, it matters nothing whether they are cardinal bishops, priests or deacons.[3]

(b) Vicars Apostolic and Prefects Apostolic may confer the tonsure and minor orders within their own territory and during their term of office, as per can. 957.

(c) Abbates regiminis may confer the tonsure and minor orders according to can. 964.

By a special indult of the Apostolic See a simple priest may obtain the faculty of bestowing tonsure and minor orders, though not, according to present practice, the subdeaconship or the diaconate.[4] Two things, however, are essential: (1) that the ordinans must be a priest, and (2) that a privilege or indult be obtained. If one who had received minor orders from a simple priest without faculties, were afterwards raised to sacred orders by a bishop, he would have to receive tonsure and minor orders again, but not the higher orders properly conferred by the bishop.[5]

3 Cfr. c. 11, x, I, 14; can. 232, § 1; can. 239, § 1, n. 22.

4 Concerning the Constitution of Innocent VIII, see Pohle-Preuss, l. c., p. 124; Anal. Eccl., 1901, p. 312 ff.

5 Cfr. c. 2, Dist. 68; c. 11, x, I, 14; S. C. Ec. it RR., Dec. 22, 1578 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 218 f).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PROMOTED BY THE POPE

CAN. 952

Nemini licet ordinatum a Romano Pontifice ad altiorem ordinem promovere sine Sedis Apostolicae facultate.

This is a celebrated text. Its original source is a rescript of Innocent III to the bishop of Modena. The facts were these: a cleric who had been ordained subdeacon by the Pope, was to be promoted to the diaconate by the bishop of Bologna, who had received an indult to that effect from Pope Innocent III.

Our canon says: No one ordained by the Roman Pontiff may lawfully be promoted to a higher order without an Apostolic faculty. This rule, however, holds only if the Pope in person, or another prelate by special command of the Pontiff, ordains a clergyman. Consequently, one ordained in Rome by the Cardinal Vicar does not enjoy this distinction.[6] On the other hand, it does not matter what order the Pope conferred, for the text says: "Ordinatum a Romano Pontifice," and this term includes tonsure, according to can. 950. The episcopate also is comprised therein, but this is mentioned especially in can. 953.

MANDATUM DE CONSECRANDO

CAN. 953

Consecratio episcopalis reservatur Romano Pontifici ita ut nulli Episcopo liceat quemquam consecrare in Episcopum, nisi prius constet de pontificio mandato.

6 Benedict XIV, "In postremo," Oct. 20, 1756, § 3 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Episcopal consecration is reserved to the Roman Pontiff, and no bishop is allowed to consecrate anyone unless he is certain of the papal mandate.

Formerly, according to the Decretals,[7] the metropolitan had the right to consecrate suffragan bishops.[8] This right was, however, purely historic and could not prejudice the universal right of the Sovereign Pontiff, who at all times could, without usurpation, restrict or withdraw the faculty of metropolitans with regard to their suffragans. The change was brought about gradually in the form of a mandate. The Pontificale Romanum[9] prescribes that the consecrator must obtain a papal commission in the form of an Apostolic letter, if he resides outside the Curia, or an oral commission by the Roman Pontiff if he is a Cardinal,— we suppose de curia. Benedict XIV modified a former Constitution of Benedict XIII so as to permit the consecrandus to choose as his consecrator any bishop in union with the Holy See if the consecration was to take place outside the City of Rome. In Rome the consecrandus had to choose a cardinal endowed with the episcopal character, or one of the four titular patriarchs. As a reminder of the ancient discipline Benedict XIV ordered that if the metropolitan should chance to be in Rome at the time one of his suffragans was consecrated, the consecration should be performed by him.[10]

The canon then states: "nisi prius constet de pontificio mandato." This mandate, as noted above, is given orally when the consecration is performed in Rome, but if it takes place outside the City, an Apostolic letter is required, which must be in the hands of the consecrator

7 Cc. 11, 32, x. I, 6; cfr. c. 3, Dist. 65.

8 Benedict XIV, l. c., § 15.

9 De consecratione electi in episcopum.

10 "In postremo"; § 16.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

before he is allowed to perform the function. Without such a mandate he acts unlawfully, though validly. It is not sufficient that the letters be expedited in Rome and unofficial notice be sent of the fact.[11] If, however, certain and authentic notice has been received that the letters have been expedited in Rome, the law is complied with.[12] But an official or authentic notice can come only from the Roman Court. Thus any message, sent by the Secretariate of State by telephone, telegraph, or (we presume) wireless, to the effect that the Apostolic letters were expedited, would create a certainty.[13] The mandatum consecrationis may be contained in the letters of promotion in the form of the clause: "ut electus a quocunque maluerit catholico antistite, gratiam et communionem Apostolicae Sedis habente consecrationis munus accipere valeat." When this clause does not occur in the letter of promotion, or when the letter contains a clause to the contrary, a special papal mandate is required for the consecration.[14]

This law is technically perfect, as it has a penal sanction attached to it. Those who bestow or receive consecration without an Apostolic mandate incur suspension ipso facto, which lasts until the Apostolic See expressly dispenses therefrom.[15]

11 Alexander VII, "Alias," Feb. 27, 1660.

12 S. C. P. F., Dec. 30, 1781 (Coll., n. 551).

13 S. O., Aug. 24, 1892; Sec. Status, Dec. 10, 1891 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1810, 1775).

14 Leo XIII, "Trans Oceanum," April 18, 1897 (Coll. P. F., n. 1965, ad 1).

15 Can. 2370.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONSECRATORS

CAN. 954

Episcopus consecrator debet alios duos Episcopos adhibere, qui sibi in consecratione assistant, nisi hac super re a Sede Apostolica dispensatum fuerit.

Pseudo-Isidore has set up a fanciful reason why a bishop should not be consecrated by less than three bishops: — because, he says, James was consecrated bishop of Jerusalem by three Apostles, Peter, James the Elder and John.[16] The real reason for this ancient custom must be sought in the fact that the metropolitans were wont to consecrate their suffragans and the patriarchs the metropolitans, in the presence of the bishops of the same province. And as it was often impossible for all the bishops of a province to meet for the occasion, it grew to be the custom that at least three took part in every consecration.[17] Our canon prescribes that the consecrator shall be assisted by two other bishops, unless an Apostolic dispensation has been granted from this rule. This law does not affect the validity of a consecration,[18] but constitutes a grievous obligation to employ two co-consecrating bishops. Sometimes the Roman Court grants a dispensation permitting the employment of two dignities of the cathedral chapter, or simply two dignities, as assistants.[19] Thus Leo XIII permitted the bishops of Latin America to employ two dignitaries whenever two bishops were not readily available.[20] This indult is still

16 C. 2, Dist. 66.

17 C. 5, Dist. 51; c. 1, Dist. 64; c. 5, Dist. 65; Phillips, K.-R., Vol. I, 1845, p. 362 f.

18 S. C. P. F., May 18, 1695 (Coll., n. 239); somewhat surprising S. Rit. C., Dec. 17, 1642 (Dec. Auth., n. 820): convalidari posse; but Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 13, 7, plainly states the validity.

19 S. Rit. C., July 16, 1605 (Dec. Auth., n. 186).

20 "Trans Oceanum," ad 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in force for that country, as the Code clearly says: "nisi Ap. Sedis dispensaverit." If the two assistants at a consecration are not bishops, they must touch the head of the consecrandus with both hands, and in all other respects, also, carefully observe the prescriptions of the Pontificale Romanum.[21]

THE EPISCOPUS PROPRIUS

CAN. 955

§ 1. Unusquisque a proprio Episcopo ordinetur aut cum legitimis eiusdem litteris dimissoriis.

§ 2. Episcopus proprius, iusta causa non impeditus, per se ipse suos subditos ordinet; sed subditum orientalis ritus, sine apostolico indulto, licite ordinare non potest.

It is a time-honored principle[22] in the Church that no bishop or metropolitan shall trench upon the rights or powers of another bishop or ordinary, especially in regard to the exercise of pontifical rights, such as ordination.[23] Since one becomes incorporated in the Church by Baptism, and Baptism in the first four centuries was conferred on adults by the bishop himself, it was but natural that the spiritual father had the first claim on persons thus regenerated. Baptism constituted the first title for the competency of the bishop, and the synods of Sardica (343) and Antioch (332) strictly forbade bishops to coax laymen or subjects of one diocese or province into another and to ordain them to the clericate, except after having obtained the consent of their proper bishop.[24]

21 S. Rit. C., June 9, 1853 (Dec. Auth., n. 3014).

22 C. 1, Dist. 71 (Conc. Sardic. x.).

23 Trid., sess. 6, c. 5 de ref.

24 Cfr. Dist. 71; Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Discipl. Eccl., P. II, l. 1, c. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

When infant Baptism came into vogue in the 10th century, it became necessary to examine the origin or birth of those who wished to enter the clerical ranks. Those who wished to be ordained in a strange country had to exhibit letters from the bishop of their own country. This practice was formally sanctioned by a decretal of Clement IV, who acknowledged as a further reason for competency benefice, by reason of which that Ordinary was competent who had bestowed a benefice upon the ordinandus.[25] The canonists and legists drew from the Roman law the title of domicile and introduced it into church discipline. Thus the domicile of the ordinand was legalized.[26] Three grounds of competency are therefore discernible in the Decretals: origin, domicile, and benefice. To these the Council of Trent added familiaritas.[27] The Code admits only origin and domicile.

It is almost superfluous to add that, as Clement IV had already decided that the Popė may grant permission to be ordained by any bishop, so he himself may ordain anyone anywhere.

Can. 955 in its § 1, lays down the general rule that everyone should be ordained by his own bishop or at least with dimissorial letters from the latter. These letters are nothing else but the (written) consent of the bishop permitting one of his subjects to be ordained by another bishop. The text plainly refers to the old practice and to the Council of Trent,[28] which complained that bishops in partibus infidelium had, like mercenaries, invaded the dioceses of others and ordained clerics indiscriminately without letters of recommendation. The result was that unfit and unworthy persons, nay even such as had been formally rejected by their own bishops,

25 C. 1, 6°, I, 9.
26 C. 3, 6°, I, 9.
27 Sess. 23, c. 9, de ref.
28 Sess. 14, c. 2, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

were ordained. Therefore the Council required that no titular bishops should dare to ordain another bishop's subjects without his consent.

This prohibition was extended to all bishops in regard to those not subject to them.[29]

Dimissorial letters are required also for conferring the tonsure.[30] Vicars Apostolic are not exempt from this law.[31] One decision of the S. Congregation declares that patriarchs should not impede the exercise of the jurisdiction of their suffragans with regard to ordination.[32] From this it may be easily deduced that metropolitans are not entitled to interfere in this matter. Concerning the form of these letters, see can. 960.

§ 2 rules that the episcopus proprius, unless prevented by a just reason, should himself ordain his subjects, and that no bishop of the Latin rite may ordain a subject of an oriental Rite lawfully without an Apostolic indult.

The Council of Trent and a Constitution of Innocent XIII mention only one reason (sickness) which would justify the ordinarius proprius in not ordaining his own subjects.[33] Our Code, however, is more liberal, as it admits any iusta causa. Hence any lawful impediment, but not mere convenience or indolence, would justify an ordinary in granting dimissorial letters.

The second clause forbids Latin bishops to ordain any one belonging to an Oriental rite without an Apostolic indult.[34] The text mentions only Oriental rites. Are 29 Sess. 23, cc. 3, 8, de ref.

30 C. 4, 6°, I, 9; Innocent XII, "Speculatores," Nov. 4, 1692, § 2; S. C. EE. et RR., April 8, 1859 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 662 ff).

31 S. C. P. F., April 5, 1674; Jan. 17, 1793 (Coll., nn. 207, 615).

32 S. C. P. F., May 14, 1838 (Coll., n. 866).

33 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 3, de ref.; Innocent XIII, "Apostolici ministerii," Sept. 23, 1724, § 14.

34 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VII, n. I, XVI, XXII; § IX, nn. XI, XIII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Oriental bishops [35] allowed to ordain subjects of the Latin Rite? We hardly believe that this is the intention of the legislator, because he evidently wishes to prevent confusion and a mixing of rites.[36] Why, then, does the Code not include the Oriental bishops in this prohibition? Because it does not legislate for the Oriental, but for the Latin Church only.

What about the Ruthenians of the U. S. and Canada? The documents [37] relating to this subject contain no special regulation with regard to ordination. Hence the common law, as formerly and now understood, must be followed.

It is certain that Ruthenians who are neither baptized in, nor live according to their particular rite may not be considered as subject to the same, but are subject to the diocesan bishop of the Latin Rite. No layman of the Latin Rite, born of Latin parents, may transfer himself to, or be ordained in, the Oriental Rite. If a Ruthenian, however, although not baptized in the Ruthenian Rite, should wish to enter a Ruthenian seminary, we believe he may be admitted without an Apostolic dispensation. He would become a subject of the Ruthenian bishop, and no bishop of the Latin Rite could ordain him without an Apostolic indult.

CAN. 956

Episcopus proprius, quod attinet ad ordinationem saecularium, est tantum Episcopus dioecesis in qua promovendus habeat domicilium una cum origine aut

35 The Maronite and the Melchite Patriarchs of Antioch may grant dimissorials to their subjects to be ordained by a Latin bishop or a bishop of another Oriental Rite; Conc. Montis Libani (Coll. Lac., II, 240, 256).

36 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," § VII, n. XX.

37 See Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 51, pp. 580 ff., 710 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google simplex domicilium sine origine; sed in hoc altero casu promovendus debet animum in dioecesi perpetuo manendi iureiurando firmare, nisi agatur de promovendo ad ordines clerico qui dioecesi per primam tonsuram iam incardinatus est, vel de promovendo alumno, qui servitio alius dioecesis destinatur ad normam can. 969, § 2, vel de promovendo religioso professo.

The bishop competent to ordain secular priests is the one in whose diocese the ordinand (1) was born and has his domicile, or (2) has only a domicile, though not born there. In the latter case he must make oath as to his intention of remaining permanently in the diocese. Exceptions will be explained further down.

This canon embodies new legislation. The new elements are: neither pure origin nor mere domicile are titles per se sufficient, and benefice and familiar service are no longer considered.

1. Origin and domicile.

(a) Origin here signifies birthplace, or the diocese in which one was born.[38] The mere fact that one was born in a certain place, however, for instance, at a summer resort, hardly suffices to call that place his place of origin. One's birthplace, properly, is the natural and common domicile of one's parents, or, the place of their habitual residence. It is no longer necessary to distinguish between accidental and natural nativity,[39] if the domicile or quasi-domicile or permanent residence of the parents is certain.[40] This rule is doubtless better adapted to present conditions, as the population, especially of cities, is in a constant flux.

As to illegitimate or posthumous children, also of con-

38 C. 3, 6°, I, 9: "oriundus."

39 Cfr. Many, De Sacra Ordinatione, Paris, 1905, p. 84 ff.

40 See can. 90, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verts, their locus originis follows the domicile or quasi-domicile of the mother; that of vagi and expositi is the place where they were actually born.[41]

(b) Domicile must here be understood of the true, not the quasi-domicile of the ordinand, for the clause concerning the oath excludes any other residence. But a diocesan domicile would certainly be sufficient in this case, because the Decretals[42] as well as the spirit of the law refer that domicile to the local or diocesan bishop. The same rule must be applied to the domicile or quasi-domicile of the parents of the ordinand.

The question may arise, whether one may have two domiciles in different dioceses, for instance, a summer and a winter domicile. The answer is, Yes, as the nature of domicile permits it. In such cases the bishops of both dioceses are competent to ordain and the choice is left to the ordinand.[43]

2. Domicile alone, without regard to origin, establishes the title of competency if the ordinand makes oath that he intends to remain permanently in the diocese whose bishop is to ordain him. This ruling goes back to Innocent XII.[44] The oath here prescribed may be made into the hands of the bishop himself, or of his delegate, or of the rector of a college or some other priest.

3. This oath is not required in three cases: (a) when the cleric to be ordained has already been incardinated in the diocese by the first tonsure; (b) when he is to be ordained ad titulum servitii ecclesiae; (c) when he is a religious with simple perpetual vows. The reason for a lies in the fact that incardination must be perpetual and absolute, and given with the required testimonials.[45]

41 Ibid.
42 Cc. 1, 3, 6°' I, 9.
43 Many l. c., p. 97 f.
44 "Speculatores," x. § 5.
45 S. C. C., July 20, 1898 (Coll. P. F., n. 2011).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The reason for b must be sought in the oath which is required for being ordained on that title. And c is explained in can. 585, which says that by taking perpetual vows one loses membership in his own diocese.

The episcopus proprius of such as have no domicile is the Ordinary in whose diocese the ordination takes place, provided the ordinand first acquires the domicile by taking oath according to can. 956. (Irish Eccl. Record, 1919, XIV, 330). These are the only reasons by which the competency of the bishop is now determined, neither beneficium nor familiaritas being admitted.

VICARS AND PREFECTS APOSTOLIC, PRELATES NULLIUS

CAN. 957

§ 1. Vicarius ac Praefectus Apostolicus, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, si charactere episcopali polleant, Episcopo dioecesano aequiparantur quod pertinet ad ordinationem.

§ 2. Si episcopali charactere careant, possunt nihilominus in proprio territorio et durante tantum munere, conferre primam tonsuram et ordines minores tum propriis subditis saecularibus ad normam can. 956, tum aliis qui litteras dimissorias iure requisitas exhibeant; ordinatio extra hos fines ab eisdem peracta irrita est.

§ 1. Apostolic Vicars and Prefects as well as abbots and prelates nullius, if endowed with the episcopal character, are equal to diocesan bishops in matters of ordination.

§ 2. If they do not possess the episcopal character, they are nevertheless entitled to confer, within the boundaries of their district and whilst their office lasts, tonsure and minor orders on their own secular subjects, according to can. 956, and also on others who are provided with dimissorial letters as required by law. If they overstep the limits here drawn, any ordination performed by them is invalid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is a decidedly new and opportune law, which changes the discipline established by the Council of Trent.[46] Formerly the episcopus vicinior could confer orders on, or grant dismissorial letters to the secular subjects of a prelate nullius. The Vicar Apostolic could indeed confer orders on such as had the dimissorial letters from their ordinaries,[47] but this was no right, but merely a privilege granted for missionary countries only. Now the prelates mentioned, if they are consecrated bishops, may confer orders on all their subjects, secular as well as religious, though on the latter, if they are exempt, only upon receiving dimissorial letters from their superior. In ordaining seculars, however, these prelates are bound to observe can. 956, which defines competency. If these prelates are not consecrated bishops, they may confer tonsure and minor orders, (a) upon all their secular subjects, (b) upon others, religious as well as secular, who exhibit dimissorial letters either from the religious superiors or from the ordinaries of other dioceses or districts; but (c) only on condition that they adhere strictly to the limitations stated in this canon under penalty of nullity.

What are these limitations? There is no doubt as to the territory and duration of the term of office. Vicars Apostolic, Prefects Apostolic, and prelates nullius, who are not consecrated bishops, can validly confer tonsure and minor orders only within their own district and as long as their office lasts. But a doubt may arise

[46] Trid., Sess. 23, c. 10; Sess. 24, c. 9 de ref.

[47] Can. 964, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google concerning the litterae dimissoriales required by law:— are they an essential condition for valid ordination of the "others" (alii)? If these letters affect the validity of ordination, the aforesaid prelates cannot validly ordain a subject of another ordinary before they have received these letters. The sources [48] which Card. Gasparri quotes for can. 957, § 2 do not fully answer the question, either negatively or affirmatively, because they do not expressly mention the validity or invalidity of the ordination performed by prelates before having received the litterae dimissoriales. Still we believe that the mind of the legislator is to invalidate an ordination thus performed. The same clause recurs in can. 964, n. 2, where the validity of the tonsure and minor orders conferred by a governing abbot is made dependent on three conditions, although the contrary opinion prevailed at the Roman Court at the time of Benedict XIV. Besides, the dumtaxat of the S. C. P. F. is a rather strong indication that invalidity was intended.[49] Of course, the legislator who confers power can make the exercise thereof dependent on the fulfillment of certain conditions, especially since tonsure and minor orders are not a Sacrament in the proper sense.

CAN. 958

§ 1. Litteras dimissorias pro saecularibus dare possunt, quandiu iurisdictionem in territorio retinent;

1°. Episcopus proprius, postquam possessionem suae dioecesis legitime ceperit ad normam can. 334, § 3, licet nondum consecratus;

2°. Vicarius Generalis, ex speciali tamen Episcopi mandato;

48 C. 3, 6°, V, 7: "nec licitum esse abbatibus."

49 S. C. P. F., April 5, 1674, ad 1 (Coll., n. 207).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3°. De Capituli consensu Vicarius Capitularis post annum a sede vacante; intra annum vero solis arctatis ratione beneficii recepti vel recipiendi, aut ratione certi alicuius officii, cui propter necessitatem dioecesis sine dilatione sit providendum;

4.° Vicarius ac Praefectus Apostolicus, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, licet episcopali charactere careant, etiam ad ordines maiores.

§ 2. Vicarius Capitularis litteras dimissorias ne concedat iis qui ab Episcopo reiecti fuerunt.

§ 1. The following may, as long as they retain jurisdiction in their respective territory, grant litterae dimissoriae to their secular subjects:

1.° The Episcopus proprius, even though not yet consecrated, after having taken lawful possession of his diocese, i.e., as soon as he himself or his proxy has exhibited the Apostolic letters of appointment to the diocesan chapter, or the diocesan consultors assembled in corpore, in the presence of the secretary of the chapter or the diocesan chancellor.[50]

2.° The Vicar General, but only by special command of or commission from the bishop. This command or commission may be given orally or in writing, either for one case or for several cases, during the bishop's absence, for instance, or sickness.

3.° The Vicar Capitular (our administrator) with the consent (not merely advice) of the Chapter (or the diocesan consultors) after the vacancy of the episcopal see has lasted one year. Within the first year of vacancy the Vicar Capitular may grant dimissorial letters only to arctati,[51] i.e., such as have already received, or will re-

50 Can. 334, § 3. The metropolitan may give these letters before having received the pallium, although he may not ordain to sacred orders before having received it.

51 Cc. 1–4, 6°, I, 9; Trid., Sess. 7, c. 10, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceive, within that year an ecclesiastical benefice (for instance, a canonicate) which requires ordination. Arctati are also called those who have received or are about to receive an office which, on account of the needs of the diocese, must be filled immediately. This may occur even now, especially after the late world war, in countries where there is a great want of priests or chaplains.[52] If the government — provided this right has been granted to it by the Holy See — has appointed a chaplain or nominated a pastor who is not yet a priest, the Vicar Capitular may give him the dimissoriae. The same is true if the deceased bishop has appointed one to an office requiring the priesthood.

4.° Vicars Apostolic, Prefects Apostolic, and Abbots or prelates nullius, even though they are not consecrated bishops, may now also grant dimissorial letters for sacred orders. This is but the logical consequence of can. 957. Formerly[53] prelates nullius could not grant dimissorial letters even for tonsure and minor orders, this right being reserved to the episcopus vicinior.

§ 2. The Vicar Capitular shall not grant dimissorial letters to such as were rejected by the deceased bishop. This enactment is similar to that of can. 44 concerning rescripts. The object is to protect the authority of the bishop and the unity of government, as well as to keep undesirable candidates out of the sanctuary.

Can. 959

Qui potest litteras dimissorias ad ordines recipiendos dare, potest quoque eosdem ordines conferre per se ipse, si necessariam ordinis potestatem habeat.

52 France, for instance, before the war, was short about 3,000 priests.

53 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 9, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Whoever is entitled to grant dimissorial letters for receiving orders may confer the same orders himself, provided he possesses the necessary power of order. Notice the subordination of the right of conferring orders to that of issuing dimissorial letters. We are allowed to invert the order: whoever may confer orders, may also grant dimissoriae. The granting of dimissoriae supposes the power of jurisdiction, but the conferring of orders supposes the power of orders for valid administration and jurisdiction for licit conferring, nay even for valid ordination, as far as inferior prelates are concerned. Hence it is that inferior prelates who lack the episcopal character are strictly limited to their territory and tenure of office, and must obtain dimissoriae if they wish to confer tonsure and minor orders on any subject not their own.

CAN. 960

§ 1. Litterae dimissoriae ne concedantur, nisi habitis antea omnibus testimoniis, quae iure exiguntur ad normam can. 993–1000.

§ 2. Si post datas ab Ordinario litteras dimissorias nova testimonia necessaria sint ad normam can. 994, § 3, Episcopus alienus ne ordinet, antequam eadem receperit.

§ 3. Quod si promovendus tempus sufficiens ad contrahendum impedimentum ad normam mem. can. 994 transegerit in ipsa dioecesi Episcopi ordinantis, hic testimonia directe colligat.

§ 1. Dimissorial letters shall not be granted before all the testimonial letters required by law have been received, according to can. 993–1000. Note that, although the text mentions dimissorial letters, yet since the term signifies nothing else but permission given by a bishop to one of his subjects to have himself ordained by another bishop, it is evident that such consent may be given orally. Thus, for instance, if the "other" bishop should be present in the cathedral city, he may be asked by the episcopus proprius or the Vicar Capitular to confer orders. However, in order to avert fraud and procure greater certainty it is always safer to give the dimissoriae in writing.[54]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If new testimonials are necessary after the dimissorial letters have been issued by the Ordinary, the other bishop shall not ordain the candidate before he has received them.

§ 3. If the candidate has lived in the diocese of the ordaining bishop long enough to contract a canonical impediment, the ordaining bishop shall himself gather the necessary informations. New testimonial letters are required if a candidate has lived in the same territory for six or three months after the first testimonials were issued and ordination has not yet taken place; for six or three months suffice to contract a canonical impediment. According to § 3, this residence may be taken up in the diocese whose bishop is to ordain the candidate provided with dimissorials from his own bishop. For instance, a candidate for ordination belonging to the diocese of St. Joseph, Missouri, has been a soldier in Camp Dodge, Iowa, for four months. The bishop of Des Moines, in whose diocese Camp Dodge is located, must gather the necessary information about his fitness, directe, i.e., personally and from reliable sources. The fundamental signification of directe is reliability. Some elucidation of this point is afforded by the decree "Redeuntibus," Oct. 25, 1918, concerning clerics who have returned from [54] Trid., Sess. 14, c. 2, de ref.: "expresso consensu aut litteris dimissoriis"; cfr. Many, l. c., p. 163.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

military service.[55] Chapt. II of this decree reads: The Ordinaries of the places where clerics and seminarians have done service for a considerable time, i.e., at least three months, are called upon most urgently to give all the necessary information to the ordinaries of said clerics and seminarians, but the latter ordinaries should supply this information by others gained from other sources and persons, and finally by a personal examination of the candidates. These, when duly asked by their bishops as to their conduct, are obliged to answer truthfully. Directe, however, in our canon, does not exclude the assumption that the Ordinary who wishes to ordain a candidate provided with dimissorial letters may conduct the inquiry through intermediary persons of ecclesiastical rank, for instance, the Vicar-General, or deans, or the diocesan chancellor. But it certainly requires that the bishop should examine the information carefully and, if necessary, summon the candidate before him for personal examination.

RECIPIENTS OF DIMISSORIAL LETTERS

CAN. 961

Litterae dimissoriae mitti possunt ab Episcopo proprio, etiam Cardinali Episcopo suburbicario, ad quemlibet Episcopum, communionem cum Sede Apostolica habentem, excepto tantum, citra apostolicum indultum, Episcopo ritus diversi a ritu promovendi.

CAN. 962

Quilibet Episcopus, acceptis legitimis litteris dimissoriis, alienum subditum licite ordinat, dummodo ipse

[55] A. Ap. S., Vol. X, 482 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

de germana litterarum fide dubitare nullatenus possit, salvo praescripto can. 994, § 3.

CAN. 963

Litterae dimissoriae possunt ab ipso concedente vel ab eius successore limitari aut revocari, sed semel concessae non exstinguuntur resoluto iure dantis.

The first of these three canons repeats the old rule that any bishop in communion with the Holy See may accept dimissorial letters from the episcopus proprius or a suburbicarian cardinal bishop, but not from a bishop of a different rite. It is generally understood that the litterae dimissoriales are granted in favor of the ordinand, not of the ordaining bishop.[56] The privilege is now extended to the six suburbicarian cardinal bishops, who formerly could grant dimissorial letters only to the Cardinal Vicar of Rome.[57] The exception is made manifestly in order to avoid confusion of rites; but litterae dimissoriae may be sent to a bishop of a different rite if an Apostolic indult has been obtained for the purpose.[58]

Can. 962 permits every bishop (in communion with the Holy See), upon having received the lawful dimissorials, to ordain a candidate not subject to his jurisdiction, provided he has no reason to doubt the genuineness of the letters, and provided also he observe the ruling of can. 994, § 3, concerning additional testimonials. Authenticity is beyond doubt if the signature and seal of the issuing bishop are attached to the documents, though forgery is never absolutely excluded.

Can. 963 rules that the dimissorial letters may be

56 Many, l. c., p. 163.

57 Alexander VII, "Apostolica sollicitudo," Aug. 7, 1662, § 2.

58 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," granted an indult to the Calabrian bishops.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google limited or revoked either by the grantor himself or by his successor, but do not expire, even if the grantor should lose his power.

A limitation may be made concerning the bishop, who may be personally designated in the letter, or concerning the time, which may be restricted to three or four months. There may also be limitation regarding examination (cfr. can. 997). Thus the letters may be worded: "If he is found fit after examination." If this is a real condition, clearly expressed as such in the letter, the dimissorial would become null if the candidate failed to pass the examination.

Revocation must be duly intimated either to the candidate to whom the letters were given, or to the bishop to whom they were addressed.

The last clause of canon 963 enacts that the dimissorials remain in force, even if the grantor loses the right of issuing them after they are issued. The reason is that dimissorial letters contain a favor, and every favor is valid a die datae.[59] Thus if a sick bishop had signed the litterae dimissoriae, and the candidate could not be ordained until after the bishop's death, the letters would be valid. Thus also, if the Vicar Capitular, according to can. 958, § 1, n. 3, had issued litterae dimissoriae, and the new bishop would take possession of the diocese in the meanwhile, the letters of the Vicar Capitular would remain effective. Lastly, not even a penal privation of office or a censure can render invalid dimissorial letters previously granted.

59 S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 21, 1600. (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 232; Reg. iuris 16 in. 6°).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

RIGHTS OF RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS

CAN. 964

Quod attinet ad ordinationem religiosorum:

1°. Abbas regularis de regimine, etsi sine territorio nullius, potest conferre primam tonsuram et ordines minores, dummodo promovendus sit ipsi subditus vi professionis saltem simplicis, ipse vero sit presbyter et benedictionem abbatialem legitime acceperit. Extra hos fines, ordinatio, ab eodem collata, revocato quolibet contrario privilegio, est irrita, nisi ordinans charactere episcopali polleat;

2°. Religiosi exempti a nullo Episcopo ordinari licite possunt sine litteris dimissoriis proprii Superioris maioris;

3°. Superiores professis votorum simplicium, de quibus in can. 574, litteras dimissorias concedere possunt dumtaxat ad primam tonsuram et ordines minores;

4°. Ordinatio ceterorum omnium alumnorum cuiusvis religionis regitur iure saecularium, revocato quolibet indulto Superioribus concesso dandi professis a votis temporariis litteras dimissorias ad ordines maiores.

As to the ordination of religious:

1.° A governing abbot of regulars, even though he be not an abbot nullius, may confer tonsure and minor orders on such as are subject to him by virtue of at least simple profession, provided the Abbot himself be a priest and have lawfully received the abbatial blessing. Outside these limits ordination is invalid unless the abbot possesses episcopal character, and all contrary privileges are hereby revoked.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon ends the controversy [60] concerning the validity of ordinations performed by an abbot, either benedictus ab episcopo or endowed with a special privilege, on a candidate not his subject. The relevant points of this section are:

(a) The abbot must be an abbas regiminis, that is to say, one actually governing, whether for life or for a certain number of years. Hence a titular abbot or a commendatory abbot, or an abbot who has entirely renounced his office, may neither validly nor licitly confer tonsure and minor orders.[61] An abbot who has a coadjutor is still a governing abbot, and is therefore entitled to perform the aforesaid ordinations. Whether the coadjutor can validly confer them depends entirely on his letters of appointment from Rome.

(b) The abbot must be a priest, as the II Council of Nice and the Decretals clearly state,[62] otherwise the ordination is invalid.

(c) He must have been lawfully blest, i.e., he must have received the abbatial benediction. The Pontificale Romanum prescribes that the benedicendus must be provided with an Apostolic mandate which commits the blessing to a bishop.

The bishop is the one in whose diocese the monastery is located, unless the mandate permits the abbot-elect to choose one according to his good pleasure. The Pontificale also prescribes that two abbots should assist the bishop in that function. By the way it may be added 60 This controversy was justified by conflicting decisions of the S. C. C. (Richter, Trid., p. 198); cfr. Benedict XIV, De Syn Dioec., II, 11, 13, Gasparri, De S. Ordinatione, n. 955 ff; Many, l. c., p. 135 ff.

61 S. C. C., Sept. 20, 1788; S. O., July 15, 1903 (A. S. S., 33, 167); S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 20, 1697 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 282).

62 C. 1, Dist. 69; c. 11 X, I, 14; c. 3, 6°, I, 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that the abbatial blessing, though an imposing ceremony, is not a Sacrament,[63] but merely a sacramental.

(d) Those upon whom abbots may validly and licitly confer tonsure and minor orders are the subditi vi professionis saltem simplicis, i.e., his own subjects by religious profession, which is always made into the hands, or at least in the name, of the governing abbot. This too is ancient doctrine.

When any one of these four conditions is wanting, the ordination is invalid. But if a religious who is a consecrated bishop, e.g., a titular bishop, would ordain religious who are not his subjects, these orders would be validly conferred, since, as it seems, the episcopal order would supply the defect of jurisdiction.

2.° Exempt religious can not be licitly ordained by any bishop without dimissorial letters from their own higher superior. This ruling, too, was insisted upon by ancient synods and in many papal decrees,[64] from which sources it may be seen that exemption as well as the obedience due to the lawful superiors would render the conferring of orders by any bishop grievously illicit, though not invalid.

3.° Religious superiors may grant dimissorial letters, but only for tonsure and minor orders, to such of their subjects as have taken the simple triennial vows[65] that precede either solemn or perpetual vows.

Who are the superiors who may grant these dimissorial letters? The superiores maiores of orders of regulars, of exempt and non-exempt religious congregations whose members take triennial vows before they pronounce 63 A pamphlet was published some twenty years ago in Rome in which it was asserted that the abbatial blessing imprints an indelible character.

64 Cfr. c. 33, C. 16, g. 1 (Syn. Agde, 506); c. 1, Dist. 5 (Greg. I); c. 5, C. 18, g. 2 (Greg. I); c. 5, X, I, 11.

65 See can. 574, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google solemn or simple perpetual vows. This ruling marks a change in the former discipline,[66] for the superiors of religious congregations with merely simple vows did not enjoy the privilege of granting such letters to their subjects.

4.° The ordination of all other members of religious institutes is governed by the same laws as that of seculars, and every indult granted to superiors for issuing dimissorial letters to those of their members with temporary vows who wish to receive major orders is hereby revoked. This is a reminder of the "Auctis Admodum," of Nov. 4, 1892, n. I and II. Formerly no religious who had not professed solemn or perpetual vows could be ordained to major orders. If an urgent case came up they were allowed to anticipate solemn or perpetual profession before the regular term had expired.

It may be asked who exactly are meant by "ceterorum omnium alumnorum cuiusvis religionis"? Only members of non-exempt congregations whose members are promoted to sacred orders: at least the revoking clause points to these. It is evident, then, that can. 964 must be understood as follows:

(1) Governing abbots, provided they are priests and duly blessed, may confer tonsure and minor orders on their own subjects only.

(2) Superiors of exempt religious institutes, whether regulars or otherwise exempt, must give dimissorial letters to their subjects, in order that a bishop may licitly ordain them. Such dimissorial letters must be given for tonsure and minor orders as well as for major orders, for n. 2 of our canon does not distinguish between the different orders. Therefore the religious exempt superiors, not [66] S. C. EE. et RR., May 6, 1864 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 711); Feb. 9, 1894 (A. S. S., 26, 619).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the local Ordinary, grant dimissorial letters for all orders, lower and higher.

(3) All religious superiors of orders as well as congregations, the constitutions of which prescribe perpetual vows, may grant dimissorial letters to their temporarily professed members, but only for tonsure and minor orders.

(4) Members of religious institutes which are not exempt need litterae dimissoriae from their own bishop if they wish to be promoted to major orders, beginning with subdeaconship. Hence with regard to sacred orders these members fall under can. 956, which determines the competency of the bishop. Every indult to the contrary must now be regarded as void.

(5) Novices of religious orders as well as congregations must observe the law binding seculars (can. 956).

(6) Members of religious societies must follow the same rule (can. 956).

Here it may be asked whether a governing abbot may address dimissorial letters to another abbot, who is entitled to confer tonsure and minor orders on his own subjects: for instance to the Abbot President or Abbot Primate. This was possible and actually done before the promulgation of the Code. But the practice can no longer be sustained, since the legislator emphasizes the invalidity of ordination performed on a non-subject. Notice well the subject is one vi professionis, not by a transient transference of jurisdiction. N. 3, can. 964, does not contradict this interpretation, because it permits the superiors only in general terms to grant dimissorial letters without specifying the prelate to whom they must be directed.[67]

67 S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1659, n. 19, referred to by Card. Gasparri, reads: "Reliqua pontificalia extra loca ipsis Abbatibus subiecta, vel pro servitio alienae Ecclesiae, aut in subditos pariter alienos, etiam de licentia Ordinariorum, exercere non valeant: puta Campanarum benedic-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE

CAN. 965

Episcopus ad quem Superior religiosus litteras dimissorias mittere debet, est Episcopus dioecesis, in qua sita est domus religiosa, ad cuius familiam pertinet ordinandus.

The bishop to whom the religious superior must direct the dimissorial letters, is the bishop in whose diocese the religious house of which the ordinand is a member, is situated.

It is not necessary to repeat the just complaints of Benedict XIV concerning some religious who apparently spent their night watches in profane things rather than in the study of the sacred canons, and boasted of privileges that existed only in their imagination.[68] The law, as stated in this canon, is an almost verbal repetition of an enactment made by Clement VIII, or, at his command, by the S. C. Concilii, on March 15, 1593. The privileges granted to the Camaldolese did not greatly help them because the S. Congregation insisted upon their adapting themselves to the actual practice,[69] as stated in the following canon.

CAN. 966

§ 1. Tunc tantum Superior religiosus ad alium Episcopum litteras dimissorias mittere potest, cum Episcopus dioecesanus licentiam dederit, aut sit diversi ritus, aut sit absens, aut non sit ordinationem habitionem, Calicum, et similium, in quibus sacra adhibetur unctio, nec non Minorum Ordinum collationes."

68 "Impositi Nobis," Feb. 27, 1747, repeating the enactment of Clement VIII.

69 S. C. EE. et RR., July 13, 1730 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 341 f).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

turus proximo legitimo tempore ad normam can. 1006, § 2, vel denique cum dioecesis vacet nec eam regat qui charactere episcopali polleat.

§ 2. Necesse est ut singulis in casibus id Episcopo ordinaturo constet ex authentico Curiae episcopalis testimonio.

Only in the following cases may the religious superior direct the litterae dimissoriae to another than the diocesan bishop: (1) If the diocesan bishop has given permission; (2) or if he is of another Rite; (3) or if he is absent; (4) or if he does not hold ordinations at the time stated in can. 1006, § 2; (5) or if the diocese is vacant or ruled by one who lacks the episcopal character. However in every such case the facts must be attested to the ordaining bishop by an authentic document of the court of the bishop competent for ordination.

Notice that the text speaks disjunctively, which signifies that any one of the enumerated reasons may be advanced and is sufficient for the religious superior to direct the dimissoriae to another bishop. The first and second of the five reasons mentioned are newly formulated, though implied in former rules. Thus it is evident that if a bishop is prevented from ordaining, he may entrust another bishop with this function.[70] The difference of rite always was acknowledged as sufficient reason for choosing another bishop.[71]

The last three reasons were officially recognized by the Roman Court.[72] A bishop must be regarded as "absent" from his diocese also if during his absence he calls in another bishop to hold ordinations.[73] The competent 70 Reg. iuris 68, 72 in 6°.

71 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VII, n. XXII f.; § IX, n. XIII.

72 Benedict XIV, "Impositi Nobis," Feb. 27, 1747.

73 Many, l. c., p. 382.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishop is supposed not to hold ordination at the next term set by law if he does not ordain on one of the four Ember Days, on the Saturday before Passion Sunday, and on Holy Saturday.[74] For these are the regular days for general ordinations. Hence, even though the bishop would have an ordination on another than the six known Sabbata, the law would permit the religious superior to direct his subject to another bishop. On the other hand, the religious superior would not be allowed to address the dimissoriae to another bishop, if the diocesan ordinary held general ordinations on one of the six Saturdays, not in his episcopal city, but in another place of his diocese, or if he would have the ordinations held by another bishop, provided he himself were present in the diocese.[75]

The last reason mentioned in our canon is vacancy of the episcopal see whose occupant would be competent for ordaining religious. This rule was established by the practice of the Roman Court.[76] Vacancy is here taken in the strict sense of the word, as the modification evidently shows. Therefore a sedes impedita is no true vacancy, nor would suspension or excommunication of the bishop constitute vacancy. Besides, if the Vicar Capitular or the regular Administrator, or the Administrator Apostolic were a consecrated bishop, vacancy would not be verified in casu.

Finally, § 2 requires authentic attestation by the episcopal court to the effect that one of the five cases really exists. This document may be issued by the Vicar-General, or by the Chancellor of the diocese, or by the secre-

74 Can. 1006, § 2. Although § 3 of the same canon permits the bishop to hold "general" ordinations on a Sunday or feast-day of obligation, yet our text, referring only to can. 1006, § 2, certainly intends the "six Saturdays" only, as it was understood generally.

75 S. C. C., Aug. 18, 1888 (A. S. S., Vol. 21, 359 ff); Feb. 11, 1708; Many, l. c., p. 383.

76 S. C. C., Tirascon., July 13, 1782.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tary of the bishop;[77] it must be given under the diocesan seal, signed by one of the aforesaid officials, and enclosed with the dimissorial letters from the religious superior.

Can. 967

Caveant Superiores religiosi ne in fraudem Episcopi dioecesani subditum ordinandum ad aliam religiosam domum mittant, aut concessionem litterarum dimissoriarum de industria in id tempus differant, quo Episcopus vel abfuturus, vel nullas habiturus sit ordinationes.

This canon, adopting the words of the Constitution "Impositi Nobis," of Benedict XIV, cautions religious superiors against committing fraud by abusing the permission granted in the foregoing canon. It would be fraudulent if they sent a religious to another house purely for the purpose of avoiding the diocesan bishop. There would be no fraud if the religious would dwell in another religious house in another diocese for the sake of study, or health, or vacation. Fraud is also committed, as the text says, if the religious superior intentionally delays the issuance of dimissorial letters to a time when the bishop is absent from the diocese or will not hold general ordinations. Of course, fraud may not be presumed, but must be proved, which, generally speaking, is not an easy thing.[78]

The reader will have noticed that there is no clause revoking the privilege which some religious (for instance, the Society of Jesus) enjoy of having their candidates ordained by any bishop. Hence if this privilege was granted after the Council of Trent, and directly, not by communication, it still holds.[79]

77 Benedict XIV, "Impositi Nobis," Feb. 27, 1747.

78 Many, l. c., p. 383 f.

79 "Impositi Nobis."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

What if the competent or diocesan bishop refuses to ordain a religious provided with litterae dimissoriae from his superior? In that case the superior is not allowed to send the ordinand to another bishop, for this is not mentioned in can. 966, and hence nothing is left but recourse to the Holy See (S. Cong. Relig.).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

SUBJECT OF HOLY ORDERS

VALID AND LICIT ORDINATION

CAN. 968

§ 1. Sacram ordinationem valide recipit solus vir baptizatus; licite autem, qui ad normam sacrorum canonum debitis qualitatibus, iudicio proprii Ordinarii, praeditus sit, neque ulla detineatur irregularitate aliove impedimento.

§ 2. Qui irregularitate aliove impedimento detinentur, licet post ordinationem etiam sine propria culpa exorto, prohibentur receptos ordines exercere.

Only a baptized male can validly be ordained. In order to receive orders licitly, the candidate must, according to the judgment of the Ordinary, be endowed with the qualities required by the sacred canons and free from any irregularity or canonical impediment.

Those who have incurred an irregularity or other impediment, even after ordination and without their own fault, are not allowed to exercise the orders they have received.

§ 1 defines who are capable of receiving orders validly, and who may receive them licitly according to canon law. Two conditions are required for valid ordination, viz.: the male sex and Baptism. The following classes of persons are therefore incapable of being validly ordained:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

(1) Women, who are debarred from the sanctuary by divine positive law, if not by the natural law, according to reason. This has been the constant teaching and practice of the Church from the time of St. Paul [1] up to our day. The tenets of the Pepuzians or Quintillians, of Marcus Magus, and of the Collyridians, who admitted women to the priesthood and its sacrificial functions, were condemned as heretical.[2] As to the institute of deaconesses and widows, it may be admitted that they formed a special ecclesiastical corporation, or class, endowed with quasi-clerical prerogatives. Their functions were similar to those of the deacons, whom they assisted with regard to the female catechumens, the poor, and the sick. At the same time authentic historical documents, especially can. 19 of the Council of Nicaea, prove that no hierarchic or liturgical character can be attributed to these deaconesses and widows, or, in the words of the aforesaid canon 19, that they were ranked with the laity since they received no orders.[3]

Concerning hermaphrodites, it must be said that complete hermaphrodites, whose sex cannot be determined, may not be validly ordained; whereas those with whom the male sex prevails may be ordained validly but not licitly.[4]

(2) Incapable of validly receiving orders are also men who are not baptized, because Baptism is the foundation of, and the gate to, all the other sacraments. This, too, is ancient and constant ecclesiastical law.[5]

1 Cfr. I Cor. xiv, 34 f.; I Tim. ii, 11.

2 Epiph., Haeres., 49, n. 2 f.; 79; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., I, 13, 2; Gelasius I, Ep. 11 (Constant, Epp. Rom. Pont. f., 1721, p. 85); Connick, De Sacram. et Censuris, disp. 20, n. 94.

3 Wieland, "Die Genetische Entwicklung der sog. Ordines Minores," in Röm. Quartalschrift, 1897 Suppl., p. 60 ff.

4 Eschbach, Disputationes Physiologico-Theologicae, 1901, p. 53 f.

5 C. 19, Conc. Nic. I., (= c. 52, C. 1, g. 1); cc. 1–3, X, III, 43.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Our text says vir, a man, which term, however, must not be pressed to the extent of assuming a full-grown man. For the ordination of infants, though illicit, is valid, as Benedict XIV says.[6] On the other hand, even an adult man, if physically compelled to receive orders, would not be ordained at all.[7] As to grave fear brought to bear upon an unwilling person, see can. 214.

The other class of persons mentioned in our canon are those who may receive orders validly, but not lawfully. They are either irregular or suffer from a canonical impediment. This is a new regulation, for thus far a distinction was made only between incapacity and irregularity. Now a strictly so-called canonical impediment is introduced, which is less than irregularity.

Irregularity is derived from the Latin contra regulam, and as a canonical term seems to occur first in a work of Peter of Blois (+ 1200).[8] It signifies general inhability established by law, for there is no irregularity except it be expressed in the law (can. 983). The effect of this inhability consists in forbidding one from being licitly ordained and from exercising the orders received. In this respect there is no distinction between irregularity and the simple canonical impediment, as § 2 of our canon plainly states. Where, then, is the difference between both? It must be sought in the higher degree of inhability and in the secondary effect attaching to irregularity. For irregularity, although per se no penalty,[9] yet may originate from guilt, which is followed by penalty constituted in law, for instance, in the case of homicide and others

6 "Eo quamvis," May 4, 1745, §§ 20, 28.

7 C. 3, X, III, 42.

8 Speculum Iuris Canonici (Hinschius, K.-R., I, 9, note 4).

9 Cfr. Layman, Theol. Moral., l. I, tr. 5, P. 5, c. 1, n. 1. To deny every feature of penalty, as Philipps, K.-R., 1845, I, 418 ff., does, seems to us labor lost. We agree that the poena is not intended in recto, but in obliquo it is attached to the irregularities ex delicto, as the latter term implies.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mentioned in can. 985. One who is simply suffering from an impediment is not supposed to have incurred a guilt in the proper sense of the term, even though infamia facti might be imputable to him. The consequence is that one who, while suffering from a simple canonical impediment, receives or exercises an order, should not be punished as severely as one afflicted with irregularity.[10] Any other distinction between irregularity and the canonical impediment proper, is, we believe, difficult to establish.

It may be added that irregularity is generally distinguished into a perpetual and a temporary one, according to the duration or cessation of the impediment.

It may be total or partial. Total irregularity incapacitates one for the reception and the exercise of all orders, whereas partial irregularity merely deprives one of the right of receiving or exercising a higher order.

The distinction between an irregularity from defect and from guilt will be explained under 983, where reference is made to the origin of irregularities.

NECESSITY AND UTILITY OF THE DIOCESE

CAN. 969

§ 1. Nemo ex saecularibus ordinetur, qui iudicio proprii Episcopi non sit necessarius vel utilis ecclesiis dioecesis.

§ 2. Non prohibetur tamen Episcopus proprium promovere subditum, qui in futurum, praevia legitima excardinatione et incardinatione, servitio alius dioecesis destinetur.

10 Cfr. can. 2374; Thesaurus-Giraldi, De Poenis Ecclesiasticis, Romae, 1831, p. 311 (P. II, c. 10). Irregularity does not create irregularity, but the penalty is ferendae sententiae; c. 1, Dist. 51: "irregularis se faciens promoveri est deponendus."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

True to the admonition of St. Paul "not to impose hands lightly upon any man," the Tridentine Council commanded Ordinaries to ordain only such, or as many, as would be useful to the diocese.[11] The same law is re-enacted in our canon, with the limitation that it concerns only the secular clergy. The bishop is to judge as to the number of priests needed or useful for his diocese. Why the religious clergy is not mentioned may be deduced from the fact that their support and conduct, being guaranteed by their constitutions, obviates the danger of their becoming a burden or a stumbling block to the diocese.

§ 2 permits the bishop to ordain any one of his subjects who may be destined for the future service of another diocese, supposing legitimate excardination and incardination.

This might happen if a diocese were well provided with priests. But the bishop, before ordaining one who is his own subject by reason of origin or domicile, must excardinate him and the bishop for whose diocese he is destined must incardinate him, according to can. 111, § 2 (Com. Int. C. I. C., Aug. 17, 1919).

FORBIDDING ORDINATION EX INFORMATA CONSCIENTIA

CAN. 970

Proprius Episcopus vel Superior religiosus maior potest suis clericis ex quavis canonica causa, occulta quoque, etiam extraiudicialiter, ascensum ad ordines interdicere, salvo iure recursus ad Sanctam Sedem, vel etiam ad Moderatorem generalem, si agatur de religiosis quibus ascensum interdixerit Superior provincialis.

11 I Tim. v, 22; Trid., Sess. 23, c. 16, de ref.; Pius X, "Pieni l'animo," July 28, 1906; S. C. P. F., Aug. 1827 (Coll., n. 798).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A bishop or higher religious superior may, for any canonical, even though secret, reason, and without a formal trial, forbid his subjects to receive orders; but a subject thus interdicted retains the right of recourse to the Holy See, or in the case of religious who have been enjoined by their provincial, to the superior general.

This text is taken from the Decretals and the Council of Trent. Lucius III (1183) admonished religious that it is more becoming and safer for subjects to obey their superiors and remain in the lower ranks, than to strive after a higher rank to the scandal of their prelates.[12] The Council of Trent,[13] making these words its own, added that the prelate may forbid any one to receive a sacred order for any reason, even for a secret crime,[14] and without legal procedure. Our text simply says "ascensum ad ordines interdicere," which manifestly includes all orders, also tonsure and minor orders. The bishop, therefore, may forbid a student of a clerical seminary to enter the clerical state, the religious superior may refuse to a religious subject tonsure and minor orders, and the ascent to higher orders. However, there must be a canonical reason, even though only an occult one. Why a reason is required is easily understood from the fact that the one thus treated may have recourse to the Holy See, which will in each case demand the reason. Besides, it would be unjust to repel from the sanctuary one whom God may have called. We hardly believe that the Holy See will now-a-days[15] ask the Metropolitan or nearest suffragan to demand of the bishop the reason 12 Cc. 5, 17, X, I, 11.

13 Sess. 24, c. 1, de ref.

14 The crimes mentioned in c. 17, X, I, 11 are: adulterium, periurium, homicidium, falsum testimonium; but with the exception of homicide the other crimes had to be notorious and proved, and penance had to precede.

15 S. C. C., April 21, 1668, quoted by Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XII, 8, 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for refusing ordination, but will rather obtain that information directly from the bishop. But the rule still holds that the prelate is not bound to state the reason for his refusal to the candidate himself.[16] The latter may have recourse to the Holy See (S.C. Concilii), but the appeal does not suspend the effects of the prohibition.[17] If a religious has been excluded from the reception of orders by his provincial, recourse (not appeal) may be had to the superior general. If the latter should confirm the injunction, nothing is left for the religious but to have recourse to the S. Cong. Religiosorum.

Finally note may be taken of the causa canonica, which does not necessarily imply a crime, but may mean an irregularity, or a canonical impediment, or lack of canonical requisites. In order to form an objective and impartial judgment it is advisable to follow the rules laid down by Benedict XIV for discerning the qualities of candidates.[18] These rules provide for (1) Great vigilance over the conduct and character of the candidates; (2) properly and honestly conducted examinations which show the intellectual and moral capacity of the aspirant; (3) spiritual exercises or retreats; (4) observance of the interstices between the various orders.

The same Pontiff gives some hints to confessors and retreat masters with regard to recidivi et consuetudinarii preparing for orders. The confessor should ponder all the circumstances and probabilities and remember that he is a spiritual physician who should prescribe the proper remedies. After having implored the divine assistance, he should proceed firmly and justly and without human respect. He may tell the candidate whom he thinks unfit

16 S. C. C., March 21, 1643 (Richter, Trid., p. 87, n. 1).

17 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 23.

18 De Syn. Dioec., XI, 2, 16 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google for the high vocation that there is no disgrace or shame attached to withdrawing from the course begun, that he had best take time for further deliberation, and that the salvation of his soul is a stronger motive than human respect.

THE CLERICAL STATE MUST BE EMBRACED FREELY

CAN. 971

Nefas est quemquam, quovis modo, ob quamlibet rationem, ad statum clericalem cogere, vel canonice idoneum ab eodem avertere.

It is criminal to compel anyone, in whatsoever manner or for whatsoever reason, to embrace the clerical state, or to turn away therefrom anyone canonically qualified.

This has always been the practice of the Church,[19] which even threatened with heavy penalties any minister who ordained one against his will. The Code inflicts excommunication (reserved to no one, however) for the same transgression.[20] Parents ought to know that they commit a grievous sin against their children, the Church, and society at large if they disobey this canon.

CLERICAL TRAINING IN SEMINARIES

CAN. 972

§ 1. Curandum ut ad sacros ordines adspirantes inde a teneris annis in Seminario recipiantur; sed omnes ibidem commorari tenentur saltem per integrum sacrae theologiae curriculum, nisi Ordinarius in casibus peculiaribus, gravi de causa, onerata eius conscientia, dispensaverit.

19 Cc. 1, 2, 7, Dist. 74; c. 23, C. 25, c. 2.

20 Can. 2352.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Qui ad ordines adspirant et extra Seminarium legitime morantur, commendentur pio et idoneo sacerdoti, qui eis invigilet eosque ad pietatem informet.

Care should be taken that those who aspire to sacred orders be received into a seminary at an early age. All candidates for the sacred ministry are obliged to live in a seminary at least throughout the entire course of their theological studies, unless the Ordinary, for grave reasons and upon due deliberation, dispenses in individual cases.

Candidates for orders who lawfully dwell outside the seminary should be commended to a pious and worthy priest, who should watch over them and train them to piety.

In former times cathedral schools were conducted under the guidance of a scholasticus, and monastic schools were also open to such as aspired to the clerical state.[21] The Council of Trent[22] ruled that a seminary be established in every diocese, if possible. The Febronians and Josephinists tried to remodel the clerical seminaries after a pattern unacceptable to the Church. Equally unacceptable was the plan of certain university professors and rectors, who insisted that clerical students should attend the public State universities on the ground that it was necessary to raise the educational standard of the clergy.[23] Pius X centralized the many (about 300) diocesan seminaries of Italy into provincial seminaries.[24] This measure had become necessary to insure greater efficiency. All these, the so-called liberal no less than the conservation movements prove the importance of the clerical semi-

21 C. 1, C. 12, c. 2.

22 Sess. 23, c. 18, de ref.

23 H. Schell, Der Katholizismus als Prinzip des Fortschrittes, 1907, p. 28 ff.

24 Pius X, "La Ristorazione," May 5, 1904; Pio X, Suoi Atti e Suoi Intendimenti, 1905, p. 13 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nary. Modern conditions require greater attention to this matter, as may be seen from an Instruction of the S.C. of Bishops and Regulars,[25] where the rules for frequenting non-ecclesiastical institutes are laid down. If at all possible, the young candidates should enter a Catholic college to be educated for the priesthood. As to frequenting secular universities, taking a post graduate course may be permitted after the philosophical and theological courses have been completed in a Catholic school. But no more clergymen are to be sent to secular universities than is necessary for the diocese. While they study at the university, they should dwell in a seminary, or, if this is impossible, live with an elderly priest or in a community. If the university is located outside the diocese, the Ordinary shall recommend his students to the Ordinary in whose diocese the university is, and the students must present themselves to, and obey the latter. Both Ordinaries should entrust the students to the care of a priest of approved virtue, learning, and knowledge of the young. This priest shall frequently inform the Ordinary of the conduct of the clerical students at the university, and the Ordinary himself shall demand frequent communications from the students. This regulation was inculcated anew and made universal by the Motu proprio of Pius X, "Sacrorum Antistitum," of Sept. 1, 1910, which especially warned the students against Modernism.[26] Our canon permits the Ordinary to make an occasional exception from the rule of taking the full theological course in a clerical seminary, but it does not exempt him from the obligation of entrusting such students to the 25 July 21, 1896 (Coll. P. F., n. 1948); cfr. S. C. P. F., Oct. 18, 1883, IV, 1 (Coll., n. 1606) recommended, especially for China, receiving youths from the 10th to 14th year of age, and have them pass a preparatory term of about two years.

26 A. Ap. S., II, 658 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google vigilance of a pious priest. This does not precisely mean that the student must live in the priest's house, although to do so would be highly commendable. He may, according to the said Instruction, live, e. g., with his parents, provided only that a certain kind of spiritual guidance is proffered.

It may be added that the Ordinary has full power to demand compliance with these regulations, and no appeal therefrom is permissible.[27]

ARTICLE I

REQUISITES OF CANDIDATES FOR ORDINATION

CAN. 973

§ 1. Prima tonsura et ordines illis tantum conferendi sunt, qui propositum habeant ascendendi ad presbyteratum et quos merito coniicere liceat aliquando dignos futuros esse presbyteros.

§ 2. Ordinatus tamen qui superiores ordines recipere recuset, nec potest ab Episcopo ad eos recipiendos cogi, nec prohiberi a receptorum ordinum exercitio, nisi impedimento canonico detineatur aliave gravis, iudicio Episcopi, obsit causa.

§ 3. Episcopus sacros ordines nemini conferat quin ex positivis argumentis moraliter certus sit de eius canonica idoneitate; secus non solum gravissime peccat, sed etiam periculo sese committit alienis communicandi peccatis.

§ 1. Tonsure and inferior orders should be given only to such as have the intention to ascend to the priesthood and give reason to hope that they will one day be worthy priests.

27 Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, § 34.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. If, however, one who has been ordained (say to subdeaconship) refuses to receive higher orders, he cannot be compelled by the bishop to receive such higher orders, nor be forbidden the exercise of the orders he has received, unless a canonical impediment or some other grave cause, in the judgment of the bishop, should intervene.

§ 3. The bishop shall not confer sacred orders on any one unless he has positive proof, amounting to moral certainty, of the candidate's canonical fitness; otherwise he not only commits a grievous sin, but exposes himself to the danger of sharing in the guilt of another.

§ 1 is taken partly from the Council of Trent and subsequent papal constitutions.[28]

§ 2 forbids forcing one into an ecclesiastical rank which he perhaps thinks himself unworthy to hold. To prevent a cleric from exercising an order which he has duly and canonically received would be tantamount to declaring him irregular. A canonical impediment, i. e., one strictly so-called, or an irregularity, must be proved in order to justify such a prohibition. The other grave reason for which one may be forbidden to exercise an order received, is a crime which, though as yet occult, is liable to be divulged.

The moral certainty mentioned in § 3, as to the proofs for the fitness of an aspirant to the sacred ministry may be gathered from information given by the director of the seminary and from the report of the synodal examiners. These suffice to exonerate the conscience of the Ordinary. It will not surprise the reader that the legislator here speaks in the tone of a severe preacher, if he remembers

28 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 4, de ref.; Innocent XIII, "Apostolici ministerii," May 23, 1723, § 2; Benedict XIII, "In supremo," Sept. 23, 1724, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google that a great canonist and a great pastor, Benedict XIV and Pius X, in their first encyclical letters drew the attention of the bishops to this important matter. Benedict XIV, among other things, says it is better to have few priests, but righteous, fit and useful, than many who contribute nothing to the edification of the mystic body of Christ.[29] Pius X tells the bishops to carefully ponder the fact that the faithful generally will be as good or as bad as those whom they destine for the priesthood, and reminds them of St. Paul's warning not to be partakers of other men's sins.[30]

CAN. 974

§ 1. Ut quis licite ordinari possit, requiruntur:

1°. Recepta sacra confirmatio;

2°. Mores ordini recipiendo congruentes;

3°. Aetas canonica;

4°. Debita scientia;

5°. Ordinum inferiorum susceptio;

6°. Interstitiorum observatio;

7°. Titulus canonicus, si agatur de ordinibus maioribus.

§ 2. Quod pertinet ad consecrationem episcopalem, servetur praescriptum can. 331.

§ 1. That candidates may be licitly ordained the following conditions are required:

1.° They must have received the Sacrament of Confirmation;

2.° Their moral conduct must be conformable to the order they wish to receive;

3.° They must have attained the canonical age;

29 "Ubi primum," Dec. 3, 1740, § 1.

30 "E supremi," Oct. 4, 1903 (Anal. Eccl., XI, 378).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4.° They must have the necessary knowledge;

5.° They must have received the inferior orders;

6.° The canonical intervals must be observed;

7.° They must be in possession of a canonical title, if they wish to receive higher orders.

§ 2. As to episcopal consecration, can. 331 must be observed.

These points call for no comment here, as most of them will be explained in connection with the following canons.

THE CANONICAL AGE

CAN. 975

Subdiaconatus ne conferatur ante annum vicesimum primum completum; diaconatus ante vicesimum secundum completum; presbyteratus ante vicesimum quartum completum.

No one shall be ordained subdeacon before he has completed his twenty-first year; deaconship cannot be received before the twenty-second year is completed, and the priesthood cannot be received before the twenty-fourth year is completed.

For tonsure and minor orders no age is prescribed, but the following canon establishes a certain limit.

THE KNOWLEDGE REQUIRED

CAN. 976

§ 1. Nemo sive saecularis sive religiosus ad primam tonsuram promoveatur ante inceptum cursum theologicum.

§ 2. Firmo praescripto can. 975, subdiaconatus ne conferatur, nisi exeunte tertio cursus theologici anno;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

diaconatus, nisi incepto quarto anno; presbyteratus, nisi post medietatem eiusdem quarti anni.

§ 3. Cursus theologicus peractus esse debet non privatim, sed in scholis ad id institutis secundum studiorum rationem can. 1365 determinatam.

§ 1. Neither seculars nor religious may receive the tonsure before they have begun the course of theology.

By the term cursus theologicus is to be understood theology proper, which presupposes a course in the classics and philosophy. It had been previously decided that the theological course would not be legally acknowledged unless preceded by a collegiate and philosophical course.[31] Consequently, although hermeneutics or an Oriental language may be taught in the two year's philosophical course, these would have to be considered as secondary or accessory branches which follow the principal branch, i. e., philosophy. Note that religious are expressly included in this law and no exception is made for religious who only make a promise, not strictly so-called vows, as, for instance, the Eudists.[32] The consequence for religious is that their clerics cannot be ordained before they have begun their theological course. Beginning, however, may lawfully be taken even for the first month of the theological course.

§ 2. With due regard to the ruling concerning age (can. 975), subdeaconship may be conferred only towards the end of the third year of the theological course, deaconship only after the beginning of the fourth year, and the priesthood only in the second term of the fourth year of theology.

The school year should last at least nine months, and 31 S. C. Rel., Sept. 7, 1909, ad IV (A. Ap. S., I, 702); can. 1365, § 2.

32 S. C. Rel., May 31, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 449 f).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

these must be reckoned according to the calendar. The feasts of Pentecost or Trinity cannot be taken as the end of the school year because they are movable. If the school starts about Sept. 10, it should last until June 10 of the following year and close with a final examination.[33]

Post medietatem signifies the second term, or semester, during the whole of which the priesthood may be received. But ordination to the priesthood does not dispense a candidate from completing his course. Therefore, one who is ordained on Holy Saturday must continue his studies until the end of the school year and then pass the examination (cum examine finali feliciter emenso).[34]

§ 3. The theological course must be taken, not privately, but in a school conducted according to can. 1365. A private course made outside a properly instituted school, even under the direction of a professor, is not legal, nor may the Ordinary accept it as sufficient for the litterae testimoniales.[35] However, the same S. Congregation has also declared that private studies may be permitted in rare individual cases, but only for the secondary branches. Which branches of a priest's education are primary, and which secondary, the Code does not state, but we may deduce from can. 1365, § 2, that dogmatic and moral theology are the main branches, whereas holy Scripture, Church history, Canon Law, liturgy, sacred eloquence and ecclesiastical music may be considered accessory. A more satisfactory division may be derived from a decision given in 1912. There dogmatic and moral theology, Scripture, Church history, and Canon Law are styled main branches, whilst Biblical Greek, Hebrew, homiletics, Patrology, liturgy, archaeology, ecclesiastical art, and the [33] S. C. Consist., March 24, 1911, ad 1 (A. Ap. S., III, 181).

[34] Ibid.
[35] S. C. Rel., Sept. 7, 1909, ad V (A. Ap. S., I, 702 f).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Chant are called accessory branches.[36] According to the declaration of 1909, if private study embraces only a secondary branch, an examination made before the examiners will suffice. This examination may be taken at the end of the school year together with the students who have studied that branch in the school-room. In the first part of the decision mentioned it is laid down that a theological student who has missed school on account of sickness or military service, may, if the time lost amounts to no more than three months, supply the deficiency by private study, but he must pass the regular examination.[37]

ORDINATIONS PER SALTUM NOT PERMITTED

CAN. 977

Ordines gradatim conferendi sunt ita ut ordinationes per saltum omnino prohibeantur.

Orders must be conferred successively, and ordinations per saltum are entirely forbidden.

Per saltum means by leaps and bounds, without keeping the necessary intervals, or skipping an inferior order which should precede the reception of a higher one. The Council of Sardica (can. 13) prescribes that the ascent to the priesthood should be made by degrees, in order that the candidate may be tested as to his faith, modesty, character and reverence. The object of successive or gradual ordination, therefore, is to ensure due preparation and sufficient knowledge.[38] An apprenticeship precedes every profession, and higher degrees are not con-

36 S. C. Consist., July 16, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 491).

37 S. C. Rel., March 1, 1915, ad 2 et 1 (A. Ap. S., VII, 123 f.). Although this is not expressly stated in the code, the latter certainly is not opposed to our explanation.

38 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 52; cc. 1, 4, 7, Dist. 61; Propp. 51, 53 Syn. Pistor. damnatae, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794 (Denzinger, n. 1414, 1416).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ferred on such as are barely initiated. Besides, there is also the succession of orders to be observed, as stated in the Pontificale Romanum: tonsure (de clerico faciendo), ostiariate, lectorate, exorcistate, acolythate, subdeaconship, deaconship, priesthood.[39]

The text says "prohibeantur," thereby intimating that this law is prohibitive, but not invalidating. Therefore the diaconate is validly conferred, even though the subdeaconship was omitted.[40] The priesthood could be validly received by one who had never been ordained a deacon[41] or ordained to deaconship invalidly. The H. O., in 1842, decided a case in point. One who had been invalidly ordained to the subdiaconate and the diaconate because of lack of consent, was finally ordained a priest. He received the priesthood with the right intention, but the question arose: Was he ordained validly? The Holy Office decided yes, but enjoined that he be secretly ordained to subdeaconship and deaconship.[42] Attention may be drawn to the penalty of suspension. This is not incurred unless the ordination per saltum is performed maliciously,[43] which, for instance, was not the case in the instance mentioned.

THE INTERSTICES

CAN. 978

§ 1. In ordinationibus serventur temporum interstitia quibus promoti in receptis ordinibus, secundum Episcopi praescriptum, sese exerceant.

§ 2. Interstitia primam tonsuram inter et ostiariatum vel inter singulos ordines minores prudenti Epis-

39 Trid., Sess. 23, cc. 11, 14 de ref.

40 C. 1, Dist. 52 (Alex. II).

41 C. nn. X, V, 29.

42 S. O., March 2, 1842 (Coll. P. F., n. 946).

43 Can. 2374.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

copi iudicio committuntur; acolythus vero ad subdiaconatum, subdiaconus ad diaconatum, diaconus ad presbyteratum ne antea promoveantur, quam acolythus unum saltem annum, subdiaconus et diaconus tres saltem menses in suo quisque ordine fuerint versati, nisi necessitas aut utilitas Ecclesiae, iudicio Episcopi, aliud exposcat.

§ 3. Nunquam tamen, nisi de peculiari licentia Romani Pontificis, minores ordines cum subdiaconatu duove sacri ordines uno eodemque die, reprobata quavis contraria consuetudine, conferantur; imo nec primam tonsuram conferre licet una cum aliquo ex ordinibus minoribus, neque omnes ordines minores una simul.

§ 1. In ordaining, the intervals of time during which the respective orders should be exercised, according to episcopal prescription, must be observed.

The meaning of this law is that clerics should "exercise" the orders they have received, and although the minor orders are generally not "practised," except in religious institutions, yet our text, speaking as it does of all intervals and all orders, certainly intends to inculcate some kind of practice or exercise, at least of the higher orders.[44] This is the very purpose of observing the interstices. How the "practice" is to be made is left to the bishop.[45]

§ 2. It is left to the bishop also to determine the intervals between the tonsure and the ostiariate, and between the several minor orders. The interval between the acolythate and subdeaconship must last one year;[46]

44 Many, l. c., p. 281 f., denies the necessity of exercising the orders, saying that the ratio legis non cadit sub lege. Yes, if the ratio is not stated in the law itself, the term exerceant is expressly used in the new Code.

45 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 11, de ref.

46 A year, according to can. 32, § 2, means 365 days. But the eccle-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the interval between the subdiaconate and the diaconate, as also the interval between deaconship and the priesthood, must last at least three months, unless the bishop deems it necessary or useful for his diocese to shorten these intervals. Any plausible reason is sufficient. It may be added that it is the ordaining bishop who grants dispensation also in case of religious who may enjoy the privilege of being ordained without regard to the interstices.[47] The bishop, in ordaining such as are not his subjects, may also dispense from the intervals.[48]

§ 3. Minor Orders and subdeaconship, or two sacred orders, may never be conferred on the same day, without the express permission of the Roman Pontiff. Every contrary custom is hereby reprobated. Neither is it allowed to confer tonsure together with one of the minor orders, or all the minor orders at the same time.

The first clause is more severe than the second. For to receive two higher orders on one and the same natural day — for this is here to be understood — was always forbidden to all, exempt regulars not excepted.[49] The Code adds the reprobating clause in order at least to render contrary customs less admissible.

The second clause concerning tonsure and some or all minor orders repeats a Decretal, but apparently admits the contrary custom, which, as far as we are aware, was in vogue in several countries. The rule not to confer several sacred orders simultaneously also concerns the Oriental Rites.[50] siastical year may here be admitted, on account of the sacra tempora, and was always acknowledged by Roman practice. (Many, l. c., p. 280.)

47 S. C. C., May 17, 1593; May 31, 1597; Sept. 12, 1609 (Richter, Trid., p. 200, n. 4 f.).

48 S. C. Sacr., Aug. 15, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 656).

49 C. 2, X, V, 20.

50 S. C. P. T., April 13, 1807, n. XI; July 31, 1902, n. 8 (Coll., nn. 692, 2149).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITULUS ORDINATIONIS

CAN. 979

§ 1. Pro clericis saecularibus titulus canonicus est titulus beneficii, eoque deficiente, patrimonii aut pensionis.

§ 2. Hic titulus debet esse et vere securus pro tota ordinati vita et vere sufficiens ad congruam eiusdem sustentationem, secundum normas ab Ordinariis pro diversis locorum et temporum necessitatibus et adiunctis dandas.

For the secular clergy the canonical title is that of an ecclesiastical benefice, or, where this is wanting, that of a patrimony or pension.

This title must be secure for the life-time of the ordinand, and entirely sufficient to support him properly, according to the regulations established by the Ordinaries to meet the needs and circumstances of places and times.

Title (titulus) originally signified an inscription placed on a house or property to show its owner, or the name of the place.[51] Ecclesiastical language has evolved two special meanings of the term, viz., name for an oratory or a sepulchre of martyrs (e.g., titulus pastoris — S. Pudenziana). This name was later transferred to certain (25, then 49) churches of Rome, which in course of time became the so-called titular churches of the cardinals. As these churches had assigned to them a determined number of priests and clerics who lived from the revenues of these titles, the clergy itself was said to be "intitulatus" or "incardinatus."[52] Hence in this particular sense 51 Cfr. l. c. 2, 3, Cod. X, 10.

52 Armellini, Lezioni di Archeologia Cristiana, 1905, p. 192, 208, 269 f.; Decreta Auth. S. Rit. C., Vol. IV, 342 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the word title meant service in a determined church which entitled a cleric to a decent living or support. This is the origin of the first and only exclusively ecclesiastical title called beneficium.

Later, especially in the 12th century, the practice arose of admitting aspirants to orders (from subdeaconship onward) on the titulus of means of their own, which title was known and canonically acknowledged as patrimony.[53] After the Council of Trent there were added to the two titles mentioned the titulus pensionis,[54] and others approved by custom and formally sanctioned by the later discipline of the Church.

A title may, therefore, be defined as a security given to a clergyman to insure his honorable maintenance, thereby enabling him to be promoted to higher orders. A title is thus needed for every order from subdeaconship onward. And from this general law no cleric, secular or religious, is excepted, for it is not becoming that those who devote themselves to the divine service should disgrace their sublime vocation by begging or exercising a trade not becoming to their state.[55]

Our code mentions three titles on which a secular clergyman may be ordained, but calls that of benefice the canonical title par excellence. This is quite intelligible, for although the other two titles were also admitted by the Church, they were extraordinary and tolerated only when a dispensation was granted. This at least was the Roman practice, as Benedict XIV says.[56] Now-a-days, however, no dispensation is required if there is no benefice available.

53 Cfr. cc. 4, 16, X, III, 5; Migne, P. L., 210, 477; Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XI, 2, 14.

54 Wernz, Jus Dec., II, 114 (ed. 1).

55 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 2, de ref.; c. 6, Conc. Chalced.

56 De Syn. Dioec., XI, 2, 14.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The term benefice is to be understood of an ecclesiastical prebend which supplies its holder with a sufficient income to insure a permanent livelihood. A benefice must, according to our text, be secure and sufficient.

(a) It is judged to be secure if possessed actually, pacifically, and permanently, according to the requirements established by the Council of Trent.[57] The beneficiary, therefore, must not only be appointed to, but have actual possession of, his benefice. Besides, there must not be any litigation or dubious claims to the prebend, and, finally, it must be permanent.[58]

(b) A benefice must be sufficient to support its incumbent decently. The amount required to constitute a congrua is left to diocesan regulation. This was also the view taken by the Roman Court.[59] And most justly, for circumstances of time and place differ widely. Who could live now-a-days on forty scudi (forty dollars) per year?[60]

Residential and non-residential benefices are estimated differently. The amount of income accruing from a residential benefice depends on the regulations of the diocese in which the benefice is located, whereas that of a non-residential benefice depends on the rules of the diocese in which the beneficiary is to live.[61]

It may be added that benefice is here to be taken in its strictly canonical sense, and does not apply to most American parishes, unless they be considered as benefices.

57 Sess. 21, c. 2, de ref.; Many, l. c., p. 337 f.

58 A benefice was considered permanent if bestowed for life, or at least for the respective order; S. C. C., July 8, 1690; April 14, 1696 (Richter, Trid., p. 113, n. 2 f.).

59 S. C. C., July 1723 (Richter, l. c., n. 4).

60 Benedict XIV, Institut., 26, n. IV.

61 S. C. C., May 27, 1723 (Richter, l. c., p. 112, n. 1). A deficient benefice could be supplied by a patrimony; S. C. C., Oct. 1589 (Richter, l. c., n. 13).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Patrimony, properly speaking, is an inheritance received from one's ancestors, especially parents. Here it means a subsidiary title, admitted for the needs or advantage of the Church. The conditions required are the same as those demanded for a benefice. Hence the patrimony must be secure and sufficient. A secure patrimony would be one consisting of real estate or other stable and interest-bringing property, provided it is not mortgaged. Mortgaged property is unsafe as it may be sold at any time. The mere promise of parents or friends to provide a patrimony would not be considered secure,[62] nor the fact that the ordinand is by profession an artist, a musician, a teacher, or possesses a doctor's degree.[63] Much less would manual Mass stipends be considered a source of secure income. Government, State, and municipal bonds, and shares in reliable and conservative firms and companies [64] are in a different category. Live-stock, grain and cotton or any marketable produce may also be lawfully taken for patrimony.

As to sufficiency, what was said concerning the quantity or amount of a benefice also applies to a patrimony. If the interest on a certain capital is assigned, the latter must amount to about $15,000 or $20,000, which, invested at 5%, would bring $750 or $1000 a year, which now-a-days would just about afford a decent living.

If the ordinand assigns a portion of his own property as a patrimony, this must clearly be determined and set aside for the titulus ordinationis, and becomes inalienable. If parents, relatives, or friends furnish a patrimony, they must draw up a title-deed, donation, or note in legal form, without fraud, condition, or liability. In other words, 62 S. C. C., Oct., 1589; Oct. 2, 1717 (Richter, l. c., n. 16).

63 S. C. C., Oct., 1589; May 23, 1609 (Benedict XIV, Institut., 26, n. VII).

64 Many, l. c., p. 345.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the claim must be clear and complete, so that it cannot be attacked under the civil law.[65]

A Roman decision says that the title of patrimony can not be used if one is to be ordained only for the solace and spiritual comfort of his parents, and there is no need or advantage on the part of the diocese to recommend his ordination.[66]

3. The titulus pensionis is of the same nature as that of patrimony, and must offer the same guarantees of security and sufficiency. Some writers take pensio in the sense of ecclesiastical pension only, excluding civil pensions,[67] though neither the Council of Trent nor our text restricts the term to a pension derived from an ecclesiastical benefice. Therefore other authors justly admit any pension, provided it is secure and sufficient.[68] This view is supported by a decision of the S. C. C., which admits an annual pension, if founded on immovable property and secure.[69] The main underlying idea always is safety and sufficiency. Hence even a State pension, provided it is sufficient, may be accepted as a titulus ordinationis, because such a title ordinarily is as safe as any other.

LOSS AND LACK OF A TITLE

CAN. 980

§ 1. Ordinatus in sacris, si titulum amittat, alium sibi provideat, nisi, iudicio Episcopi, eius congruae sustentationi aliter cautum sit.

65 S. C. C., 1573, 1598, Nov. 29, 1670 (Richter, Trid., p. 114, nn. 16, 17, 19); Benedict XIV, Institut., 26, nn. XIII, XXVIII f.

66 S. C. C., Sept. 9, 1679 (Richter, l. c., n. 14).

67 Many, l. c., p. 348.

68 Trid., Sess. 21, c. 2, de ref.; v. Scherer, l. c., I, p. 362; Wernz, l. c., II, n. 92, p. 115, who adds "super bonis immobilibus fundatus sit," according to S. C. C., Oct. 2, 1707 (Richter, l. c., n. 20).

69 Cfr. S. C. C., June 21, 1629; S. C. P. F., April 27, 1871, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1369).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Qui, citra apostolicum indultum, suum subditum in sacris sine titulo canonico scienter ordinaverint aut ordinari permiserint, debent ipsi eorumque successores eidem egenti alimenta necessaria praebere, donec congruae eiusdem sustentationi aliter provisum fuerit.

§ 3. Si Episcopus aliquem ordinaverit sine titulo canonico cum pacto ut ordinatus non petat ab ipso alimenta, hoc pactum omni vi caret.

§ 1. If a clergyman in holy orders loses the title to which he was ordained, he must procure another, unless in the judgment of the bishop, he is well provided for in some other way.

The title to which one is ordained is mentioned at the act of ordination and is not liable to alienation, as has been repeatedly declared by the S. Congregation.[70] Hence a change of whatever kind must be notified to the local Ordinary, whose subject the clergyman is. If we say clergyman, we include religious, for the text simply says: ordinatus . . . si titulum amittat, thus including all titles: benefice, patrimony, pension, service, mission, mensa communis, and religious profession. Hence (1) if one loses the title of benefice he must procure another title, i.e., any one of those just mentioned. (2) This must be done with the express permission of the bishop, even though it is certain that the clergyman has a sufficient livelihood.[71] (3) The bishop may and should compel a clergyman who has lost the titulus missionis to procure another,[72] as stated above. (4) A religious who was ordained ad titulum mensae communis or ad religiosam professionem and loses this title must procure another; but in missionary countries such clergy-

70 Cfr. Richter, Trid., p. 113 f.

71 S. C. C., Feb. 9, 1726; Nov. 28, 1686; July 1687 (Richter, Trid., p. 113 f., nn. 7, 29).

72 S. C. P. F., April 27, 1871 n. 11 (Coll., n. 1369).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

men are only obliged to prove that they have sufficient means to live.[73] (5) If a patrimony assigned is changed into a benefice, the bishop's consent must be obtained, otherwise the change has no ecclesiastical effect.[74]

§ 2. Those who, without a previous Apostolic indult, have knowingly ordained, or permitted to be ordained, one of their subjects without a canonical title, are obliged to support the needy clergyman until he is otherwise provided with a living. This obligation also binds the successor of the prelate.[75]

The bishop who is here put under obligation is not the one who ordained the cleric, but the one of the subject ordained without a canonical title. The ordination must have been performed with full knowledge of the fact that there was no canonical title, i.e., one acknowledged by the Church. If the bishop has been deceived by the ordinand or his parents, he is not obliged to support the cleric. On the other hand, if he was aware of the want of a canonical title, not only he himself, but his successor, is under that obligation. The term successor here includes the chapter, the Vicar Capitular or Administrator as well as the next bishop.[76] The obligation is limited by the condition of the clergyman and also as to duration. If the clergyman is not really in need, but has some other means of sustenance, no matter of what kind, so it be but becoming to the clerical state, the obligation ceases. It also ceases as soon as the state of need ceases. The bishop must defray this expense either from his personal income or from the mensa episcopalis, if there is such a one attached to his see.

73 Ibid. and S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 20, 1838 (Bizzarri, Collect., p. 83 f).

74 S. C. C., July 20, 1619; Nov. 16, 1686 (Richter, l. c., nn. 21, 28).

75 Cfr. c. 6, Conc. Chalced., c. 1, Dist. 70; cc. 4, 16, X, III, 5.

76 Reiffenstuel, l. I, tit. 11, n. 191 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. If a bishop has ordained a cleric without a canonical title, with the mutual agreement that the ordinand should not demand any support of him, the stipulation is void.

Such a practice would savor of simony, and the text from which the Code took this law, actually belongs to the title on simony.[77] The penalty is suspension from conferring orders for one year and is reserved to the Holy See.[78]

TITULI SERVITII ET MISSIONIS

CAN. 981

§ 1. Si ne unus quidem ex titulis de quibus in can. 979, § 1, praesto sit, suppleri potest titulo servitii dioecesis, et, in locis Sacrae Congregationi de Prop. Fide subiectis, titulo missionis, ita tamen ut ordinandus, iureiurando interposito, se devoveat perpetuo dioecesis aut missionis servitio, sub Ordinarii loci pro tempore auctoritate.

§ 2. Ordinarius presbytero, quem promoverit titulo servitii ecclesiae vel missionis, debet beneficium vel officium vel subsidium, ad congruam eiusdem sustentationem sufficiens, conferre.

If none of the three titles,— benefice, patrimony, pension,— is available the title of the service of the diocese, or, in the provinces subject to the S. C. Propanda, the titulus missionis may be substituted. However, in both cases the ordinand must make oath that he will permanently serve the diocese or mission under the jurisdiction of the respective local Ordinary. The Ordinary owes to the one promoted to the title of service or mission either 77 C. 45, X, V, 3. 78 See can. 2373, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a benefice or an office or a subsidy affording him sufficient support.

The titulus servitii Ecclesiae was first introducted under Eugene IV (1431–1447), who granted this privilege to the metropolitan of Florence. Later it was also permitted to the City of Mexico, under the title of administration, and as such was acknowledged by the Latin American Council of 1899.[79] The titulus missionis, which is only another form of the titulus servitii Ecclesiae, was first granted to the Irish College in Rome and then extended to other colleges under the Propaganda.[80] It was the usual title to which the clergy of the U. S. were ordained while we were under the jurisdiction of the said Congregation. When the S. C. Consistorialis, A.D. 1909, transferred the American, Irish and Scotch colleges in Rome to its own jurisdiction, it changed the titulus missionis into titulus servitii.[81] Since 1908, America and Great Britain also belong to the jurisdiction of the S. C. Consistorialis, and the titulus missionis is changed into that of service of the diocese, acknowledged not as canonical in the strict sense, but as legal or ecclesiastical; therefore no special faculties are needed to ordain one on this title.

1. Both the titulus servitii and the titulus missionis are subsidiary or extraordinary titles, which may only be used when there is none of the other three (benefice, patrimony, pension) available, and consequently should be employed only with discretion and for candidates who give manifest signs of a priestly vocation.[82]

79 Lingen-Reuss, Causae Selectae, p. 3; A. S. S., 12, 569; Acta et Decreta Conc. Lat. Am., 1900, p. 254, n. 582.

80 Urban VIII, "Sacrosanctae," April 12, 1631; May 18, 1638.

81 S. C. Consist., Nov. 12, 1908; Aug. 6, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 148 ff; 678 ff.).

82 S. C. P. F. April 27, 1871, nn. 3, 6, 7 (Coll., n. 1369).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Before they are ordained subdeacons, the ordinands must promise under oath to devote themselves to the permanent service of the diocese or mission for which they are ordained.

3. This oath, the formula of which has been remodelled,[83] excludes entrance into a religious community without the special permission of the Holy See, which is granted either by the S. Cong. Consist., if one was ordained to the title of service, or by the S. Cong. Propaganda, if ordained to the title of mission.

4. By common law both titles are restricted to the respective diocese or the mission for which one was ordained, and the oath also is limited. In consequence no one could formerly, without a special indult from the S. Congregation, pass from one diocese or mission to another.[84] However, the bishops of England obtained an Apostolic indult that permitted one ordained for a certain diocese to be transferred to another diocese of the same ecclesiastical province without taking a new oath and without recourse to the Holy See. This indult was later extended to the dioceses of the U. S. and may still be made use of in both countries because it has not been expressly revoked by our canon.[85]

5. Either title may be supplanted by another, for instance, patrimony or pension. However, this change requires permission from the Holy See. If the title on which a priest was ordained is lost, and not supplanted by another, he is not suspended, but the Ordinary must compel him to procure another title.[86]

83 S. C. Consist., Aug. 6, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 686).

84 S. C. P. F., April 27, 1871, n. 13; Feb. 4, 1873, ad 4 (Coll., nn. 1369, 1394).

85 S. C. P. F., Aug. 18, 1885.

86 S. C. P. F., Aug. 18, Nov. 30, 1885 (Coll., n. 1641); can. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLES FOR RELIGIOUS

CAN. 982

§ 1. Pro regularibus titulus canonicus est sollemnis religiosa professio seu titulus, ut dicitur, paupertatis.

§ 2. Pro religiosis votorum simplicium perpetuorum est titulus mensa communis, Congregationis aliusve similis, ad normam constitutionum.

§ 3. Ceteri religiosi, etiam ad ordinationis titulum quod attinet, iure saecularium reguntur.

§ 1. For regulars, the canonical title is that of solemn religious profession, or, as it is called, poverty.[87]

The Council of Chalcedon (can. 6) called this title titulus monasterii,[88] which is a juridical term, because under Justinian law[89] the monastery was a corporation responsible for the maintenance of its members. When the more centralized orders of the Mendicants arose, this title was necessarily transferred either to the province or to the order, and called religious poverty. Salva reverentia it may be permitted to say that this term has little justification in juridico-canonical language. It is for this reason, no doubt, that our Code adds: ut dicitur.

The title paupertatis is strictly limited to regulars, to wit, members of religious orders with solemn vows, and to solemn profession. Hence clerics belonging to orders whose members are only simply or temporarily professed, cannot be ordained on the title of religious profession.[90] This applies also to regulars working on the missions that are under the jurisdiction of the Propaganda.[91]

87 S. C. P. F., April 27, 1871, n. 11 (Coll., n. 1369).

88 C. 1, Dist. 70.

89 Cod. Just., I, 3.

90 Auctis admodum, Nov. 4, 1892, n. 1.

91 S. C. P. F., April 27, 1871, n. 4 (Coll., n. 1369).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. For religious of simple perpetual vows, the title is that of mensae communis, or congregationis, or a similar one, according to their own Constitutions.

This title is not called canonical in our text, but is legalized or acknowledged as valid for all congregations whose members take simple perpetual vows. Formerly it needed a special privilege or indult, for which each religious congregation, even though exempt, had to apply to the Holy See.[92]

This title signifies the same as that of religious profession, to wit, the claim to decent support. If it is lost, either by dismissal or withdrawal from the community, the Ordinary may suspend such an ex-religious, unless he has acquired another title sufficient for decent support.[93]

§ 3. All other religious fall under the common law of the Church, so far as the title of ordination is concerned. Hence

1.° Religious with purely temporary vows cannot be ordained subdeacons unless they have a canonical title, or one acknowledged by law, as prescribed for the secular clergy;[94]

2.° Novices are bound by the same law as the secular clergy;

3.° Members of religious societies without vows must obey the law laid down for the secular clergy, unless they have a special privilege.[95]

92 S. C. P. F., ibid., Leo XIII, "Conditae," Dec. 8, 1900, § 2, n. 6.

93 S. C. EE. et RR., Dec. 20, 1838 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 84).

94 S. C. super Statu Regul., Jan. 20, 1860 ad 1 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 858 f.).

95 As to the penalty, see can. 2373, 3°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ART. II

IRREGULARITIES AND OTHER IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 983

Nullum impedimentum perpetuum quod venit nomine irregularitatis, sive ex defectu sit ex delicto, contrahitur, nisi quod fuerit in canonibus qui sequuntur expressum.

No permanent impediment which comes under the name of irregularity, whether it arises from a mere defect or from a crime, is incurred, unless it is expressly stated in the following canons.

The legislator has laid down (can. 968) a distinction between irregularity and simple canonical impediment. Now he determines the source or origin whence irregularity may be known or gathered — the fons cognoscendi. This is the Code, and the Code only. Indirectly this canon insinuates the power that may set up an irregularity. It is the common or universal law, or the Sovereign Pontiff, the legislator of the universal Church, who alone can lay down laws for all the clergy. The clergy is the same wherever the Church exists, and requires essentially the same qualities in all its members, and uniformity of discipline in this very important matter is absolutely required, lest some should seek exemption or admission into a laxer province.[96] The proposition that the Pope is the sole competent law-giver must not be understood as implying that custom[97] or particular synods did not contribute to the establishment of irregularities. For,

[96] Phillips, K.-R., 1845; Vol. I, 411 f.

[97] Wernz, Ius Decret., Vol. II, n. 97, p. 124 f. (ed. 1).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

like any other merely ecclesiastical law, that concerning irregularities had its genesis and development. Since the completion of the Decretals no new irregularities have been added.

The enumeration of irregularities in our Code is to be understood taxative, i.e., as full and complete. No others are admitted; nor can new ones be established by any bishop, for single bishops are not competent to make laws for the universal Church. And irregularities belong to universal or common law.

The canon distinguishes between irregularity ex defectu and ex delicto. This distinction is first found in a decretal of Innocent III, where the note or mark of crime, and the mark of mere defect, are clearly kept apart.[98]

Irregularities are, first and above all, a safeguard of the dignity of the sacred ministry, not a penalty. It is true that the cause of an irregularity may be a crime, and that the irregularity itself may therefore appear as a penalty. But still the penal element attached to an irregularity is not primarily intended by the Church, but only accessorily or secondarily[99] and per modum concomitantiae. The primary intent is to safeguard the sacred ministry from profanation, as stated above. This primary intention appears more clearly in the irregularities ex defectu, which are not imputable to those affected by them. The Church wants her ministers to be blameless in every respect, like the bodyguard of a king, whose members are "drafted" from among the most capable of his subjects.

Concerning the historical development, it may be noted that some irregularities were established from the very 98 C. 14, X, V, 34, de purgatione canonica.

99 Wernz, l. c., II, n. 96, p. 121.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

beginning of the Church, as the pastoral letters of St. Paul testify. No doubt the Mosaic Law furnished some prototypes for the priesthood of the New Testament, although the old ceremonial law could not essentially influence the New Dispensation.

IRREGULARITIES EX DEFECTU

CAN. 984

Sunt irregulares ex defectu:

1°. Illegitimi, sive illegitimitas sit publica sive occulta, nisi fuerint legitimati vel vota sollemnia professi;

2°. Corpore vitiati qui secure propter debilitatem, vel decenter propter deformitatem, altaris ministerio defungi non valeant. Ad impediendum tamen exercitium ordinis legitime recepti, gravior requiritur defectus, neque ob hunc defectum prohibentur actus qui rite poni possunt;

3°. Qui epileptici vel amentes vel a daemone possessi sunt vel fuerunt; quod si post receptos ordines tales evaserint et iam liberos esse certo constet, Ordinarius potest suis subditis receptorum ordinum exercitium rursus permittere;

4°. Bigami, qui nempe duo vel plura matrimonia valida successive contraxerunt;

5°. Qui infamia iuris notantur;

6°. Iudex qui mortis sententiam tulit;

7°. Qui munus carnificis susceperint eorumque voluntarii ac immediati ministri in exsecutione capitalis sententiae.

Irregular in consequence of a defect are:

1.° Those of illegitimate birth, no matter whether their

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

illegitimacy be public or occult, unless they have been legitimated or made solemn profession.

The tenth and eleventh centuries are known for disciplinary relaxation and for a low conception, or at least an imperfect practice, of sacerdotal celibacy. To check the evil, the filii presbyterorum were first excluded from entering the clerical state, or at least from succeeding their progenitors in ecclesiastical benefices.[1] Gradually, however, the note of illegitimacy was extended to all born out of lawful wedlock.[2] What illegitimacy means, as well as the mode of legitimation, has been explained elsewhere.[3]

Excepted from this rule are those who have been legitimated either by a subsequent marriage, or by a papal rescript. Note, however, that legitimation does not permit one to become a bishop or Cardinal,[4] whereas inferior prelacies are not excluded from its effects.

Besides, as the Decretals had already enacted, religious profession removes the stain of illegitimacy. But this effect only follows solemn profession and extends only to the priesthood inclusively, all, even regular prelatures being excluded.[5]

The text says: no matter whether the illegitimacy be public or occult. We here take these two terms in the same sense as public and occult impediments; the difference lying in the fact whether it can or cannot be proved in court.[6] The mere fact is sufficient to debar one from receiving orders. The judgment of the Church is milder if illegitimacy is doubtful, and canonists hold that expositi or foundlings, for instance, are not to be re-

1 C. 12, Dist. 56.
2 Cfr. X, I, 17; C. 13, X, IV, 17.
3 Cfr. can. 1114 f.
4 Cfr. can. 331, § 1, n. 1; can. 232, § 2, n. 1.
5 C. 1, X, I, 17: "praelationem vero nullatenus habeant."
6 Can. 1037.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

garded as illegitimate. Yet the practice rather favors dispensatio ad cautelam.[7] Illegitimacy is not to be extended to the second generation. If the son was born legitimately, it makes no difference whether his father was born legitimately or illegitimately.[8]

2.° Men who are defective in body or who, on account of weakness, cannot safely, or on account of deformity, cannot becomingly perform the functions of the altar. A greater defect is required to prohibit one from exercising an order already lawfully received, than for receiving a new order, nor are clerics forbidden by reason of such a defect to perform functions which they can properly perform.

The reason for this defectus corporis is incapability of ministering at the altar properly and the danger of exciting derision on the part of those present. The text simply says corpore vitiati, and refers every function to the ministry of the altar. Some examples may illustrate the text.

(a) If one has not the necessary stature to reach the altar properly, he would certainly be irregular.[9]

(b) One who is minus a hand or a finger which are necessary for handling the sacred species, is irregular. This is the case if thumb and index finger are missing. In cases where the hand was complete, but a great stiffness of the arm, caused by apoplexy or paralysis, rendered the breaking of the host or the making of the sign of the cross impossible, the S. Congregation denied a dispensation.[10]

7 C. un. X, V, 11; Phillips, l. c., I, p. 530; Wernz, l. c., II, n. 132, p. 184.

8 S. C. C., Nov. 9, 1647; Jan. 23, 1610 (Richter, Trid., p. 465, nn. 6, 7).

9 Barbosa, De Off. et Pot. Epi., P. II, alleg. 42, n. 53; but the S. C. C., July 12, 1721 (Richter, l. c., 340, n. 13) in one case left it to the judgment of the bishop.

10 S. C. C., May 6, 1775; Dec. 19, 1772; July 28, 1770 (Richter, l. c., nn. 18, 17, 16).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) Concerning the eyesight, irregularity certainly exists where there is complete blindness or loss of the vis visiva. Thus, if one had such feeble eyesight as not to be able to read the Missal, and if the defect were incurable, no dispensation for receiving holy orders would likely be granted, even though the petitioner would be useful and his services needed for the diocese or some charitable institution.[11] If the left or "canonical eye" is strong and sound, irregularity can not be asserted, but a man having the use of only one eye is certainly irregular.

(d) As to the sense of hearing, those who are completely deaf or dumb are irregular. The same is true of those who stammer in a very offensive manner.[12]

(e) A special class is that of the deformed, who are destitute of a limb and thereby rendered abnormal. To this class belong all who lack the nose, or an arm, or a leg, or who suffer from gout or paralysis so that they appear stooped or are unable to make a genuflection; also those who limp considerably, or are lame. In this latter case the degree of scandal or ridicule must be considered.[13]

The text says that the defect must be greater if one has been already promoted to sacred orders, to inhibit the exercise of that order.[14] But if the defect is too great, neither permission nor dispensation may be expected. Thus a dispensation was denied to a priest who 11 S. C. C., Sept. 17, 1814 (Richter, l. c., n. 25); May 19, 1906 (Anal., Eccl., XIV, 199 f.); see c. 7, X, I, 20; c. 2, X, III, 6.

12 S. C. C., April 14, 1832 (Richter, l. c., n. 28): notabiliter balbutiens, fit neither for administering the Sacraments nor for teaching; S. C. C., Jan. 25, 1806 (Richter, l. c., n. 22): "auditus et vocis vitio," unfit for chanting the Mass or hearing confessions.

13 S. C. C., Jan. 20, 1798; Jan. 28, 1832; May 25, 1833 (Richter, l. c., nn. 20, 27, 29).

14 S. C. C., May 5. 1775, et pluries (Richter, l. c., n. 12).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

could stand on his feet only during the consecration,[15] whereas another who was blind and could say Mass with the assistance of another priest was granted a dispensation, since there was no other church to say Mass and the priest was poor.[16]

3.° Epileptics, the insane and possessed, who are now or have formerly been in this condition. If they have become afflicted after ordination and recovered their health, the Ordinary may permit them again to exercise the orders they had received. As to epilepsy, the medical authorities[17] tell us that it has many and different forms: convulsions in which patients fall down, attacks which occur only at night, epilepsy in which the physical signs are almost entirely lacking, ambulatory epilepsy, etc. All are attributable to nervous disease. The same is true of insanity.

Diabolic possession was in former times often confounded with epilepsy.

As to epilepsy, the S. Congregation, as a general rule, demanded the testimony of a conscientious physician regarding the nature and progress of the disease, and subsequent freedom from attacks, which has to continue from one to two years at least. In cases where the attacks occurred only at long intervals, dispensation was sometimes granted, sometimes refused.[18] Hence the rule stated above is safe to follow. The same may be applied to insanity and possession, though in one case the S. C. denied a dispensation even though the patient had had no attack for three years.[19] The term Ordinary here

15 S. C. C., Dec. 18, 1841 (ibid., n. 31).

16 S. C. C., Aug. 23, 1727 (ibid., 15).

17 See O'Malley-Walsh, Essays in Pastoral Medicine, p. 251 ff.

18 S. C. C., Aug. 25, 1905; Nov. 24, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., L, XIII, 370 f.; L. XIV, 436 f).

19 S. C. C., Dec. 2, 1724 (Richter, l. c., p. 340, n. 10); in one instance the S. C. C., April 27, 1816 (Richter,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google includes the major superiors of exempt religious.

4.° Bigamists, who have validly and successively contracted two or more marriages. The reason for this law is stated in can. 1142. Note, however, that bigamia interpretativa or simultanea no longer entails irregularity. Those only are called bigamists, who after the first valid marriage has been dissolved, either by a dispensation a matrimonio rato, or by death, have married a second time and oftener. Whether the application of the Pauline Privilege would also count, seems doubtful.[20]

5.° Those who have incurred infamia iuris, loss of reputation or good name as stated in the law. Infamia iuris is a penalty inflicted on certain crimes expressly mentioned in the law,[21] either ecclesiastical or civil. The ecclesiastical law mentions several crimes as involving infamy ipso facto.[22] If a declaration is required to the effect that one is looked upon as infamous, infamy is not actually incurred until this declaration has been expressly made.[23] Infamy induced by civil law doubtless entails irregularity.[24]

6.° A judge who has pronounced sentence of death.

7.° Those who have held the office of executioners and all their voluntary and immediate helpers in the execution of capital punishment.

These two irregularities are styled ex defectu lenitatis, as they are supposed to indicate a lack of gentleness. It seems meet that the representatives of Christ, who was the meekest and gentlest of men, should be endowed with this preëminently Christian quality, which appears

n. 11) required ten years' freedom from attack, but the petitioner had followed a military career.

20 Because Baptism wipes out every stain, and bigamy certainly must be considered a personally contracted stain.

21 Can. 2293.

22 Canons 2320, 2328, 2343, 2351, 2356, 2357.

23 Canons 2314, 2359.

24 Cfr. Wernz, II, n. 130, p. 177; Gasparri, l. c., n. 240 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

notably wanting in all who coöperate, although without any fault of their own, in the infliction of capital punishment.[25] The Code restricts the defects formerly enumerated under this heading to strict coöperation in carrying out the death sentence. The assistants must act as helpers of the hangman or electrocutioner voluntarily, i.e., of their own accord, and immediately, whereas the job of the hangman is itself sufficient to involve irregularity. Soldiers or policemen who guard the place of execution do not incur irregularity; neither do priests and ministers of justice who assist or witness the act.[26]

IRREGULARITIES EX DELICTO

The pastoral letters of St. Paul form the foundation of the ecclesiastical discipline, which, however, wavered and changed considerably in course of time. "Having no crime,"[27] was the warning of the Apostle to Timothy when ordaining ministers of the New Dispensation. A crime in legal parlance always supposes a public or at least externally committed deed, which for one reason or another disturbs the public order and is offensive to those who witness it. Crime and sin must be and were distinguished from the beginning.[28] Baptism indeed wipes out sin and crime, but the fomes peccati remains. It seemed unbecoming that men who had committed one of the grosser crimes that were punished with special penances in the early Church, should be elevated to the sacred ministry. Three crimes (apostasia, moechia, and homicidium) were singled out as deserving of public 25 Cfr. c. 8, Dist. 50; c. 1, Dist. 51; S. C. C., April 22, 1673, Zamboni, Collect., II, 320, n. 3; May 14, 1825 (Lingen-Reuss, Causae Selectae, p. 113).

26 Soldiers are here not mentioned, but they may fall under the following heading.

27 Cfr. I, Tim. III, 10; Tit. 1, 6 f.; Phillips, K.-R., I, 550 f.

28 See the Dictum Gratiani ad Dist. 25.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

penance, which latter almost automatically excluded one from embracing the ministry.[29] As the Church spread, her discipline grew milder and many aspirants to the clerical state did not measure up to the primitive, rather severe requirements. This compelled the Church to mitigate her former restrictions with regard to admission to the priesthood. Yet the principle of decency and blamelessness was retained intact.

CAN. 985

Sunt irregulares ex delicto:

1°. Apostatae a fide, haeretici, schismatici;

2°. Qui, praeterquam in casu extremae necessitatis, baptismum ab acatholicis quovis modo sibi conferri siverunt;

3°. Qui matrimonium attentare aut civilem tantum actum ponere ausi sunt, vel ipsimet vinculo matrimoniali aut ordine sacro aut votis religiosis etiam simplicibus ac temporariis ligati, vel cum muliere iisdem votis adstricta aut matrimonio valido coniuncta;

4°. Qui voluntarium homicidium perpetrarunt aut fetus humani abortum procuraverunt, effectu secuto, omnesque cooperantes;

5°. Qui seipsos vel alios mutilaverunt vel sibi vitam adimere tentaverunt;

6°. Clerici medicam vel chirurgicam artem sibi vetitam exercentes, si exinde mors sequatur;

7°. Qui actum ordinis, clericis in ordine sacro constitutis reservatum, ponunt, vel eo ordine carentes, vel ab eius exercitio poena canonica sive personali, medicinali aut vindicativa, sive locali prohibiti.

Irregularity arising from crime is incurred by [29] Cfr. c. 4, Dist. 81 (Conc. Nic. I, can. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Apostates from the faith, heretics, and schismatics. These three classes were always barred from holy orders. Remark that the canon mentions only actual apostates, etc., and that can. 986 determines the extent of this crime.

2. Whoever has allowed himself in any way to be baptized by non-Catholics, except in case of extreme necessity. This cause of irregularity, which is now considerably modified, was formerly called abusus baptismi. The text says siverunt, who have permitted themselves,—which supposes that they were at least aware of the non-Catholic character of the Baptism. Therefore we may safely say that adults only are here to be understood. But the word "adults" must be interpreted according to can. 745, § 2, n. 2, which says that with regard to baptism all those are called adults who have attained the use of reason.[30] The term siverunt also excludes violent or fraudulent Baptism administered by a non-Catholic.

The expression non-Catholic includes the members of every heretical or schismatical sect, ministers as well as laymen, men and women, vitandi and non-vitandi.[31] Quovis modo, in whatever manner, refers to the mode of baptism, whether it be solemn or private, public or secret.

Extreme necessity is certainly present where there is danger of death and no other person than a non-Catholic is available. But even in that case the danger of perversion must be absent, or at least very remote.[32]

3.° Those who have attempted marriage, or got married before the civil court whilst they were bound by marital ties, or by sacred orders, or by religious, even

30 Cfr. c. 3, c. 1, q. 4.
31 Wernz, l. c., II, n. 134, p. 191.
32 Thesaurus-Giraldi, De Poenis Eccl., 1831, p. 107 (P. II, c. 5, Baptis).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google though only simple or temporary vows, and also those (otherwise free) who have attempted marriage before the civil court with a woman bound by the matrimonial tie or by a religious vow.

This canon, as formulated, is to some extent new, though similar to the old law regarding bigamia interpretativa and similitudinaria, which were enumerated among the irregularities ex defectu. The two classes thus rendered irregular comprise:

(a) Married men who attempt marriage with another woman, whether a virgin or a widow, or legally divorced. The attempt, however, must be serious, and possess the semblance and figure of marriage. Note that the text does not require consummation of the marriage.[33] On the other hand mere concubinage does not constitute irregularity on this score.[34]

(b) Clergymen in sacris, or religious with simple, even only temporary, vows, who attempt marriage or to get married before the civil court. This was called bigamia similitudinaria, being a carnal marriage [35] contracted after a spiritual espousal. Here, however, a distinction must be made. Whereas the clergy in sacred orders and solemnly professed religious cannot validly contract, but at most attempt a marriage, i.e., have the civil act performed, those with simple vows may contract validly, but incur irregularity unless they are dispensed from the simple vows and get married in facie Ecclesiae. It would be irreconcilable with the discipline of the Church, who dispenses from simple vows, to hold that irregularity follows religious who are lawfully dispensed from their vows, or who contract marriage after 33 This was implied in most of the ancient texts; c. 15, Dist. 34; c. 1, X, I, 21.

34 C. 6, X, I, 21.

35 Wernz, II, p. 101, justly observes that the texts are not sufficiently clear to establish this irregularity.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the lapse of temporary vows (can. 637). Therefore the term ligati must be taken in sensu composito, not in sensu diviso, to use a well-known distinction.

(c) Men who attempt to contract marriage with any woman who is under religious or marital obligation to the same extent, i.e., a religious with solemn or simple vows, as long as these bind, or a married woman, as long as the marital tie has not been duly dissolved. We say men, not clergymen, or religious, or married men, but men who are otherwise free to marry. This regulation was made for the preservation and honor of the sacred ministry no less than for that of the religious and the married state. Here, too, the old idea of similitudinarian bigamy may be traced.

4.° Those who have committed voluntary homicide or procured the abortion of a human fetus, if these acts were effective; also all who have coöperated in these crimes.

The Church has always had a special horror of homicide[36] and crimes of a similar nature. Our canon mentions two kinds, viz.:

(a) Voluntary homicide, which is a morally imputable action resulting in the death of a man. This definition includes within its scope all who, either personally or by command, kill another human being. Morally imputable means that the act was committed with deliberation and for a reason which cannot stand before the court of conscience.[37] Hence a mere accidental killing (homicidium casuale) cannot be imputed to the human agent. If a boy awkwardly handles a shotgun, which goes off and kills his sister, the boy is not irregular.[38]

36 Cfr. X, V, 10–12; cc. 36 ff., Dist. 50; Gasparri, l. c., n. 405 ff.

37 Cc. 2, 3, 10, X, V, 12; c. 3, 6°, V. 4.

38 S. C. C., July 3, 1677 (Anal. Eccl., XIII, 134); cfr. c. 48, 51, Dist. 50.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But if one inflicts a wound with a knife, and the injured person dies from the effects of that wound, homicide must be imputed, because death immediately resulted from an illicit and unjust act, even though the intention of killing was absent.[39] If a man kills another in self-defence, if he neither intended the other's death nor could ward it off by any other expedient, he does not incur irregularity. However, since there is danger of excesses being committed in self-defense (cum excessu moderaminis inculpatae tutelae), provisional dispensation must be asked for in such cases. This is more readily granted if the assault was not provoked and no other way of escape was open.[40] But revengeful killing, although provoked by the assailant, would hardly be considered worthy of a dispensation. Irregularity is also incurred by knowingly and unnecessarily performing a dangerous action or engaging in a perilous amusement which results in the death of another.[41]

(b) Those who perform an abortion on a human being incur irregularity, provided, of course, the act is committed, not accidentally or unawares, but intentionally or through grievous culpability, even though by accident.[42] The aborted fetus must be a fetus humanus, and, as is generally added, animatus, i. e., a living human fetus. We were surprised to see no reference, among Card. Gas-

39 S. C. C., May 21, 1763 (Richter, Trid., p. 92 f. n. 2). A passage reads: "Homicidium voluntarium non est solum, quando occidens explicite vult occidere, sed etiam quando eius voluntas tendit in eum actum, ex quo per se ac immediate mors sequitur, non per accidens, uti contingit in eo, qui alium percutit, volens ei iniuriam irrogare, sed non occidere; si enim ex percussione mors sequatur, dicitur homicida voluntarius, cum voluntas percutientis feratur in percussionem, et in omne id quod immediate fuit secutum."

40 S. C. C., March 12, 1763; May 18, 1726; Aug. 6, 1808 (Richter, p. 92, nn. 6, 8, 9).

41 S. C. C., Sept. 24, 1718; April 19, 1738 (Richter l. c., nn. 7, 10).

42 Sixtus V, "Effraenatum," Oct. 29, 1588, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parri's quotations, to the Constitution of Gregory XIV, "Sedes Apostolica," of May 31, 1591, which restricted irregularity and penalties to the fetus animatus, as the old law had it.[43] However, said Constitution is quoted under can. 2350, § 1. We believe that the unanimous teaching of the school should not be set aside, especially since the wording fetus humanus can only signify a living fetus. Animation, as stated before, takes place within the first week after conception.[44] Theologians as well as canonists admit that the old theory concerning animation may still be held as far as the incurring of penalties and irregularities is concerned. This theory is that between the conception and the animation of a male fetus forty days, and of a female fetus, eighty days elapse. As long as no authentic declaration has been issued, the strict interpretation applied to penal laws may be followed here, and the period of forty, respectively eighty days be admitted.[45] At any rate, we cannot scientifically speak of a human fetus before the lapse of six days after conception.

(c) Effectu secuto means that death must have actually resulted from the act of killing or abortion, because there must be a connection between cause and effect.

(d) The cooperantes are those who formally, not merely in a material way, command, counsel or assist in the act of homicide or abortion. The coöperation must, therefore, be deliberate and external, and death must be foreseen. The excuse that he did not intend to kill would not free anyone from the guilt of coöperation if his action

43 C. 2, X, V, 12 (quoted by Card. Gasparri).

44 Cfr. can. 746 f. We cannot accept Eschbach's assertion (Disp. Phys.-Theol., p. 192) that there is no distinction between conception and animation; for it takes at least from four hours to six days until segmentation is complete, and only after six days the embryo becomes a fetus.

45 Cfr. c. 12, X, V, 12; Wernz, II, n. 147, p. 208.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

was such that he could have foreseen that it would cause death. But the cooperantes incur irregularity only if their coöperation was efficacious, i. e., if it really helped to bring about the death of the victim.[46] Physicians or druggists who give or sell medicine for the purpose of causing abortion are cooperatores, and in an even higher degree surgeons who perform an operation solely for that purpose. A midwife, husband, or father are guilty of cooperation if they give poison or strong medicine to a pregnant woman or beat or burden her so as to cause abortion.[47] On the other hand, the manufacture and sale of contraceptives, though criminal, does not induce irregularity. If several persons would plot against the life of another, but only one would actually kill him, all would be irregular if it were unknown who was the murderer.[48]

5. Those who have mutilated themselves or others or have attempted suicide. By mutilation authors generally understand the cutting off of a member which has a specific function to perform in the human body, e. g., the nose, or an eye, or an ear, or a hand, or a foot. Hence it would not be mutilation to cut off a finger, or a knuckle, or to knock out a tooth.[49] By self-mutilation is here understood the castratio sui ipsius, which was so severely reprimanded in Origen.[50] But the term seipsos must not be pressed, as if irregularity would be incurred only if a person actually performed the operation on himself. To have it done by a physician is just as imputable, nor does it matter for what motive one perpetrates this foolish act. The "religious zeal" that inspires such an 46 Reiffenstuel, V, tit. 12, nn. 27 ff.; cfr. can. 2209.

47 Sixtus V, "Effraenatum," Oct. 3, 1588, § 3.

48 C. 5, X, V, 12; can. 2211, 2231; Wernz II, n. 147, p. 209. An operation performed for the purpose of preventing pregnancy does not induce irregularity.

49 Reiffenstuel, V, 12, n. 55 ff.

50 C. 7, Dist. 55 (Conc. Nic. I., c. 1); c. 4 f., Dist. 55; c. 4, X, I, 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google act is deleterious. Yet we believe, in view of can. 986, which excuses from irregularity [51] when no mortal sin is involved, one who has castrated himself might de facto be declared immune from irregularity. But provisional dispensation would certainly be advisable.

As to attempts to commit suicide no comment is required except what we have just said in connection with can. 986. An attempt at suicide committed in an abnormal mental or nervous state, would be unimputable, and therefore would not involve irregularity.

It may have surprised the reader that not a word is said about soldiers, especially clergymen who served as such in the recent war. A decree of the S. C. Consistorialis, Oct. 25, 1918 ("Redeuntibus"), says the defectus lenitatis attaches to clergymen who were compelled to kill and mutilate,[52] but the Ordinary may grant a dispensation from it, unless the clergymen volunteered for active service in the war, in which case dispensation is reserved to the Holy See. By volunteering for military service these clerics have tacitly also resigned their office or benefice. The decree draws no distinction between just and unjust, offensive and defensive war. Formerly [53] it was generally thought that in an unjust war all soldiers, laymen as well as clerics, were irregular, if any one was killed. However, common soldiers are not easily persuaded that they are fighting in an unjust cause, and who is to be the impartial judge in such a case? It is therefore more reasonable to say that neither lay soldiers nor clergymen soldiers incur irregularity by the mere fact of fighting and killing if compelled to do so by 51 Formerly this action induced irregularity ex defectu, and it may still involve it, if the two reasons hold; but castratio could not be styled such a defect.

52 A. Ap. S., X, 481 ff.

53 Cfr. Benedict XIV, Institut., 101, n. 16 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the public authorities, but a general dispensatio ad cautelam should be asked for or given as is done in the aforesaid decree. Can. 141 is not to be neglected, however.

6. Clerics who practice medicine or surgery, both of which are forbidden to them, if death results from their practice.

Can. 139, § 2, requires an Apostolic indult for the exercise of the medical profession by clerics. If they practice without an indult, they transgress the law of the Church, and therefore act illicitly. Hence if they kill any one, even accidentally and after due preparation, they become irregular.[54] Clerics who have obtained an Apostolic indult cannot be said to practice unlawfully, and therefore, even if death should occur at their hands, no irregularity would follow.

7. Those who, without having received an order, perform an act which is reserved to clerics in higher orders, or who, without having received an order, or having been forbidden to exercise an order duly received, either by a canonical sentence inflicted on their person by a censure or vindictive penalty, or on the place where they exercise it.

This number comprises the two irregularities called abusus ordinis and ex capite violatae censurae.

a) Abuse of orders is here strictly limited to higher orders, from subdeaconship onward. Hence if a layman exercises one of the minor orders, he is not now [55] irregular. A lector who exercises the office of acolyte is not irregular, even though he has not yet received the acolytate.[56] On the other hand if a layman, or a cleric in minor orders, would knowingly, solemnly, and seri-

54 Cfr. c. 7, X, I, 14; c. 19, X, V, 12.

55 Formerly he was; c. 1, X, V, 28; Gasparri, l. c., n. 233 f.

56 Cfr. cc. 1, 2, X, V, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ously act as subdeacon; or if a subdeacon not yet ordained to the diaconate would act as deacon, they would incur irregularity. To serve as subdeacon without the maniple, or to serve as deacon at Mass without the stole, would not incur irregularity, because these vestments are the proper insignia of the respective orders.[57]

The actus ordinis is an act of a higher order. Such acts (priestly functions) are forbidden to clergymen in lower orders. Thus saying Mass is a strictly sacerdotal function. So is hearing confession, though it also involves an act of jurisdiction, and therefore a cleric not yet ordained a priest would be irregular if he were to attempt it.[58] A deacon solemnly baptizing without permission from the Ordinary or pastor would not be irregular.[59]

b) Irregular by violation of a censure or vindictive penalty are those who are personally under a canonical sentence. Censures are: excommunication, suspension from orders, and personal interdict. However, suspension may also be inflicted as a vindictive penalty.[60] But even in that case it must be declared as a suspension from orders, or as total suspension, i. e., suspension simply so-called.[61] An interdict may affect personally a clergyman in sacris, inasmuch as this censure follows him everywhere. Or again the interdict may be local, affecting a certain territory only, and persons only indirectly. If the interdict is local only, can. 2271 f. must be consulted. If a local interdict permits the celebration of divine services, the priest who says Mass in accordance with said canons would certainly not be irregular, whereas a per-57 How such clerics in minor orders should conduct themselves when acting as ministers of solemn Mass, see can. 1306.

58 C. 1, X, V, 28; Layman, l. c.

59 Gasparri, l. c., n. 339; Wernz, l. c., n. 137, p. 198

60 Can. 2298.

61 Can. 2278, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sonal interdict forbids the celebration of the divine office in any and every place. If, then, a clergyman in sacris thus censured or punished would seriously and solemnly exercise his order, he would incur irregularity.[62] This is also true if he were suspended ex informata conscientia and would exercise an act of orders while an appeal was pending, because such an appeal is permissible only in devolutivo.[63] But if a clergyman suspended in sacris, for instance, a deacon, would be ordained to the priesthood while suspended, he would not become irregular.[64]

HOW IRREGULARITY EX DELICTO IS INCURRED

CAN. 986

Haec delicta irregularitatem non pariunt, nisi fuerint gravia peccata, post baptismum perpetrata, salvo praescripto can. 985, n. 2, itemque externa, sive publica sive occulta.

These crimes do not produce irregularity, unless they are of the nature of a grievous sin committed after Baptism, and external, either public or occult, with due regard, of course, to can. 985, n. 2.

Hence no irregularity is incurred if the acts enumerated in can. 985 do not amount to a grievous sin,[65] as defined by theologians. For irregularity being a very serious, and if not a direct, at least an indirect penalty, the legislator naturally supposes a grievous fault. The text adds, "committed after Baptism," because Baptism wipes out every crime and sin.[66] The text makes an ex-

62 Cfr. c. 1, 6°, II, 14; cc. 1, 18, 20, 6°, V, 11; Gasparri, l. c., n. 356 ff.

63 S. C. P. F., Oct. 20, 1884 (Coll., n. 1628).

64 Layman, l. c., c. 3, n. 5.

65 C. 1, Dist. 81 (S. Aug.): "crimen est peccatum grave, accusatione et damnatione dignissimum."

66 C. 60, Dist. 50.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ception in favor of Baptism, which one may have administered to himself by a non-Catholic. But even this supposes a grievous fault, though naturally it could not be wiped out by Baptism, which has not yet been received.

The text further says: an external sin. Every crime is by its very nature external; i. e., deserving of or liable to accusation. Hence one may be an apostate, a heretic, a schismatic and sin grievously in his heart,— as long as he does not manifest his apostasy or heresy by an external act, he is not irregular. It is not required, however, that the crime be public, i. e., liable to be proved in an ecclesiastical court; even an occult crime suffices.[67]

Can. 987

Sunt simpliciter impediti:

1°. Filii acatholicorum, quandiu parentes in suo errore permanent;

2°. Viri uxorem habentes;

3°. Qui officium vel administrationem gerunt clericis vetitam cuius rationes reddere debeant, donec, deposito officio et administratione atque rationibus redditis, liberi facti sint;

4°. Servi servitute proprie dicta ante acceptam libertatem;

5°. Qui ad ordinarium militare servitium civili lege adstringuntur, antequam illud expleverint;

6°. Neophyti, donec, iudicio Ordinarii, sufficienter probati fuerint;

7°. Qui infamia facti laborant, dum ipsa, iudicio Ordinarii, perdurat.

67 The reason lies in the requirement of personal worthiness of the minister, which indirectly affects the public welfare of the Church; besides, an external act is liable to become known.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The following persons are incapable of receiving orders:

1.° The sons of non-Catholics, as long as their parents remain in their error. This was formerly called the defectus fidei confirmatae and comprised all male descendants of the paternal line to the second degree, and of the maternal line to the first degree. This was the Roman practice and obtained also in Germany and other countries where the prevailing religion was sectarian.[68] The Code, however, limits this impediment, which no longer involves irregularity, to the first degree, i. e., to the parents. If the parents have become converted to the Catholic faith at the time when their son is to be ordained, no impediment prevents him from receiving orders. But it certainly is required that both be converts, for the name parents comprises father and mother.[68a]

The question may arise: What if the parents died as heretics before the ordination of their son? It would seem that the impediment still exists, because a decision of the Holy Office says: "and the sons of heretics who remain in heresy or who died in heresy." [69] But this very decision permits us to adopt a milder view. It, like our text, says permanent, i. e., remaining or enduring until the time of the ordination. But when the parents are dead, their error cannot be said to remain. Besides the danger of perversion or returning to heresy by reason of filial attachment to the parents is precluded by their decease.

68 Clement VIII, ad ep. Pac., Oct. 6, 1593 (Richter, Trid., p. 339, n. 2); S. O., Dec. 4, 1890; March 6, 1891; Feb. 3, 1898, ad 2 et 3 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1744, 1748, 1990).

68a This is now certain by decree of Oct. 16, 1919 (A. Ap. S., XI, 478).

69 S. O., Dec. 4, 1890 (Coll., n. 1744).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Non-Catholic means any sect, Christian, pagan, or Jewish.[70]

2.° A man who has a wife cannot embrace the clerical state while the wife lives. We say, the clerical state, because a married man may not even receive the tonsure, unless his wife consents.[71] This impediment, which is part of the former irregularity ex defectu libertatis, exists only in the Latin Church and is connected with the law of celibacy.[72]

The consent of the wife must be freely given, and she must, moreover, herself enter the religious state, if she is not yet advanced in years, and make profession there, to enable the husband to receive higher orders.[73] As tonsure and minor orders should not be conferred unless the subject intends to ascend to higher orders, it may be said, broadly, that the wife must make religious profession if her husband wishes to enter the clerical state with her express consent. But if she is of advanced age, say past fifty, she may remain in the world, provided she takes the simple vow of chastity, and provided also the husband is not suspected of incontinency.[74] The Holy Office refused to dispense a man of thirty-six who appeared to have all the necessary qualifications for the clerical state because his wife could not enter the religious state, there being no convent in that country.[75] The Holy See must declare whether the conditions are all verified in any given case, and if the decision is favorable, the wife must make the simple vow of chastity into the hands of the Ordinary or his delegate.[76]

70 C. 1, Dist. 48; c. 10, Dist. 61; S. C. C., Jan. 25, 1749, etc. (Richter, Trid., p. 339, nn. 3 ff.).

71 C. 4, 60, I, 9.

72 Cfr. c. 1, Dist. 77.

73 C. 5, X, III, 32 mentions only higher orders.

74 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 12, nn. 14 ff.

75 S. O. Feb. 12, 1857 ad 4 (Coll. P. F., n. 1057).

76 Benedict XIV, l. c., n. 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Those who are engaged in an office or administration forbidden to clerics, and of which they have to render an account, until they have given up the office and administration, settled their accounts, and thus become free. This, too, is part of the former irregularity ex defectu libertatis. A chapter[77] of the Decree of Gratian mentions the curiales, i. e., officers or rather employees of the various departments of civil administration who were engaged by the magistrates. To this class belonged also the mayors of small towns, who were responsible to the fiscus or State treasury. These Emperor Mauritius forbade to become clerics, and although Gregory I opposed the law on principle, he approved it, as far as rendering accounts was concerned. This is the idea underlying our canon; for the rest we refer to can. 139.[78]

4.° Slaves, properly so-called, before they are given their liberty. This belongs to the same defectus libertatis. Regarding slaves in the proper sense, i. e., men who belong bodily to a master, the Church ordained that they should not enter the clerical state, partly because their admission would lower its dignity, and partly because they were not their own masters.[79]

5.° Men bound to common military service by the civil law, before they are fully discharged. This means all who are compelled by the law of the land to do military service.[80] Leave of absence, no matter whether for a definite or an indefinite time, does not free one from the military obligation. But if one is unconditionally discharged, his military duties may be regarded as "fully discharged," even though it is possible that the State will 77 C. un., Dist. 53 (Greg. I): c. 3, Dist. 54.

78 Vol. II, p. 88 ff.; see cc. 2, 4, X, III, 50.

79 Cfr. Dist. 54, passim; can. 1083, § 2 and our commentary on the same.

80 Cfr. Vol. II, p. 64 f.; p. 94, of our commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

call him again in case of necessity. The text of our canon certainly presumes that a soldier was discharged; extraordinary cases are not affected by this law.

6.° Neophytes, until the bishop thinks their faith sufficiently tried. The early ecclesiastical laws demanded a long and severe trial of neophytes, to prove their constancy and faith.[81]

Formerly the so-called clinici were also excluded from the clerical state. These were converts who delayed the reception of Baptism until they were sick.[82] Our canon leaves it to the discretion of the bishop to try converts and obtain moral certainty as to their sincerity and steadfastness.

7.° Those who suffer from infamy (not by law but) in fact, as long as this blemish remains on the person according to the judgment of the Ordinary. Infamy is here taken in a wider sense than infamia iuris, in can. 984, 5°, and signifies the loss of honor or the good reputation which men enjoy in the estimation of their fellows. The term may also signify the legal status of a person convicted of an infamous crime. This supposes a juridical sentence, or at least a crime branded as infamous by law. There are crimes which, though they do not entail legal infamy, are regarded by honest people generally as infamous.[83] Besides, there is a popular conviction that certain professions are mean or unbecoming to the clerical state. This is what was called the levis nota. Thus in former times actors (histriones) were branded with this stain.[84]

This infamy arising from levis nota cannot be meant in 81 Cfr. 1, Tim. III, 6; c. 1, Dist. 48.

82 Cfr. Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XII, 6, 7; Armellini, Lezioni del' Archeologia Crist., p. 290.

83 Cfr. c. 17, c. 6, q. 1, which would include any sin against the Decalogue.

84 Cfr. cc. 15, 16, X, III, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

our canon, as it was never looked upon as an irregularity in the proper sense, but rather as incompatible with the clerical state. Infamy must therefore be based upon a personal fact which degrades the perpetrator, and includes in its range those whom the civil law declares infamous,[85] or who have lost their civic rights. Infamia facti, says our Code, is contracted on account of a crime committed or because of immoral conduct which has deprived one of his good name among the faithful. This stain can only be removed by enduring amendment by which the lost reputation is re-established. When this is the case must be left to the judgment of the Ordinary.[86] But it may be added that infamy afflicting the parents or relatives of an ordinand does not affect the ordinand himself. Thus, if the father had been condemned to the galleys or capital punishment, the son would not be irregular on that account.[87]

IGNORANCE NO EXCUSE

CAN. 988

Ignorantia irregularitatum sive ex delicto sive ex defectu atque impedimentorum ab eisdem non excusat.

Ignorance of irregularities, whether resulting from defect or crime, and of impediments, does not excuse from incurring them.

Some authors held that certain irregularities were not incurred if one was ignorant of them. Thus it was maintained that the violation of the censure (can. 985, 7.°) would not render one irregular who had no knowledge of 85 C. 2, c. 6, q. 1: "omnes vero infames esse dicimus, quos leges saeculi infames appellant."

86 Cfr. can. 2293, 2295.

87 S. C. C., Aug. 11, 1759 (Richter, Trid., p. 340, n. 8); can. 2293, § 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the same.[88] This may be true in the court of conscience. But a logical application of the principle that irregularities are not properly called penalties would really seem to exclude this opinion. All irregularities are directly intended to safeguard the dignity and reverence due to the sacred ministry, and therefore the exterior fact, i. e., the quality of the minister as it ought to be in the face of the Church, is considered, not his internal disposition. The Code therefore says that ignorance, whether culpable or inculpable, does not excuse from incurring the irregularities or contracting the canonical impediments. However, it must be added that can. 986 requires a grievous sin to induce an irregularity ex delicto. Therefore infants or those who are not responsible for their acts cannot incur irregularity from crime.[89]

MULTIPLIED IRREGULARITIES AND IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 989

Irregularitates et impedimenta multiplicantur ex diversis eorundem causis, non autem ex repetitione eiusdem causae, nisi agatur de irregularitate ex homicidio voluntario.

Irregularities and impediments are multiplied if their causes are different, but not by a repetition of the same cause, except in case of irregularity from voluntary homicide.

The fundamental reason here again is the dignity of the sacred ministry. If it is jeopardized or lost, the loss cannot be undone. The defect or crime may grow by degrees. A deliberate homicide increases the number of 88 Thesaurus-Giraldi, De Poenis Eccl., P. I, c. 15 (ed. 1831, p. 15).

89 Ibid., c. 17, p. 18; Suarez, De Censuris, disp. 40, sect. 5, n. 9 f.; Gasparri, l. c., n. 202; Wernz, l. c., II, n. 100, p. 129.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

irregularities because of the peculiar horridness of the crime. Hence if one has committed two homicides or two or more abortions, he has incurred as many irregularities as he has committed crimes.

The cause here understood is the causa materialis, i. e., the occasion or causa proxima[90] of irregularity. This causa materialis or proxima is either a defect or a crime upon which the law has placed the penalty of irregularity. Such causes may differ either specifically or numerically. Thus one who is irregular by reason of illegitimacy may also become irregular on account of bigamy; one who is irregular because of apostacy may also contract irregularity by committing homicide; for all these are specifically different causes. The numerical difference consists in the repetition of the same act, for instance, if a judge inflicts the death sentence more than once, and thereby, as it were, multiplies or increases the irregularity. Here the Code adopts a different and more logical view than some canonists[91] by ruling that, with the exception of deliberately committed homicide, no irregularity is multiplied by repeated acts of the same species. In other words, the Code admits specific but rejects numerical multiplication, with the exception of homicide. Nevertheless those who are corpore vitiati (thus at least it seems to us), suffer from as many irregularities as there are defects, for instance, one deprived of an arm and deaf and blind is irregular for three separate and distinct causes. Therefore, these defects must all be mentioned in the petition for a dispensation, as per can. 991.

90 Collet, De Irregularitatibus, in Migne, Cursus Theol., Vol. XVII, col. 199.

91 Suarez, l. c., sect. 7, n. 5, ed. Paris 1861, XXIII, 362 seems to admit multiplication analogously to suspension.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE ORDINARY'S DISPENSING POWER

CAN. 990

§ 1. Licet Ordinariis per se vel per alium suos subditos dispensare ab irregularitatibus omnibus ex delicto occulto provenientibus, ea excepta de qua in can. 985, n. 4 aliave deducta ad forum iudiciale.

§ 2. Eadem facultas competit cuilibet confessario in casibus occultis urgentioribus in quibus Ordinarius adiri nequeat et periculum immineat gravis damni vel infamiae, sed ad hoc dumtaxat ut poenitens ordines iam susceptos exercere licite valeat.

This canon is a repetition of chapter 6, Liceat, Sess. 24, of the Council of Trent. The meaning is that Ordinaries, either by themselves or through delegates, may dispense from all irregularities arising from an occult crime, except the one mentioned in can. 985, n. 4, or any other brought before the ecclesiastical court.

a) The Ordinaries here mentioned are all those named in can. 198, including the higher superiors of exempt clerical institutes, who, of course, can make use of this power only in favor of their subjects. The special privileges accorded by various Pontiffs to diverse orders are not included in this power, but neither are they declared void by our canon. Pius V granted considerable faculties to the Theatines [92] and the Cassinese Congregation of the O.S.B.,[93] enabling the superiors to dispense even from homicide. This latter faculty, however, was valid only for the court of conscience. It would certainly not be advisable to stretch the privilege so as to include homicide. Besides, most authors exempt from these privi-

92 "Ad immarcescibilem," Feb. 6, 1567.

93 "Dum ad Congregationem," June 15, 1571.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

leges dispensation from a notable bodily or mental defect. Furthermore this privilege would not avail for removing the inability for prelacies.[94]

Our text also says that Ordinaries who are entitled to dispense may either do so themselves or delegate some one to dispense in their name. For this is ordinary jurisdiction, which may be delegated to others, either habitually or for individual cases.[95] Therefore the Ordinary, the Vicar-General and the Vicar-Capitular (who needs no special faculties from the chapter)[96] enjoy the power of dispensing from these irregularities and may delegate another priest, either secular or regular, to impart it.

b) The canon mentions only irregularities arising from an occult crime. An occult crime, as stated elsewhere, is one which cannot be proved in an ecclesiastical court. The action of a civil court makes no difference. One declared guilty by a civil court but discharged as innocent by the ecclesiastical court would not be irregular and therefore would need no dispensation.[97] All irregularities arising from an occult crime may be dispensed from; this includes heresy, as to which a different opinion prevailed before the promulgation of the Code.[98]

c) Excepted are homicide and abortion, as explained under can. 985, n. 4, and any other irregularity from an occult crime which has been brought before the ecclesiastical court (deducta ad forum iudiciale, or ad forum contentiosum, as the Tridentine Council has it). An ecclesiastical trial begins when the summons (citatio) is duly made or the parties of their own accord appear be-

94 Cfr. Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Moral., Vol. VII, p. 341; Piatus M., Praelectiones Juris Regul., ed. 2, Vol. I, p. 578.

95 Can. 199, § 1.

96 Thus in S. C. C., Dec. 4, 1632 (Richter, Trid., p. 338, n. 1).

97 S. C. C., Jan. 25, 1726 (Richter, l. c., p. 93, n. 4).

98 S. C. C., June 18, 1796; Dec. 4, 1632 (Richter, l. c., p. 339, n. 1); Gasparri, l. c., n. 230.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fore the tribunal.[99] Mere accusation or denunciation is not sufficient to constitute a casus deductus ad forum iudiciale. But as soon as the ecclesiastical judge has properly issued a summons, the matter has "taken a legal turn," and after that the Ordinary can no longer dispense from an irregularity arising from the crime which now forms the matter of an ecclesiastical trial. With the exception of these cases, however, Ordinaries may dispense their subjects from said irregularities, not only at home, but anywhere.

§ 2 extends this same faculty to all confessors, who consequently can absolve penitents in all occult cases of a very urgent nature, when the Ordinary cannot be approached and there is danger of a great loss or infamy. But the dispensation is valid only in that it enables the penitent to exercise an order already received. Notice the term, eadem facultas, which doubtless means that the confessors are subject to the same restrictions as the Ordinary, to wit, that this faculty cannot be applied in case of deliberate homicide and abortion, or of a crime that has been brought before the ecclesiastical tribunal. What adire Ordinarium signifies has been explained elsewhere.[1] It is to be understood of the usual and safe way of communication by letter, messenger or personal call. A grave damnum may be either material or spiritual, for instance, a pingue stipendium needed for support, or the opportunity of gaining a plenary indulgence, or overcoming a great temptation, or the chance of consulting a wise and enlightened confessor. Infamia is loss of reputation, which might be incurred by a pastor or curate if he could not say Mass on a festival day or a day appointed. Note that the canon does not require a recursus to the Ordinary or to the Holy See after dispensation has been

99 Can. 1725.

1 See Vol. V, p. 108, p. 294.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google granted.[2] But this holds good only when there is question of exercising an order already received, not for ascending to a higher one.

PETITIONS FOR DISPENSATION

CAN. 991

§ 1. In precibus pro irregularitatum ac impedimentorum dispensatione, omnes irregularitates ac impedimenta indicanda sunt; secus dispensatio generalis valebit quidem etiam pro reticitis bona fide, iis exceptis quae in can. 990, § 1 excipiuntur, non autem pro reticitis in mala fide.

§ 2. Si agatur de irregularitate ex homicidio voluntario, etiam numerus delictorum exprimendus est sub poena nullitatis concedendae dispensationis.

§ 3. Dispensatio generalis ad ordines valet pro ordinibus quoque maioribus; et dispensatus potest obtinere beneficia non consistorialia etiam curata, sed renuntiari nequit S. R. E. Cardinalis, Episcopus, Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, Superior maior in religione clericali exempta.

§ 4. Dispensatio, in foro interno non sacramentali concessa, scripto consignetur; et de ea in secreto Curiae libro constare debet.

§ 1 rules that in petitions for dispensation from irregularities and impediments, all existing irregularities and impediments must be mentioned; else the general dispensation has no effect for those concealed if the concealment was made in bad faith, but only for such as have been concealed in good faith, except, however, homicide,

[2] Neither was there a condition attached to the decision of the S. O., of Sept. 6, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 677).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google abortion, and other crimes brought before the ecclesiastical court.

The bodily defects must be mentioned as distinctly as the case permits, and especially must illegitimacy be explained as to its cause (naturales, spurii, sacrilegi) because the S. Congregation deals more severely with the latter than with the merely naturales. If a trial has taken place before the master of ceremonies, this fact, together with the judgment or opinion of the bishop, should be mentioned in the petition. But the dispensation proper is granted by the Holy See.[3]

If there is more than one irregularity all must be mentioned, and the rescript extends only to those expressly mentioned, unless a bona fide omission was made, in which latter case the irregularity which was not mentioned or forgotten is included in the dispensation, with the exception, however, of homicide and abortion or some other crime for which one was summoned before the ecclesiastical court. A wilful or deliberate omission of an irregularity would affect the rescript in so far as the concealed irregularity would remain, and consequently another dispensation would be required.

§ 2 requires that the number of homicides be mentioned under penalty of nullity of the rescript. Whether this affects also the number of abortions is not quite certain. The Roman practice includes abortion.[4] When the precise number cannot be given, an approximate one should be set down, or the plural number in general.

§ 3. A general dispensation is valid also for higher orders, and the one thus dispensed may obtain benefices which are not usually conferred in consistories, but he

[3] Cfr. Pyrrhus Corradus, Praxis Dispensationum Apostolicarum, l. III, c. 1; c. 6 (Migne, Cursus Theol., t. XIX, p. 123, 161).

[4] Idem, l. V, c. 1 (ed. cit., p. 287).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cannot be promoted to the cardinalate, the episcopate, an abbacy or prelacy nullius, nor to the office of higher superior in an exempt clerical institute.

A general dispensation is one granted for all orders and benefices or favors to be obtained, whereas a particular dispensation extends only to certain benefices or orders.[5] Thus a dispensation granted from the impediment of defectus natalium ob haeresim parentum (can. 987, n. 1) for tonsure and minor orders also avails for major orders,[6] and for the offices or benefices of pastor, curate, and canon. But a consistorial benefice, i. e., one conferred in a public consistory, cannot be obtained in virtue of such a general dispensation. This is nothing else but the application of an old principle,[7] namely, that those affected with a blemish should not ascend to higher dignities.

§ 4. A dispensation granted in the internal forum but extrasacramentally, must be given in writing, and the diocesan court should keep a record thereof in a secret book. This rule is, or may be, of importance in cases where litigation concerning an office or benefice threatens or an accusation is brought before the ecclesiastical court.

REMARKS ON DISPENSATIONS FROM IRREGULARITIES[8]

1. The sovereign Pontiff may dispense from all irregularities, but is himself subject to none. The reason is because all irregularities exist by, and rest upon, positive ecclesiastical law. Dispensations from irregularities pro foro externo are granted by the S. Congregatio pro Re Sacramentaria, those for the internal forum by the S.

5 Id., l. I, c. 3 (ed. cit., p. 20).

6 S. O., Dec. 6, 1906 (Coll. P. F., n. 2241).

7 Cfr. cc. 1, 18, X, I, 17; Reg. Juris 87 in 6°.

8 Cfr. Collet, De Irregularitatibus (Migne, Cursus Theol., Vol. 17, coll. 317 ff.); Wernz, l. c., II, n. 105, p. 133 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Poenitentiaria. We must add that the Roman Pontiff alone is competent to grant dispensations, because all irregularities concern the common law of the Church. The faculties of Ordinaries[9] formerly granted in virtue of Form I, art. 2, can no longer be applied for the external forum;[10] and those pro foro interno are contained in can. 990. But we believe can. 81 may be lawfully applied here, provided the three conditions therein set forth are verified.

2. Some irregularities ex defectu cease if the cause entirely ceases. Thus if a bodily defect is cured or healed, the irregularity also ceases, because this was set up to safeguard the dignity of the sacred ministry and insure the physical ability of performing the sacred functions. Thus if one's eyesight is restored by an operation, the irregularity ceases ipso facto, and no dispensation is required. However, if a doubt exists as to the completeness of the cure, or the degree of deformity which may cause scandal or ridicule, the case must be referred to Rome, together with the statement of the master of ceremonies.[11] Dispensations are not easily granted if the applicant uses artificial limbs, even though the danger of scandal be remote.[12] Hence in every case of real doubt an authentic statement should be obtained from the S. Congregation.

The irregularities arising from bigamy, infamia iuris, or defectus lenitatis, can be removed only by dispensation 9 Cfr. Putzer, Comment in Facult. Apost., ed. 4, p. 150 ff.

10 S. C. Consist., April 25, 1918.

11 Cfr. S. C. C., June 15, 1878 (A. S. S., Vol. 11, 423). The S. C. required a photograph in case of a hunchback, whose size was 153 centimeters (= 5 feet), which was considered sufficient; but the S. C. also inquired into the moral qualities which were in favor of the petitioner. Hence the decision "arbitrio et conscientiae episcopi, cum facultate dispensandi et habilitandi oratorem ad omnes ordines usque ad presbyteratum inclusive, facto verbo cum Ssmo."

12 S. C. C., Dec. 19, 1772; May 6, 1775; Nov. 18, 1837 (Richter, p. 340, nn. 17, 18, 30).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google proper. However, if the infamia iuris arises from civil law, it ceases of itself as soon as the civil authority restores the subject to civil or civic rights.

Illegitimacy requires a dispensation, unless, as stated in the canon, it has been removed by subsequent marriage or solemn religious profession.

3. Irregularities ex delicto, if of a public nature, can be dispensed only by the Apostolic See; if occult, can. 990 applies. Clergymen who practice medicine or surgery with an Apostolic indult must abide by the conditions of time, place, or person laid down in the rescript. If they have extended the faculty beyond the time allowed, a provisional dispensation would be required for the period during which they practiced medicine unlawfully, even though they are morally certain that they caused no death.[13] In case of a doubtful fact of homicide, i. e., when a cleric is uncertain whether he or another was the cause of a homicide, it is the common opinion of theologians that he must conduct himself as irregular,[14] and therefore abstain from exercising acts of the orders which he has received and in the meantime apply for a dispensation.

4. With regard to impediments properly so-called, it is evident that five of them (nn. 1–5) are conditional, i. e., last only as long as the impediment itself. This is clearly expressed in the wording of the text. Concerning these, then, the attestation or proof of cessation is sufficient and no dispensation is needed. The two others depend on the finding or judgment of the bishop, who is the arbiter in such cases.

We may add that infamia facti is often removed by change of domicile combined with a lasting amendment of conduct.

13 S. C. C., Dec. 12, 1761 (Richter, l. c., p. 342, n. 34).

14 Collet, l. c., p. 215.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

PREREQUISITES OF ORDINATION

CAN. 992

Omnes tum saeculares tum religiosi ad ordines promovendi per se ipsi vel per alios Episcopo aliive qui Episcopi hac in re vices gerat, suum propositum ante ordinationem opportuno tempore aperiant.

All who wish to be ordained, seculars as well as religious, must either themselves or through others manifest their intention at some opportune time before ordination to their bishop or whoever holds his place with regard to ordination.

The Council of Trent[1] had ordered that the ordinandi should present themselves before the bishop one month before ordination. This rule was enacted so that the bishop might have time to give orders to the parish priest to make the public announcements and to select the examiners. But manifestare propositum may have another signification, namely, to make sure that the ordinand is not compelled to embrace the clerical state. The process is somewhat similar to the exploratio voluntatis required for female religious and may be called the first of the three scrutinies which were formerly demanded. The text says this manifestation of intention may also be made to the one who represents the bishop in the matter of ordination. In former centuries this was the archdeacon, still mentioned in the Pontificale.[2] His place is now taken by the Vicar General, or in some dioceses by the Chancellor. The Code is not explicit on this point.

[1] Sess. 23, c. 5, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TESTIMONIALS

CAN. 993

Promovendi saeculares aut religiosi qui, quod pertinet ad ordinationem, saecularium iure reguntur, afferant:

1°. Testimonium ultimae ordinationis aut, si de prima tonsura agatur, recepti baptismatis et confirmationis;

2°. Testimonium de peractis studiis, pro singulis ordinibus, ad norman can. 976, requisitis;

3°. Testimonium rectoris Seminarii, aut sacerdotis cui candidatus extra Seminarium commendatus fuerit, de bonis eiusdem candidati moribus;

4°. Testimoniales litteras Ordinarii loci in quo promovendus tantum temporis moratus est ut canonicum impedimentum contrahere ibi potuerit;

5°. Testimoniales Superioris maioris religiosi, si cui religioni promovendus adscriptus sit.

CAN. 994

§ 1. Tempus quo promovendus potuit canonicum impedimentum contrahere est, regulariter, pro militibus trimestre, pro aliis semestre post pubertatem; sed Episcopus ordinans pro sua prudentia exigere potest litteras testimoniales etiam ob brevius commorationis tempus, et ob tempus quoque quod pubertatem antecessit.

[2] Cfr. cc. 5, 9, X, I, 23, de off. archidiaconi.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si loci Ordinarius neque per se neque per alios promovendum satis noverit, ut testari possit eum, tempore quo in suo territorio moratus est, nullum canonicum impedimentum contraxisse, aut si promovendus per tot dioeceses vagatus sit ut impossibile vel nimis difficile evadat omnes litteras testimoniales exquirere, provideat Ordinarius saltem per iuramentum suppletorium a promovendo praestandum.

§ 3. Si post obtentas litteras testimoniales et ante peractam ordinationem, promovendus praedicto temporis spatio in eodem territorio rursus moratus sit, novae litterae testimoniales Ordinarii loci necessariae sunt.

CAN. 995

§ 1. Etiam Superior religiosus suis litteris dimissoriis non solum testari debet promovendum professionem religiosam emisisse et esse de familia domus religiosae sibi subditae, sed etiam de studiis peractis, deque aliis iure requisitis.

§ 2. Episcopus, acceptis iis litteris dimissoriis, aliis testimonialibus litteris non indiget.

Seculars as well as those religious who in matters of ordination are governed by the rules laid down for seculars, must produce:

1°. A certificate of the order they have received last, or if tonsure is to be received, their baptismal and confirmation record;

2°. A certificate showing that they have completed the studies required for the several orders according to can. 976;

3°. Testimonials from the rector of the seminary, or from the priest to whose care the candidate had been en-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google trusted during his stay outside the seminary, as to his good character;

4°. Testimonials from the Ordinary of the diocese in which the candidate has lived sufficiently long to contract a canonical impediment;

5°. Testimonials from the higher superior, if the candidate belongs to a religious community.

Can. 994, in § 1, determines the time which may be considered sufficient for one to contract a canonical impediment. It is, as a rule, six months after the age of puberty, and three months for those engaged in military service. However, the bishop may, if he thinks it prudent, demand testimonials for a shorter time, and also for the time before the age of puberty.

§ 2. If the Ordinary himself, or other responsible men of his surroundings or diocese, do not know the candidate sufficiently well to be able to testify to his freedom from canonical impediments for the time spent in the diocese, the Ordinary shall demand a supplementary oath from the candidate. This same oath shall also be demanded if the candidate has lived in so many dioceses that it is impossible, or extremely difficult, to obtain all the testimonials required.

§ 3. If, after the testimonials have been obtained and before the candidate is ordained, he again lives in the same territory for a space of time which may suffice for contracting a canonical impediment, new testimonials from the local Ordinary are required.

Can. 995 regulates the matter with regard to religious superiors. These, when giving the litterae dimissoriae, must testify that the candidate has made religious profession, and that he is a member of the religious house subject to the resp. superior, and has completed the required studies and complied with the other conditions demanded by law. Upon having received the litterae dimissoriae thus described, the bishop needs no other testimonials.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first of these canons mentions (1°) the certificate of ordination, which was formerly called litterae formatae, or written statement of the order received. In Rome the Cardinal-Vicar issues such litterae after each ordination. The document contains the name of the ordaining bishop and the place and date of ordination. A similar attestation must be issued after tonsure has been conferred, and for receiving tonsure, the baptismal and confirmation certificates must be exhibited either to the episcopus proprius or to the ordaining bishop, together with the dimissorials. But after tonsure has been received and the certificate properly issued, the baptismal and confirmation records are no longer required.

(2°) The contents of the testimonials for the secular clergy refer to the studies, the moral character and freedom from canonical impediments.

(a) The studies must have been completed according to can. 976, and the testimonials must state that the terms required by law have been adhered to, unless a special indult permits one to be ordained to the priesthood after a three years' theological course, which fact should, we believe, be mentioned.

(b) The testimonials concerning moral behavior contain what was formerly called de moribus et vita.[3] Hence what we call conduct must be testified to, or, as the Council of Trent says, the candidates must be "ita pietate ac castis moribus conspicui, ut praeclarum bonorum operum exemplum et vitae monita ab eis possint exspec-

[3] Innocent XII, "Speculatores," Nov. 4, 1694, §§ 3–6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tari." [4] This testimony may be based upon the usual reports made by the director of the seminary.

(c) Freedom from canonical impediments means absence of the irregularities and canonical impediments mentioned in can. 987, and freedom from any censure or vindictive penalty which would prohibit the receiving of, or ascent to, a higher order.[5] Hence the phrase in these letters: "et nullis, quantum scimus, censuris irretitum."

(3°) Who are to give these letters? The certificate of orders received should be issued by the bishop who conferred the same, or by his diocesan chancellor. The baptismal certificate is issued by the parish priest in whose parish the ordinand was baptized. The confirmation certificate by the bishop who confirmed the ordinand or by his officials. The testimonials concerning studies must be issued by the Ordinary in whose diocese these studies were made.[6] In that case, however, the director of the seminary shall testify to the time spent in the seminary, together with the result of the examinations passed by the candidate. To these the director of the seminary may add the testimonials concerning the conduct of the candidate, though these testimonials need not be given in writing, but may be given orally.

For the testimonials touching canonical impediments several Ordinaries may be required. The old law and practice insisted that the episcopus proprius ratione originis give the testimonials,[7] although any other competent bishop might ordain the candidate. Our Code, as far as we understand it, does not demand this, either in can.

4 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 14, de ref., concerning the priesthood.

5 An excommunicated Catholic cannot licitly receive the Sacraments, cfr. can. 2260, § 1.

6 Many, l. c., p. 323.

7 Innocent XII, "Speculatores," § 4; S. C. C., April 27, 1720; Feb. 7, 1733; May 29, 1824 (Richter, Trid., p. 190 f., nn. 11, 16, 26).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

956, or in can. 993, but, on the contrary, only states (can. 994, 1°) that the time for contracting a canonical impediment begins after the fourteenth year is completed. It makes no reference to the episcopus originis. Hence only those Ordinaries in whose dioceses the candidate has lived for six months after his 14th year, must give the testimonials; or in case of a soldier, the Ordinaries in whose dioceses the candidate has spent at least three months.[8] Note the term, "pro militibus," for soldiers, which sounds somewhat different from the wording found in the decree of the S.C.C., of Jan. 26th, 1895, which reads: "pro clericis ordinandis iam militiae addictis."[9] This meant that only clergymen soldiers had to bring testimonials from every Ordinary in whose diocese they had spent at least three months. The Code demands this of all soldiers whether they are about to receive tonsure or are already tonsured. The reason is palpable: they are supposed to have commenced their theological studies according to can. 976, 1°.

The Code, however, foresees the difficulty which was proposed in the above-mentioned decision of 1895, to wit, how to obtain the testimonials of all these Ordinaries. This may be impossible morally or physically, for lack of knowledge of the ordinand, or because of difficulties of communication, interrupted travel, etc. In that case the Ordinary competent for ordination must require a supplementary oath from the ordinand. This is taken upon the gospel book. Its object is to make sure of the candidate's freedom from canonical impediments, nothing more. The bishop is no longer[10] obliged to recur

8 Trimestre signifies a continuous sojourn of three months. Therefore, strictly speaking, Ordinaries are not obliged to ask for testimonials if a soldier clergyman would have stayed in various dioceses for less than three months; but they may ask for information.

9 Urgelitana (Coll. P. F., n. 1886).

10 Formerly he needed a special

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the Holy See for taking the oath under such circumstances.

The text (can. 993, 4°) says "ordinarii loci," by which name are understood all those mentioned in can. 198. Therefore the Vicar-General and the Vicar-Capitular may issue these testimonials.

(4°) As to the testimonials required of religious, the following remarks may suffice (compare with can. 964):

(a) Exempt religious superiors of higher rank, i. e., generals or provincials, are exclusively competent to grant testimonials to those who are subject to them, for all orders. They grant dimissorials, and with these may include the testimonials. No other testimonials are needed if the candidates have not been engaged in military service or made their studies outside their own study house.[11] The certificates of Baptism and Confirmation are not expressly required, because aspirants to the religious state must bring them along when they enter.

But if a religious has to undergo military service (as in France and Italy) the religious superior must obtain litterae testimoniales from each and every Ordinary in whose diocese the candidate spent at least three months.[12] However, in the case mentioned in can. 994, 2°, namely, when it is impossible or difficult to obtain all these testimonials, the religious superior — for he is the Ordinary of the ordinandus — may demand a supplementary oath from the candidate as to his freedom from canonical impediments. If the candidate has made his studies outside the study house of his order or congregation, the superior must ask for a certificate of studies properly completed, as required by can. 976, and testimonials from the director faculty from the Ap. See; S. C. C. Jan. 26, 1895.

11 See can. 544, § 1.

12 S. C. super Disciplina Regulari, Nov. 27, 1892 (A. S. S., Vol. 25, 638); this was issued for Italy, but may be applied to all countries with compulsory service for clergymen.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the seminary or study house as to the moral character of the candidate. After the exempt religious superior has collected all these informations, de quibus conscientia eius oneratur, he may draw up one document containing the dimissorials and testimonials and present the candidate to the diocesan bishop, or to another if can. 966 admits. If the episcopus proprius ordains at the house of the religious, no writing is required, because everything may be done orally.

(b) Non-exempt religious superiors proceed similarly, with some little difference. Since they are allowed to grant dimissorials only for tonsure and minor orders, whilst for higher orders the competent bishop is the one according to can. 956, "domicilii una cum origine aut domicilii solius," the onus of gathering the testimonials would seem to rest on the episcopus proprius. Yet it appears to be more conformable to the wording and intention of the law, as laid down in can. 993, 5°, and can. 995, that the religious superior perform this task, and then he has to proceed as stated above under (a). For the bishop may be satisfied with the testimonials presented by the religious superior, as can. 995, 2°, expressly states.[13]

(c) The contents of these testimonials are outlined in the same can. 995, 1°. They must contain the statement that the candidate has made simple temporary profession for tonsure and minor orders, or perpetual or solemn profession for major orders. The superior must furthermore testify that the candidate is an habitual,[14] not only a temporary, member of the community of which he is superior. Besides, the course of studies, as set forth in can. 976, must be testified to. And finally de aliis iure

13 Cfr. S. C. EE. et RR., March 1, 1895 (apud Many, l. c., p. 425 f.).

14 De conventu, or de familia, to prevent fraud, see can. 967.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

requisitis. This term indicates what we stated under (a) concerning military service and course; in other seminaries, from which latter the ordinand must have testimonials of the director as to his moral conduct. No other testimonials are required.[15]

EXAMINATIONS BEFORE ORDINATION

CAN. 996

§ 1. Quilibet promovendus sive saecularis sive religiosus debet praevium ac diligens examen subire circa ipsum ordinem suscipiendum.

§ 2. Promovendi vero ad sacros ordines in aliis quoque de sacra theologia tractationibus periculum faciant.

§ 3. Episcoporum est statuere qua methodo, coram quibus examinatoribus et quibus in tractationibus sacrae theologiae promovendi periculum facere debeant.

CAN. 997

§ 1. Hoc examen sive pro clericis saecularibus sive pro religiosis recipit loci Ordinarius qui iure proprio ordinat, aut dat dimissorias litteras; qui tamen potest quoque, ex iusta causa, illud Episcopo ordinaturo committere qui id oneris suscipere velit.

§ 2. Episcopus alienum subditum sive saecularem sive religiosum ordinans cum legitimis litteris dimissoriis, quibus asseritur candidatum examinatum fuisse ad norman § 1, et idoneum repertum, potest huic attestationi acquiescere, sed non tenetur; et si pro sua

15 Thus testimonials from the bishops in whose dioceses they lived for six months before entering religion, are not required, being supplied by the testimonials required for entrance.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conscientia censeat candidatum non esse idoneum, eum ne promoveat.

A synod of Nantes[16] set up the rule that those who wished to enter the sacred ministry should present themselves, accompanied by their archpriest, before the bishop on Wednesday before ordination day. The bishop should choose from among his priests and other prudent men some examiners well versed in divine and ecclesiastical law, who should carefully examine the ordinandi concerning their faith, morals, and education. The substance of this canon entered the decrees of the Council of Trent,[17] whence it was adopted into our Code.

§ 1 of can. 996 enacts that all seculars as well as religious must, before ordination, be carefully examined concerning the order they are going to receive. This information can best be obtained from the Pontificale Romanum, which should therefore be studied, together with the practical exercises.

§ 2. Those to be promoted to higher orders shall also undergo an examination in the one or other theological discipline which they studied in school.

§ 3. The bishop has the right to determine the method, the examiners and the subject-matter of these examinations. The prelate before whom the secular as well as religious clergy have to pass this examination (can. 997, 1°) is the competent ordinary, who either himself ordains them or grants them dimissorials. The competent ordinary may, for a just reason, entrust the ordaining bishop with this examination, provided the latter is willing.

Note that no distinction is made between exempt and 16 C. 5, Dist. 24 (held probably in 658, Hefele, Conc.-Gesch., III, 97; IV, 537).

17 Sess. 23, c. 14, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

non-exempt religious. All have to undergo the examination, not before their religious superior, but before the examiners appointed by the bishop, and in his presence. Even those who claimed to be exempt, and who enjoyed many privileges, were told that the examination for ordination must be made either before the competent or the ordaining bishop.[18] The Council of Trent enjoined bishops to suspend from the exercise of orders all those who were presented as fit but were found to be unfit.[19]

§ 2°, can. 997, permits the bishop who ordains one not his subject, either secular or regular, to abide by the attestation of the episcopus proprius. But this statement, which is given together with the dimissorials, supposes that the candidate was duly examined according to § 1 of this canon and found fit. Yet the ordaining bishop is not bound to accept the attestation, and should not ordain the candidate if he in conscience regards him as unfit.

The question was once proposed to the S. Congregation [20] whether an auxiliary bishop may examine a candidate who has received dimissorials from his own bishop (or, sede vacante, from the Vicar-Capitular, after a year's vacancy), and reject him, if he finds him unfit. The answer was as stated in the text: he is not obliged to, but may, examine him. In that case the candidate may appeal to his bishop, who would be entitled to try another bishop, or have recourse to the S. Cong. Consistorialis. But if a religious, whether exempt or non-exempt, is rejected by his own bishop, i. e., the bishop, in whose diocese the religious house is located, the superior is not allowed to send the religious to another bishop;[21] he may, however, appeal to the S. C. Religiosorum.

18 S. C. EE. et RR., July 13, 1730 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 341 f).

19 Sess. 14, c. 3, de ref.

20 S. C. C., Aug. 2, Aug. 23, 1720; Jan. 16, 1595; Jan. 17, 1693 (Richter, Trid., p. 190 f. n. 12).

21 S. C. C., March 14, 1620; S. C. EE. et RR., Feb. 13, 1838; Piatus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLICATION OF THE ORDINATION

CAN. 998

§ 1. Nomina promovendorum ad singulos sacros ordines, exceptis religiosis a votis perpetuis sive sollemnibus sive simplicibus, publice denuntientur in paroeciali cuiusque candidati ecclesia; sed Ordinarius pro sua prudentia potest tum ab hac publicatione dispensare ex iusta causa, tum praecipere ut in aliis ecclesiis peragatur, tum publicationi substituere publicam ad valvas ecclesiae affixionem per aliquot dies, in quibus unus saltem dies festus comprehendatur.

§ 2. Publicatio fiat die festo de praecepto in ecclesia inter Missarum sollemnia aut alia die et hora quibus maior populi frequentia in ecclesia habeatur.

§ 3. Si sex intra menses candidatus promotus non fuerit, repetatur publicatio, nisi aliud Ordinario videntur.

CAN. 999

Omnes fideles obligatione tenentur impedimenta ad sacros ordines, si qua norint, Ordinario vel parocho ante sacram ordinationem revelandi.

The Council of Trent [22] made a rule which was never put into practice or forgotten in many dioceses,[23] namely, that the names of candidates for ordination should be publicly announced in their respective parish churches. This rule the Code re-inforces for all aspirants to higher orders, with the exception of religious with either simple or solemn vows. The church in which these publications

M l. c., II, p. 297; Many, l. c., p. 389.

22 Sess. 23, c. 5, de ref.

23 Many, l. c., p. 306; neither was it observed in the U. S., and the contrary custom cannot be styled unreasonable.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are to be made is the parish church of the candidate, to which he belongs by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile on his own part or that of his parents. The time for these publications is the parochial service on some feast of obligation or any other day or hour when there is a large gathering of people.

If the candidate is not ordained within six months from the date of the publication, the latter must be repeated. The bishop may, for a just reason, dispense with this announcement, but he has a right to demand that the publication be made not only in the parish church of the candidate, but also elsewhere, or that, instead of a public announcement, the names be posted at the church door and left there for some days, one of which should be a holy-day of obligation.

Can. 999 enjoins upon all the faithful the obligation of revealing to the Ordinary or pastor, before the day of ordination, any impediments they may happen to know of.

The reader will readily perceive the similarity between these announcements and the publication of the banns (see can. 1022 ff.).

SPECIAL INFORMATION

CAN. 1000

§ 1. Parocho qui publicationem peragit, et etiam alii, si id expedire videatur, Ordinarius committat ut de ordinandorum moribus et vita a fide dignis diligenter exquirat, et litteras testimoniales, ipsam investigationem et publicationem referentes, ad Curiam transmittat.

§ 2. Idem Ordinarius alias percontationes etiam privatas, si id necessarium aut opportunum iudicaverit, facere ne omittat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Ordinary may ask the pastor who has made the publication, or, if he deems it expedient, any other person, to investigate the conduct and life of the candidate by questioning trustworthy persons, and to transmit the testimonial letters containing the results of that investigation and publication to the diocesan court.

The Ordinary may and should, if he deems it necessary or advisable, also make private inquiries.

The text is plain, and we need only add that, as the matter is a serious one, all who are called upon to give information should feel bound in conscience to testify faithfully and impartially.

SPIRITUAL EXERCISES OR RETREAT

CAN. 1001

§ 1. Qui ad primam tonsuram et ordines minores promovendi sunt, spiritualibus exercitiis per tres saltem integros dies; qui vero ad ordines sacros, saltem per sex integros dies vacent; sed si qui, intra semestre, ad plures ordines maiores promovendi sint, Ordinarius potest exercitiorum tempus pro ordinatione ad diaconatum reducere, non tamen infra tres integros dies.

§ 2. Si, expletis exercitiis, sacra ordinatio qualibet de causa ultra semestre differatur, exercitia iterentur; secus iudicet Ordinarius utrum iteranda sint, necne.

§ 3. Haec spiritualia exercitia religiosi peragant in propria domo vel in alia de prudenti Superioris arbitrio; saeculares vero in Seminario aut in alia pia vel religiosa domo ab Episcopo designata.

§ 4. De peractis spiritualibus exercitiis Episcopus certior fiat testimonio Superioris domus, in qua peracta

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fuerint; vel, si de religiosis agatur, attestatione proprii Superioris maioris.

What was formerly prescribed for the clergy to be ordained in Rome, for the suburbicarian and Italian clergy,[24] and was by way of pious custom observed elsewhere, has now become general law, viz.:

1. That a retreat of three full days precede tonsure and minor orders, and one of six full days each sacred order. If three major orders are received within a semester, or six months, the ordinary may reduce the time of the retreat for the diaconate to three days, but no less.

2. If for any reason ordination is put off more than six months, the retreat must be repeated; if the delay is less than six months, it is for the Ordinary to decide whether the retreat must be repeated.

3. Religious must make the retreat in their own house, or in such other place as the superiors deem proper; seculars, in the seminary or in a religious institution, convent, or monastery appointed by the bishop.

4. The bishop must be informed of the retreat by an attestation of the superior of the house in which the exercises took place; and in the case of religious by an attestation of their superiors.

We surmise the bishop who is entitled to be informed is the one who is to ordain the candidate. If he is not at the same time the episcopus proprius, he may abide by the attestation of the latter.

The candidate himself should see to it that all his papers are in proper shape, he being the one who should ask for the testimonials, unless this is done by the director of the seminary.[25]

24 Alex. VII, "Apostolica Sollicitudo," Aug. 7, 1662; S. C. EE. et RR., Oct. 9, 1682 (Bizzarri, Coll., p. 374 f).

25 Many, l. c., p. 323 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

RITES AND CEREMONIES OF S. ORDINATION

CAN. 1002

In quovis conferendo ordine, minister proprios ritus in Pontificali Romano aliisve ritualibus libris ab Ecclesia probatis descriptos, adamussim servet, quos nulla ratione licet praeterire vel invertere.

The minister, in conferring orders, must carefully observe the rites prescribed in the Pontificale Romanum and other liturgical books approved by the Church, and he is not allowed to omit or change anything.

The venerable age [1] of these rites commands the greatest respect and the danger of exposing the Sacrament to nullity [2] by omitting an essential part of the form should caution the minister to follow the Pontificale closely. He should adhere scrupulously to the words and rubrics of the Pontificale, no matter what his personal opinion may be concerning the matter of the Sacrament of Orders. The Greeks must use their Euchologia, although these do not contain all the minor orders in vogue among the Latins.[3]

The minister is not allowed to omit an order, or any part of the prayers and ceremonies, nor to invert the order

1 The oldest decuments relating to the rite of ordination are the Sacramentarium Leonianum and the Gregorianum (VIth and VIIth century) and the Ordines Romani, of the VIIIth and IXth.

2 Leo XIII, "Apostolicae curae," Sept. 13, 1896; Many, l. c., p. 530.

3 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § VII, n. VI.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

of the Roman Pontificale. Therefore, also, the anointings (unctiones) must be performed according to the rubrics. Thus if the Pontifical says: "ungit totaliter palmas," the whole interior palm of the hand together with the fingers is to be anointed.[4] It is not necessary to add the different requisites for conferring orders, as they are stated plainly enough in the liturgical books.[5]

THE ORDINATION MASS

CAN. 1003

Missa ordinationis vel consecrationis episcopalis semper debet ab ipsomet ordinationis vel consecrationis ministro celebrari.

The Mass of ordination or episcopal consecration must always be celebrated by the minister of ordination or consecration himself.

This law was so vigorously insisted upon that the S. Congregation never permitted an exception, though repeatedly requested to do so. Thus an old bishop afflicted with the gout asked to confer orders sitting on the scamnum. But though there was no other bishop within a radius of 300 miles, the S. Rit. C. answered: nihil, and the second time, nihil indulgendum fere.[6] Another bishop in the same condition was told: non licere.[7] Hence when a bishop is unable to say the ordination mass, nothing else remains to be done than either to call in another bishop or to send the candidate to another. Now-a-days there is no great difficulty in doing so, except perhaps in China and "darkest" Africa.

4 S. Rit. C., Jan. 12, 1917 (A. Ap. S., IX, 351 f.).

5 See the very practical Manual of Episcopal Ceremonies by A. Stehle, O. S. B., 1916, p. 353 ff.

6 S. Rit. C., June 8, 1658; Jan. 24, 1660 (Dec. Auth., nn. 1070, 1150).

7 S. Rit. C., Sept. 23, 1837 (Dec. Auth., n. 2712).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

We may add two other decisions of the same S. Congregation concerning the rubrical Mass. On Holy Saturday the ordination mass, even if the bishop confers orders in his domestic chapel, must commence with the prophesies. On the six Saturdays on which general ordinations are held, the Missa must always be de feria occurrente, even though the bishop may say Mass privately and without chant. The custom of saying the Missa de Sancto is not to be tolerated.[8]

ORIENTAL AND LATIN RITES

CAN. 1004

Si quis, ritu orientali ad aliquos ordines iam promotus, a Sede Apostolica indultum obtinuerit superiores ordines suscipiendi ritu latino, debet prius ritu latino recipere ordines quos ritu orientali non receperit.

If one has received some orders in an Oriental rite and afterwards obtained an Apostolic indult to receive the higher orders according to the Latin rite, he must first receive in the Latin rite those orders which he did not receive in the Oriental rite.

To understand this canon it must be remembered that the Greek Euchologion, as published in 1754, and more lately in 1873, by the Propaganda, contains no special formularies except for conferring the tonsure or clericate and the lectorate[9] among minor orders. But the Latin subdiaconate includes not only this order proper, but also the acolythate and ostiariate. Hence,— says Benedict XIV, from whose Constitution, "Etsi pastoralis," May 8 S. Rit. C., March 21, 1744; Feb. 11, 1764 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2375, 2473).

9 Two orders, lectorate and cantorate, are almost identical.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

26, 1742, our text is taken,— if one has received the clericate and lectorate according to the Greek rite, and afterwards obtains an Apostolic indult to receive the major orders according to the Latin rite, he must, before he can receive subdeaconship, receive the ostiariate, the exorcistate, and the acolythate. But if he was ordained in the Greek rite as far as subdeaconship inclusively, it is sufficient that he receive the exorcistate, since the acolythate and the ostiariate are included in the Greek subdiaconate. The same rule applies if one was ordained according to the Greek rite as far as the diaconate or presbyterate; to wit, only the exorcistate must be supplied according to the Latin rite.[10] The other Oriental rites, like those of the Syrian Maronites and Copts, all have the same number of minor orders as the Greek, whereas the Armenians, whose ritual was published officially in 1807, have the full number of the Latin rite.[11]

HOLY COMMUNION IN S. ORDINATION

CAN. 1005

Omnes ad maiores ordines promoti obligatione tenentur sacrae communionis in ipsa ordinationis Missa recipiendae.

What the Pontificale Romanum prescribes, the Code here emphasizes as a universal law, viz.: that all who receive major orders are obliged to go to holy Communion in the ordination mass.

10 See § VII, n. VI.

11 Many, l. c., p. 479 ff.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

TIME AND PLACE OF ORDINATION

DAYS ON WHICH ORDINATIONS MAY BE CONFERRED

CAN. 1006

§ 1. Consecratio episcopalis conferri debet intra Missarum sollemnia, die dominico vel natalitio Apostolorum.

§ 2. Ordinationes in sacris celebrentur intra Missarum sollemnia sabbatis Quatuor Temporum, sabbato ante dominicam Passionis, et Sabbato Sancto.

§ 3. Gravi tamen causa interveniente, Episcopus potest eas habere etiam quolibet die dominico aut festo de praecepto.

§ 4. Prima tonsura quolibet die et hora conferri potest; ordines minores singulis diebus dominicis et festis duplicibus, mane tamen.

§ 5. Reprobatur consuetudo contra ordinationum tempora praecedentibus paragraphis praescripta; quae servanda quoque sunt, cum Episcopus latini ritus ordinat ex apostolico indulto clericum ritus orientalis aut contra.

§ 1. Episcopal consecration must be conferred during the solemnity of the Mass on a Sunday or the feast of an Apostle.

According to the Roman Pontifical,[1] a missa cantata is not required, hence a low Mass is sufficient.

1 De Consecratione Electi in Episcopum si Missa cantatur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The days on which consecration may take place are the Sundays and the feastdays of the Apostles. This term is to be interpreted strictly, and hence episcopal consecration on a holyday of obligation during the week or on a suppressed feastday, is not permitted without a special Apostolic indult. The expression, "feast of an Apostle," is also to be taken in its strict sense, to the exclusion of the feasts of SS. Luke, Mark, and Barnabas.[2]

§ 2 and § 3. Higher Orders should be conferred during holy Mass on the four Ember Saturdays, on the Saturday "Sitientes," before Passion Sunday, and on Holy Saturday. However, the bishop may ordain to higher orders also on any Sunday or holyday of obligation if there be a grave reason for so doing.

The practice here mentioned dates back to the fifth century, at least as far as it concerns the four Ember days and Saturday before Passion Sunday, for these are mentioned in a decree of Gelasius I (492–496), part of which has found a place in Gratian's Decree.[3] Holy Saturday is mentioned only once, in a Decretal of Alexander III, but was assigned as Ordination Day[4] in Rome already by Pelagius II (579–590). The reason for assigning these days was that the solemn fast was protracted to midnight of the following Sunday, on which, as the first day of the week, God commenced to create the world, Christ arose and sent the Holy Ghost upon the disciples.[5] From this it may be understood why Sunday or a feastday is permitted.

The Code requires a gravis causa for conferring sacred orders on any other day besides the six Saturdays. The judgment as to the gravity of the reason is left to the 2 S. Rit. C., April 4, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 186).

3 See c. 7, Dist. 75.
4 C. 3, X, I, 11.
5 C. 4, Dist. 75; Migne, P. L., 54, 625; Many, l. c., p. 238 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bishop. We may be permitted to add that the inconvenience of a "magro" (fast) could hardly be styled a grave reason.

Note that the Code is silent about the fast, which the Pontificale Romanum says should fitly be observed on the day before episcopal consecration. No such obligation is insinuated in our text. It is understood, of course, that ordination on one of the six Saturdays does not per se constitute an excuse for violating the fast. If a feast of obligation, together with the office, is by a special indult transferred to a Sunday, ordination may be held on that day.[6]

We note a few important decisions of the S. Congregations on kindred topics. The S.C. Concilii has always insisted that the bishop should not ordain candidates who have the privilege or an indult allowing them to be ordained extra tempora, on a day which is not a holyday of obligation.[7] The Congregation of Bishops and Regulars once answered, concerning exempt regulars who enjoyed the privilege of being ordained extra tempora, that the bishop may, but is not obliged to, ordain them on odd days.[8] However, even for exempt religious § 5 of our canon is binding.

§ 4. Tonsure may be given on any day and at any hour of the day, in the forenoon or in the afternoon.[9] Minor Orders may be conferred on Sundays and weekdays which have a feast celebrated or marked in the diocesan calendar as duplex. At least this seems the ob-

6 S. Rit. C., March 6, 1896, I, 3 (Dec. Auth., n. 389); but the bishop is not allowed to ordain on the dies a quo.

7 Jan. 15, 1689. On half holidays the S. C. permitted ordination if an indult was given; S. C. C., May 11, 1782 (Richter, Trid., p. 186, nn. 2, 3, 4); S. O., March 5, 1712 (Coll. P. F., n. 280). Our text excludes such days.

8 S. C. EE. et RR., July 18, 1732 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 343).

9 S. C. C., April 13, 1720 (Richter, l. c., n. 5).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vious sense of the term festis duplicibus, although it is true that certain decisions of the S. Rit. C. admit only feastdays of obligation or "double" feasts which were feastdays of obligation before they were suppressed; in other words feasts of Apostles and other suppressed holy-days.[10] However, the legislator, by using the term "festa duplicia" certainly wishes us to understand it in a general sense, and in this sense all the feasts marked as duplicia are days on which minor orders may be conferred. Mane tantum properly signifies an early morning hour, but in view of a decision which permitted the conferring of tonsure and minor orders in the afternoon,[11] we may safely say that mane includes the whole of the time during which it is permitted to say Mass.

§ 5. The custom of ordaining outside the times prescribed in the preceding sections is reprobated. These times must also be observed when a bishop of the Latin Rite, in virtue of an Apostolic indult, ordains a clergyman of an Oriental rite, and conversely. The reason for this latter enactment is the contrary practice of the Oriental bishops, who never received the decrees and decretals of the Western Church and still ordain on any day of the year.[12]

The reprobation of the custom of ordaining on other than the prescribed days also concerns our bishops, who must therefore relinquish the old custom. The faculties[13] which they formerly enjoyed are abrogated, even though they were granted as late as Jan. 1, 1918. The decree of April 25, 1918, has abolished them in foro externo. Exempt religious must also abide by this law.

10 S. Rit. C., Nov. 12, 1831, ad 1; March 16, 1833; Feb. 18, 1843 (Dec. Auth., nn. 2682, 2705, 2852).

11 S. C. C., April 13, 1720 (Richter, l. c., p. 186, n. 5).

12 Many, l. c., p. 262.

13 See Putzer, Comment., p. 144 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DEFECTIVE ORDINATION

CAN. 1007

Quoties ordinatio iteranda sit vel aliquis ritus supplendus, sive absolute sive sub conditione, id fieri potest etiam extra tempora ac secreto.

Whenever ordination has to be repeated, or a rite has to be supplied, either absolutely or conditionally, this may be done outside of the appointed time and secretly.

This brief canon raises a number of incidental questions. Repetition of ordination may become necessary either by reason of a fault committed by the ordaining prelate or by reason of the candidate's disposition. Since ordination in the Latin Church now consists of the double matter of the imposition of hands and the delivery of the instruments, the question naturally arises whether both are essential to the validity of the episcopate, presbyterate, and diaconate. The answer is that, theoretically speaking, only one, namely, the imposition of hands, is essential. However, since in the administration of the Sacraments the safer view (tutior opinio) must be followed, it has been the practice of the Roman Court to order ordination to be repeated if an essential part either of the imposition of hands or the delivery of instruments has been omitted or corrupted. The same rule holds good also with regard to the form. Below we shall rehearse several decisions which illustrate the essential parts of the priesthood and the diaconate. As to the episcopate and the subdiaconate, decisions are scarce, but the practice of the Church may be deduced from analogy.

The matter of ordination to the priesthood comprises the imposition of hands and the delivery of the instruments.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) There are three impositions of hands. The first one, by the bishop and the priests present, is made silently by physical contact with the head of each ordinand; the second is made by the bishop and priests present with extended hands, but without physically touching the heads of the ordinandi, whilst the bishop recites: "Oremus, fratres carissimi," etc. The last one is performed after Communion, when the bishop, sitting in the middle of the altar, puts both hands upon the head of each ordinand and says: "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum."

The first imposition must be made by physically touching the head of the ordained, i.e., the bishop at least must touch the head, or hair, or skullcap of the ordinand; if no physical contact has taken place, the whole rite must be repeated conditionally.[14]

In the second imposition the hands must be extended over the ordinandi, at least for a moment, otherwise the whole ceremony must be repeated conditionally.[15]

If the third imposition was made without physical contact, this one imposition, together with the prayer, must be repeated, but not the whole ordination.[16]

If the first and second impositions were omitted in their proper place, and supplied after Communion, before the "Iam non dicam," the whole ordination must be repeated conditionally.[17]

The same rule applies to the diaconate. If the imposition was made without physical contact, the whole ceremony must be repeated conditionally[18]

(b) Concerning the delivery of the instruments the 14 S. O., Aug. 19, 1851; Jan. 20, 1875; Jan. 26, 1898; July 4, 1900 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1066, 1431, 1989, 2086).

15 S. O., July 6, 1898; July 19, 1899 (ibid., nn. 2009, 2058).

16 S. O., Aug. 19, 1851 (n. 1066).

17 S. O., Aug. 22, 1900 (ibid., n. 2092).

18 S. O., Jan. 20, 1875; Jan. 26, 1898 (l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

following decisions may be cited: If this ceremony was entirely omitted, the whole ordination must be repeated.[19] In one case the imposition was duly made, but the ordinand had forgotten to touch the instruments. The rite had to be repeated.[20]

If the instruments were offered to the ordinand not by the bishop himself, but by another, for instance, the master of ceremonies, the whole ordination must be repeated conditionally.[21]

As to touching the instruments, the Holy Office, has answered in several instances with "Acquiescat," i.e., the ordination is valid if the chalice and paten were touched, even though the host was not; or if the chalice only was touched, and not the paten; or if the paten only was touched, or the host only, without the paten; or if the ordinand touched the chalice first and then the paten, but not at the moment when the bishop pronounced the words; or if the bishop, when reaching the chalice and paten, for some moments interrupted the ceremony.[22]

As to the diaconate, the delivery of the Gospel Book, or the Missal[23] in its place, is required, together with the formula: "Accipe potestatem legendi Evangelium." If this is omitted, or if no moral (not even a dubiously moral) connection was made between the delivery of the book and the act of pronouncing the words, this rite, and it alone, must be repeated secretly; the repetition may be made at the next ordination or, if it is inconvenient for the deacon to wait for the next ordination at any other time.[24]

19 De Syn. Dioec., VIII, 10, 1.

20 S. O., Aug. 1, 1697; cfr. Many, l. c., p. 563.

21 S. O., Jan. 17, 1900; July 6, 1898; Jan. 11, 1899; Sept. 7, 1892 (Coll. P. F., nn. 2075, 2008, 2032, 1811).

22 S. O., Jan. 17, 1900; March 7, 1897; Dec. 14, 1898; April 20, 1898 (Coll. cit., nn. 2075, 1963; A. S. S., Vol. 30, 286, 750).

23 S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1873 (Dec. Auth., n. 3315).

24 S. Rit. C., June 16, 1837 (Dec. Auth., n. 2767).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning the episcopate, the imposition of the hands with physical contact is required; but if this was omitted only by the co-consecrators, nothing is to be repeated or supplied. If the act of placing the Book of the Gospels on the neck of the bishop elect was omitted, it would be advisable to supply this ceremony.[25]

As to the subdiaconate, the delivery of the empty chalice and paten cannot be omitted without endangering the validity of the order. If the physical touch has been forgotten, the whole ordination must be repeated conditionally. But if a chalice containing wine or water would be reached instead of the empty chalice, nothing would have to be repeated.[26]

2. With regard to the form of ordination, it may be observed that the essential form of the episcopal consecration consists either in the prayer "Propitiare," or, more probably, in the preface said after the "Propitiare." The form for the priesthood probably is also contained in the preface, certainly not in the "Propitiare." It is probable that the "Exaudi nos" may be considered as at least the partial form. For the diaconate the form is either the "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum ad robur," or the Preface "Emitte." But nearly every one of these points is controverted.[27] For the subdiaconate there is no imposition of hands, but only a delivery of the instruments, accompanied by certain formulas. The same holds good concerning minor orders.

From these controversial views it may be seen why the Church insists upon having everything performed according to the Pontificale Romanum. Any essential change of the form would render the ordination invalid.

25 Many, l. c., p. 568.
26 Ibid., p. 569.
27 See Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, p. 67; Many, l. c., p. 499 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the formula for conveying the power of forgiving sins were mispronounced, this part would have to be supplied, but the whole rite of ordination would not have to be repeated. In one case a distracted bishop said: "Quorum remiseris peccata retenta sunt, et quorum retinueris remissa sunt," and the Holy Office decided that any bishop pontifically garbed should supply the words wrongly pronounced, and that this might be done at any time and in the bishop's private chapel.[28]

It may be added that the Holy Office, when answering questions as to the possible invalidity of an ordination which was ordered to be conditionally repeated, always employed the phrase: Let the ordination be secretly and conditionally repeated on any day, facto verbo cum Ssmo., in order that he might supply the Masses celebrated [29] out of the treasury of the Church, as far as necessary. Therefore, the bishop [30] should use the conditional form, or have the intention of ordaining conditionally at the beginning, and then perform the whole ceremony as usual. The second part of the clause is added to assure the priest that he is not obliged to say again the Masses said during his dubious state.

If the defects are only accidental, and consequently do not affect the validity of the ordination, they are simply to be supplied. Thus if the anointings were omitted at an episcopal consecration, they must be supplied.[31] But if the anointings were performed and the mode only was defective, or if one kind of oil was mistaken for another, nothing is to be supplied. The same may be said concerning the priesthood. Thus if the master of cere-

28 S. O., May 27, 1840; S. Rit. C., May 22, 1841 (Dec. Auth., n. 2836) S. O., Dec. 9, 1897 (Coll. P. F., n. 1987).

29 For instance, S. O., July 4, 1900 (ibid., n. 2086).

30 The clause "a quocumque episcopo" is sometimes added.

31 Cfr. c. 1, X, I, 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

monies would offer the chrism instead of the oleum catechumenorum, and the bishop used the former instead of the latter, the ordination would not only be valid, but nothing need be supplied.[32] If the formula was slightly mutilated, for instance, by using the singular instead of the plural, or the feminine instead of the masculine gender, or if any words were needlessly repeated, there is no reason for entertaining scruples. In one case, where the bishop had forgotten to pronounce the words "et nostram benedictionem" at the anointing of the hand, the Holy Office answered: "Acquiescat."[33]

3. As to the other orders, the following ceremonies are not to be supplied: for deacons, the putting on of the stole and dalmatic; for subdeacons, the handing of the cruets and putting on of the amice, maniple, and tunic; for ostiaries the opening of the gate and ringing of the bells.[34] But if the epistle book would not have been touched at the ordination of a subdeacon, this omission would have to be supplied.[35]

The validity of ordination furthermore depends on the mental attitude of the ordinand. Compulsion renders ordination null and void. Grave fear does per se not render it invalid, but conveys the right of having oneself declared free of the obligations attached to higher orders, as stated under can. 214. Fear may, moreover, be the cause of not having the right intention. For although a habitual intention is sufficient, fear may preclude even this, because the actual intention caused by fear of not being willing to be ordained, is contrary to the habitual intention. In one case a mother morally compelled her son to have himself ordained by threaten-

32 S. O., July 22, 1871 (Coll. P. F., n. 1421).

33 S. O., Nov. 28, 1900 (A. S. S., Vol. 33, 374).

34 Many, l. c., p. 572.

35 S. C. C., Jan. 10, 1711 (Richter, Trid., p. 178, n. 7).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing to disinherit him. The son presented himself on the day of ordination together with the other ordinandi, and out of human respect permitted the ceremonies to be performed over him, though firmly determined all the while not to receive orders. He bowed his head to the imposition and touched the instruments, but with a reluctant jerk. This was a plain case of lack of proper intention, and the S. Congregation ordered conditional reordination.[36] If sufficient proofs could have been furnished, the S. Congregation would doubtless have decided in favor of absolute re-ordination. A surprising answer was given to a scrupulous priest by his confessor, who said: The external act was sufficient, because the candidate in casu had approached the bishop without compulsion to receive orders. Distinguo: there was no compulsion, concedo; there was the intention to receive orders, nego.

We said that a habitual intention is sufficient. We may add that it is also required. This means that the candidate must have the will or desire to receive the Sacrament, or the will to receive the respective order with its obligations. However, if he wishes the order, he also wishes the obligation, for the two cannot be separated. That the intention is required of receiving the Sacrament, and not the merely external rite, may be made evident from the necessity of distinguishing one Sacrament from another. And since the intention is absolutely required for Baptism[37] and other Sacraments, it follows that the intention must be directed towards the Sacrament of order. Thus if one positively refuses to receive an order now, although he desires to receive it

[36] S. C. C., Melivet., June 18, 1792 (Richter, l. c., p. 175, n. 6).

[37] C. Majores 3, III, 42; Hallier, De Sacris Electionibus et Ordinationibus, P. I, Sect. 5, c. 1 (Migne, Cursus Theol., t. XXIV, p. 407 ff).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

later on, and permits the ceremonies to be performed over him, such a one would not be ordained, but would have to be reordained, at least conditionally, says the Holy Office.[38] If one would make up his mind not to receive orders as a Sacrament, but merely as a natural ceremony, because he looked upon the rites and Sacraments of the Church from a theosophic or a merely natural point of view, he would not be ordained, for the Sacrament of Orders cannot de facto exist without the supernatural order. It is not, of course, required that an ordinand think explicitly of the supernatural order in the course of the ceremony of ordination.

The intention of the ordaining bishop must be virtually, if not actually, directed towards doing what the Church does. If this intention is present and virtually exerts its influence, ordination is valid, even though the bishop may not believe in ordination as a Sacrament or in the Church. The public announcement of the archdeacon that those suffering from a canonical impediment should not present themselves for ordination, has no effect on the validity of ordination, even of those who are irregular. However, if the bishop really had the intention not to ordain those who are irregular, the latter would not be validly ordained, provided it could be proved by a careful investigation that the ordaining prelate had this negative intention, and had not revoked it before or during the act of ordination.[39]

38 S. O., Nov. 28, 1900 (Coll. P. F., n. 2096).

39 S. C. C., Feb. 13, 1682; Jan. 11, 1710, apud Bened. XIV, De Sacrificio Missae, l. III, c. 10, nn. 6–10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ORDINATION OUTSIDE THE DIOCESE

CAN. 1008

Episcopus extra proprium territorium, sine Ordinarii loci licentia, nequit ordines conferre, in quorum collatione pontificalia exercentur, salvo praescripto can. 239, § 1, n. 15.

A bishop is not allowed, without the permission of the local Ordinary, to confer outside his own diocese any orders which require the exercise of pontificals.

This ruling, taken from the Council of Trent,[40] is as ancient as the local organization of the Church. The Oriental synods [41] were as rigorous as the Latin Church with regard to the exercise of pontifical rights. The reason is not far to seek, for the use of such rights presupposes jurisdiction, which (with some exceptions) is restricted to the territory of each Ordinary, and overlapping would cause confusion. Besides, there might be danger of intrusion on the part of candidates for ordination who were rejected by their own Ordinaries. Therefore our canon requires the permission of the bishop in whose diocese the pontificals are to be exercised. Pontificals in the strict sense are exercised only when sacred orders are conferred; for tonsure and minor orders may be conferred in rochette, stole, and simple mitre.[42] If clerics of another diocese join those of the diocese in which a strange bishop confers orders with the permission of the local Ordinary, they may be ordained, provided they have dimissorials from their own bishop.[43]

40 Sess. 6, c. 5, de ref.

41 Cfr. cc. 6, 7, 9, C. 9, q. 2; (c. 28, C. 7, q. 1, (Pseudo-Anaclete).

42 Pont. Rom., "De Ordinibus Celebrandis."

43 Benedict XIV, "Ad Audientiam," Feb. 15, 1753, § 5 f.; S. C. C., 1753; June 25, 1599 (ibid.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cardinals, in virtue of can. 239, 1°, n. 15 enjoy the privilege of pontificating everywhere outside the city of Rome; but if they wish to exercise pontifical functions in a cathedral church, they must first inform the bishop of the diocese. If they wish to confer tonsure and minor orders in a cathedral church they must also demand dimissorials from the bishop.[44]

The suburbicarian cardinal bishops are not allowed to confer orders in their private chapels in Rome without the permission of the Cardinal Vicar.[45]

PLACE OF ORDINATION

CAN. 1009

§ 1. Ordinationes generales in cathedrali ecclesia, vocatis praesentibusque ecclesiae canonicis, publice celebrentur; si autem in alio dioecesis loco, praesente clero loci, dignior, quantum fieri poterit, ecclesia adeatur.

§ 2. Non prohibetur autem Episcopus, iusta suadente causa, ordinationes particulares habere in aliis etiam ecclesiis itemque in oratorio domus episcopalis aut Seminarii aut religiosae domus.

§ 3. Prima tonsura et ordines minores conferri possunt etiam in privatis oratoriis.

§ 1. General ordinations should be held publicly in the cathedral church, and the canons of that church should be called to and be present thereat. If these ordinations are held elsewhere in the diocese, a more prominent church should be selected and the local clergy should be present.

§ 2. The bishop, for a just reason, may hold par-

44 Can. 239, § 1, n. 22.

45 Benedict XIV, Const. cit., § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ticular ordinations in some other church, or in the chapel of the episcopal residence, or in the oratory of a seminary or convent.

§ 3. Tonsure and minor orders may also be conferred in private oratories.

By general ordinations were always understood those conferred on the six Saturdays assigned by law for conferring higher orders. However, can. 1006, § 3, apparently states that these general ordinations may now also be held on a Sunday or holyday of obligation, and therefore a general ordination may be defined as one which should [46] be held on the six Saturdays, but may be transferred to another day for a grave reason. A particular or special ordination is one held extra tempora, i.e., outside the prescribed time. But can. 1006, § 3. does not exclude the time-honored practice and view of the school that general ordinations are really only those held on the six Saturdays, because said canon only says, ordinations for higher orders may be held on a Sunday or holyday of obligation. Therefore the bishop, to say the least, would have to state clearly that an ordination to be held on any other day than one of the six Saturdays, is a general one.

The reason why this must be made clear and manifest lies in the compulsory presence of the canons or clergy. For the Tridentine text [47] which has passed into the Code, as well as several decisions of the S. Congregation,[48] speak only of general ordination at which the clergy must be present. To such an ordination, if held in the cathedral church, the bishop may call the canons under threat of censures.[49] If the ordination is held in some [46] Cfr. cc. 2, 3, X, I, 11; Trid., Sess. 23, c. 8, de ref.

[47] L. c.

[48] S. C. C., Aug. 2, 1727; June 19, 1728 (Richter, Trid., p. 184, n. 1).

[49] Ibid., ad IX; the canons should chant their office at such a time

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other prominent church of the diocese, the local clergy should be present, for the sake of honoring the bishop and out of respect for the sacred ceremony. But compulsory presence cannot be read into the text. The Caeremoniale Episcoporum prescribes that the Blessed Sacrament should be removed from the main altar, if preserved there,[50] during the ordination ceremony.

§ 2 is evident. Any reason may be called just which the bishop considers to be such. By the chapel of the episcopal residence is understood the oratory which bishops, like cardinals, are allowed to have in their residence. The domus episcopalis is the house in which the bishop habitually resides, but the term is not to be interpreted rigidly, as custom permits the bishop to make use, for instance, of a summer residence.[51] The religiosa domus is the one described in can. 488, 5.°, of our Code. Hence we translate it with convent, viz.: a house which belongs to any religious organization. By the name of seminary may be understood the preparatory as well as the grand (theological) seminary. The latter is the seminary par excellence, of course; but since the wording is general, the term may be taken in its broadest sense. What is meant by private oratories is explained in can. 1188, § 2.

as not to interfere with ordination; ibid, ad III.

50 Lib. I, c. 12, n. 8 (Ed. Typ. Pustet, 1886, p. 47).

51 Barbosa, De Officio et Potestate Episcopi, P. II, Alleg. 11, n. 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

ROSTER OF ORDINANDS AND ATTESTATION OF ORDINATION

CAN. 1010

§ 1. Expleta ordinatione, nomina singulorum ordinatorum ac ministri ordinantis, locus et dies ordinationis notentur in peculiari libro in Curia loci ordinationis diligenter custodiendo, et omnia singularum ordinationum documenta accurate serventur.

§ 2. Singulis ordinatis detur authenticum ordinationis receptae testimonium; qui, si ab Episcopo extraneo cum litteris dimissoriis promoti fuerint, illud proprio Ordinario exhibeant pro ordinationis adnotatione in speciali libro in archivo servando.

After ordination the names of those who have been ordained, as well as that of the ordaining minister, together with the place and day of the ordination should be entered in a special book, which must be carefully kept in the court of the place of ordination. Besides, all documents relating to the individual ordinations should be carefully preserved.

Each one who has been ordained should be given an authentic attestation of the order received. In case the candidates were ordained by a strange bishop, with dimissorials from their own ordinary, they must show the certificate to the letter, in order that it may be registered in the special book to be kept in the archives.

"Curia loci ordinationis" may have a twofold meaning: the diocesan court and the court of the place of ordination. That these two denominations are not entirely identical is evident from can. 1009, § 1, which mentions, besides the cathedral, some other prominent church of the diocese. Hence the obvious interpretation would be that in the place of ordination a book should be kept for the purpose of entering therein the names of the ordinati, the ordinans, and the place and date.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

The Code, however, mentions another book to be kept in the diocesan archives. This book is intended not only for the ordinations performed by a strange bishop, but also for the ordinations which the diocesan bishop confers. Hence we may call it the Liber Ordinandorum or Ordinationum. It may also serve the purpose mentioned in § 1, but the Curia of the place where ordination takes place would not on that account be excused from keeping a separate record of its own.

CAN. 1011

Praeterea loci Ordinarius, si agatur de ordinatis e clero saeculari, aut Superior maior, si de religiosis ordinatis cum suis litteris dimissoriis, notitiam celebratae ordinationis uniuscuiusque subdiaconi transmittat ad parochum baptismi, qui id adnotet in suo baptizatorum libro ad normam can. 470, § 2.

In the case of the secular clergy the local Ordinary, and in case of religious ordained with his dimissorials, the religious superior must inform the pastor of the church in which the ordinand was baptized of his ordination to subdeaconship, in order that said pastor may enter the fact in the baptismal register.

The religious superior here mentioned is a superior of exempt religious, because none other can give dimissorials for sacred orders.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROCEDURE IN ORDINATION CASES

(Lib. IV, Tit. 21)

For the sake of convenience and to complete the treatise on ordinations, six canons from Book IV may here find a place.

THE COMPETENT COURT

Can. 1993

§ 1. In causis quibus impugnantur obligationes ex sacra ordinatione contractae vel ipsa sacrae ordinationis validitas, libellus mitti debet ad Sacram Congregationem de disciplina Sacramentorum vel, si ordinatio impugnetur ob defectum substantialem sacri ritus, ad Sacram Congregationem S. Officii; et Sacra Congregatio definit utrum causa iudiciario ordine an disciplinae tramite sit pertractanda.

§ 2. Si primum, Sacra Congregatio causam remittit ad tribunal dioecesis quae clerico propria fuit tempore sacrae ordinationis, vel, si sacra ordinatio impugnetur ob defectum substantialem sacri ritus, ad tribunal dioecesis in qua ordinatio peracta fuit; pro gradibus vero appellationis standum praescripto can. 1594–1601.

§ 3. Si alterum, ipsamet Sacra Congregatio quaestionem dirimit, praevio processu informativo peracto a tribunali Curiae competentis.

§ 1. If the obligations arising from sacred ordination, or the validity of the ordination itself, are disputed, a petition must be filed with the S. C. of Sacraments. If the validity is disputed because of a substantial defect in the holy rites, the S. C. of the Holy Office is competent and shall decide whether the case is to be tried in a judiciary or disciplinary manner.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 2. If the judiciary form is chosen, the S. Congregation shall refer the case to the court of the diocese to which the clergyman belonged at the time of his ordination, or, if the case turns about a substantial defect of the holy rites of ordination, to the court of the diocese in which he was ordained. As to the various instances of appeal, canons 1594–1601 must be observed.

§ 3. If the case is to be settled in the disciplinary way, the S. Congregation itself shall render the decision, after having received the necessary documents from the competent diocesan court.

A petition may be filed to get rid of the obligations attendant upon valid ordination, or to impugn the validity of the ordination itself. In either case vis et metus may be alleged. Yet even grave fear, as can. 264 says, does not render an ordination invalid.

The validity of ordination may, however, be attacked on another score; namely, because of lack of intention, either in the person ordained or in the minister. However, as this defect is difficult to prove, the S. Congregations are very reluctant to declare ordination invalid on that score, although they sometimes take the obligations away. Here the S. C. Sac. is competent.

The question of validity is more readily answered if the sacred rites can be proved to have been defective, because the rites are outward and generally performed in the presence of witnesses. In such cases the Holy Office is competent, because the matter is connected with faith and morals.

Either congregation has first to decide how the peti-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion should be answered. Our text mentions two ways: the disciplinary and the judiciary. The former belongs strictly to the Roman congregations, because it concerns the discipline of the Church. But this is not the only or chief point of distinction between the two ways of settling a question concerning ordination. Another, and the principal one is the fact that an ordination is contested by the person ordained or by a third party interested in the case. When no one is particularly interested, or the matter has no far-reaching consequences in the sacramental discipline, the question is generally settled by the Congregation itself. A plenary session of the Cardinals of the Congregation is required to give the decisive vote, and very important matters furthermore require the ratification of the Pope (Ssms. approvavit).

If either of the S. Congregations, namely, that of the Sacraments or the Holy Office, declares in favor of the judiciary way, the matter is referred to the S. R. Rota,[1] which proceeds according to special norms. It may be noted that neither the S. Congregation nor the S. R. Rota easily pronounce in favor of the nullity of an ordination. The reason is that, with the exception of physical compulsion, it is difficult to furnish convincing proofs. In regard to dispensing from the obligation of celibacy Cardinal Albitinus says of his time: "When I was assessor I saw several pontiffs dispense from celibacy in favor of subdeacons, but hardly ever in favor of deacons, and never in favor of priests, let alone bishops."[2] This, we may safely say, is equally true to-day.

Diocesan courts are requested to note that the Apostolic See always expects either a verdict or at least documents

1 Pius X, "Sapienti consilio," June 29, 1908 (A. Ap. S., I, pp. 11, 87 ff.).

2 De Inconstantia in Fide, c. 36, n. 134; S. C. C., Jan. 25, July 12, 1721 (Richter, Trid., p. 202 ff., n. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

relating to the case. A verdict or sentence is required if the Roman tribunal is to take up the case. But no verdict is to be given before the S. Congregation has notified the diocesan court that the case should be settled ordine iudiciario. This must be expressly stated in the document sent from Rome.

A noteworthy distinction is made in our text when it says that if an ordination is impugned because of a substantial defect in the sacred rites (i.e., the matter and form of the Sacrament), the competent tribunal is the court of the diocese in which the ordination was performed. This is very logical and judicial, and we might call the diocesan court forum competens ratione delicti.

But if the obligations or the validity of the ordination are assailed, the competent court is the one of the diocese to which the plaintiff belongs.

As to the various instances of appeal, the canons mentioned in our text should be observed. Can. 1597 says the second instance is the metropolitan court. But this does not preclude the plaintiff from appealing directly to the Holy See.

For exempt religious the first instance is the provincial, and the second the general, and the proper congregation to appeal to is the S. C. Relig.

Note that if the case appertains to the Holy Office, the religious superior may not interfere.

§ 3 refers to decisions rendered by the S. Congregation itself in the disciplinary way. Such a decision may be couched either in the form of a solution of a doubt, or a favor exempting from the obligations. The latter is the more usual and the less expensive way. But even in that case the diocesan court must furnish the necessary documents (processus informationis), i.e., the depositions of witnesses, the petition, and the recommendation of the Ordinary. No verdict must accompany these papers, but the diocesan court may suggest or insinuate its opinion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE PLAINTIFF

CAN. 1994

§ 1. Validitatem sacrae ordinationis accusare valet clericus peraeque ac Ordinarius cui clericus subsit vel in cuius dioecesi ordinatus sit.

§ 2. Solus clericus, qui existimet se ex sacra ordinatione obligationes ordini adnexas non contraxisse, potest declarationem nullitatis onerum petere.

The clergyman himself, as well as the Ordinary to whom he is subject, or in whose diocese he was ordained, may attack the validity of an ordination.

No one but the clergyman who thinks that he has not contracted the obligations arising from sacred ordination, is entitled to ask for exemption from these obligations.

The two propositions are evident. The validity of ordination touches the public good, as the Sacrament of Orders is intended not so much for the individual cleric, as for the Christian populace at large. The assumption of the obligations involved is personal in recto, although secretly benefiting in obliquo. Hence the validity of an ordination may be attacked not only by the clergyman directly concerned, but also by the Ordinary, whereas exemption from the obligations of the clerical state may be asked for only by the cleric himself.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

MODE OF PROCEDURE

CAN. 1995

Ea omnia, quae tum in Sectione Prima huius Partis, tum in peculiari titulo de processu in causis matrimonialibus sunt dicta, servari etiam debent, congrua congruis referendo, in causis contra sacram ordinationem.

CAN. 1996

Defensor vinculi sacrae ordinationis iisdem gaudet iuribus iisdemque tenetur officiis quibus defensor vinculi matrimonialis.

These two canons enact the same rules for the trial of cases concerning ordination which are laid down in the first section of Book IV for matrimonial cases, as far as they can be adapted for this purpose.

A novelty in Canon Law is the defender of the ordination tie, who, as can. 1996 rules, has the same rights and duties as the defensor vinculi matrimonialis. There was no text or papal constitution which demanded a defender in ordination trials, though it was customary with the S. Congregatio Concilii to employ a defensor as often as it proceeded ordine iuris servato, i.e., in a judiciary way. The rights and duties of the defender are laid down in can. 1967–69 and have been explained in Vol. V of our Commentary.

SUSPENSION PENDING THE TRIAL

CAN. 1997

Quamvis actio instituta fuerit non super ipsamet sacrae ordinationis nullitate, sed super obligationibus

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tantum ex ipsa sacra ordinatione exsurgentibus, nihilominus clericus est ad cautelam ab exercitio ordinum prohibendus.

A clergyman who brings suit for the purpose of being freed from the obligations arising from sacred ordination, even though he does not attack its validity, is provisionally suspended from the exercise of orders. This suspension or rather prohibition is not one in the strict sense of the word, i.e., it is not penal, and consequently the cleric affected by it would not become irregular if he were illicitly to exercise the functions proper to his order.[3]

TWO SENTENCES REQUIRED

CAN. 1998

§ 1. Ut clericus liber sit ab obligationibus quae a vinculo ordinationis manant, requiruntur duae sententiae conformes.

§ 2. Quod ad appellationem attinet, in his causis serventur praescripta can. 1986–1989 de causis matrimonialibus.

Two identic sentences are required to free a clergyman from the obligations attached to sacred orders. Concerning appeals, canons 1986-1989 must be observed.

As is evident from these few canons, a trial in the proper sense of the word requires an appeal, which the defender has to make when the nullity of an ordination or freedom from its obligations has been declared. However, after the second court has ratified the sentence of the first, the defender is not obliged to appeal unless he is convinced, or morally certain (for absolute certainty is neither required nor always possible), that the decisions rendered were wrong, or if there has been a gross disregard of technicalities.

[3] See can. 985, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Having dealt with the Sacraments as far as it seemed necessary and opportune from the viewpoint of Canon Law, we now add the Title on the Sacramentals, because it is closely connected with the same subject.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VIII

THE SACRAMENTALS [1]

DEFINITION

CAN. 1144

Sacramentalia sunt res aut actiones quibus Ecclesia, in aliquam Sacramentorum imitationem, uti solet ad obtinendos ex sua impetratione effectus praesertim spirituales.

The Sacramentals are objects or actions resembling the Sacraments which the Church makes use of by way of intercession to obtain especially spiritual effects.

The word Sacramentals, it appears, was brought into use by Alexander of Hales. The Sacramentals resemble the Sacraments in this that they ordinarily consist of matter and form, or external signs which produce a spiritual as well as a temporal effect, though the former is chiefly intended. They differ from the Sacraments inasmuch as they do not convey sanctifying grace nor produce their effects ex opere operato, but ex opere operantis or through the intercession of the Church. But there is another even more important difference: unlike the Sacraments, the Sacramentals, though traceable to remote antiquity, cannot, as such, claim divine institution.

1 See Arendt, S. J., De Sacramentalibus, Rome 1900; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. I, p. 111 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INSTITUTION, INTERPRETATION, CHANGE

CAN. 1145

Nova Sacramentalia constituere aut recepta authentice interpretari, ex eisdem aliqua abolere aut mutare, sola potest Sedes Apostolica.

The Apostolic See alone can institute Sacramentals, authentically interpret those in use, or abolish or change some of them.

This is not a dogma, as the Council of Trent[2] has not defined this power directly, but only negatively determined that the rites accompanying the administration of the Sacraments may not be arbitrarily condemned, omitted, or changed.

Our text claims the exclusive power of instituting Sacramentals for the Holy See. This is not surprising if we remember the general saying: Lex orandi, lex credendi. The Sacramentals are the living expression of the faith and hope that is in the Church. However, this does not mean that no Sacramentals were instituted without the concurrence of the Apostolic See. For more than one of them, especially the rites surrounding the administration of Baptism, are undoubtedly of Apostolic origin. This explains why the Holy See has consistently refused to depart from such practices as anointings, spittle, breathing, even among nations who were opposed to these rites.[3]

The legislative and ministerial power of the Church alone can declare which rites by their external sign signify the blessing or favor that God wishes to bestow.

2 Sess. 7, can. 13, de sacr.
3 S. O., Sept. 12, 1645 n. 2; March 23, 1656; Nov. 13, 1669; Bened. XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum" Sept. 12, 1744, § 14 (Coll. P. F., nn. 114, 126, 189, 347).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

And it is the intercession of the Church which produces the effects of Sacramentals. That the supreme power invested in the Church is claimed for the Holy See does not, of course, conflict with the idea that God is the efficient cause.[4]

MINISTER OF THE SACRAMENTALS

CAN. 1146

Legitimus Sacramentalium minister est clericus, cui ad id potestas collata sit quique a competente auctoritate ecclesiastica non sit prohibitus eandem exercere.

The legitimate minister of the Sacramentals is any clergyman duly empowered and not forbidden to exercise his power by the competent ecclesiastical authority.

The general rule is that the minister of a Sacramental is the priest, although it is quite true that the sacerdotal character is not required for all Sacramentals.[5] What is absolutely necessary is power granted by the Church, because the latter by her intercession obtains the effects. Another requirement is the clerical state. Therefore a lay catechist cannot administer a Sacramental, for instance, bless a corpse or grave.[6] Much less is a woman, even though she be an abbess, entitled to function as minister of the Sacramentals. Hence the blessings of female religious superiors cannot be Sacramentals in the proper sense of the word.[7]

The power is withdrawn from the legitimate minister by complete suspension from office or excommunication, or the personal interdict.[8]

4 Somewhat confused is Arendt's argumentation, l. c., p. 385.

5 Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, c. 1, n. 1; Pont. Rom., "De Ordinatione Presbyt."

6 S. Rit. C., July 5, 1892 (Coll. P. F., n. 1801).

7 Arendt, l. c., p. 390, n. 362: mera oratio et gratiarum actio.

8 Cfr. can. 2260, 2275.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DIVERSE CONSECRATIONS AND BLESSINGS

CAN. 1147

§ 1. Consecrationes nemo qui charactere episcopali careat, valide peragere potest, nisi vel iure vel apostolico indulto id ei permittatur.

§2. Benedictiones autem impertire potest quilibet presbyter, exceptis iis quae Romano Pontifici aut Episcopis aliisve reserventur.

§ 3. Benedictio reservata quae a presbytero detur sine necessaria licentia, illicita est, sed valida, nisi in reservatione Sedes Apostolica aliud expresserit.

§ 4. Diaconi et lectores illas tantum valide et licite benedictiones dare possunt, quae ipsis expresse a iure permittuntur.

§ 1. No one who lacks the episcopal character can validly perform consecrations, unless he is allowed to do so by law or in virtue of an Apostolic indult.

A consecration is a blessing accompanied by anointing with holy oils, e.g., of a church, an altar, a chalice and paten, a bell, etc. To perform such a consecration validly requires either the episcopal character, or a grant by law or papal indult. Consequently:

(a) All bishops may validly consecrate the objects mentioned above; but a titular bishop needs the permission or consent of the local Ordinary.[9]

(b) Cardinals may by law consecrate churches, altars, and sacred vessels anywhere, with the consent of the local Ordinary.[10] The same applies to vicars Apostolic and prefects Apostolic, even though they are not consecrated bishops, as well as to proprefects and provicars, who may consecrate chalices, patens, and portable altars

9 Can. 1157.

10 Can. 239, § 1, n. 20; can. 1157.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

within the boundaries of their territory and during their term of office.[11]

By law, finally, abbots or prelates nullius may consecrate sacred vessels, churches, and altars, portable as well as immovable.[12]

(c) By apostolic indult all those may consecrate who have obtained the privilege directly and not by way of communication.

What about governing abbots? Our answer to this question is given in Vol. III, p. 353. A decree of the S. Rit. C., Sept. 27, 1659, as well as other decrees state that abbots who, according to can. 625, enjoy the right to use pontificals, provided they are abbates regiminis (to the exclusion therefore of titular abbots) may bless bells, chalices, and similar objects in which anointments are used, but only for the use of their own churches.[13] Nothing is said of altars, nor was this privilege ever included in the general grant;[14] it was not even given to chorepiscopi,[15] because consecration has always been considered a strictly episcopal function.[16] If the privilege has been directly granted to some order or congregation, it is indeed not taken away by the present code, but it remains to be seen whether communicated privileges will stand the test when they are brought up for examination. Here another decision may find a place. The Primate of Hungary had asked the S. Congregation whether in cities far removed from the episcopal residence, which have a bell-foundry, one of the dignitaries 11 Can. 294, § 2; can. 310, § 2.

12 Can. 323.

13 Dec. Auth., 1133, n. XIX; S. Rit. C., Aug. 31, 1737, referring to a decree of Sept. 27, 1659, says: "In decisis et amplius [non proponatur]" for the Cistercians of Stams in the Tyrol; S. Rit. C., May 16, 1744 (Dec. Auth., n. 2377)

14 Benedict XIV, "Ex tuis precibus," Nov. 16, 1748.

15 C. 4, Dist. 68.

16 C. 1, Dist. 25; cc. 2, 9, 11, 12, Dist. 1, de Consecr.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the chapter or a prelate may be delegated to bless bells without anointing. The answer was, No, if the bells are intended for the use of churches and for announcing sacred functions.[17]

§ 2. Any priest may perform blessings which are not reserved to the Roman Pontiff, to the bishops, or to others.

§ 3. The blessing given by a priest, if given without the necessary permission, though reserved, is valid, but illicit, unless the Apostolic See has added an invalidating clause in the reservation.

Blessings reserved to the Pope are: those of the pallium, the Agnus Dei, the Golden Rose, and the swords of princes.[18] Blessings reserved to bishops are: the blessing of abbots, the consecration of virgins, the blessing of holy oils and chrism, the dedication of churches, the consecration of altars and sacred vessels (not vestments), the blessing of bells. These blessings are properly called reserved.[19]

Blessings reserved to others are those reserved to the pastor, as stated in can. 462.

The benedictio mulieris post partum is not a strictly parochial right, but may be imparted by any priest in any church or public oratory.[20]

Blessings reserved to religious orders and congregations are those contained in the appendix of the typical edition of the Roman Ritual.[21]

Not reserved are the blessings mentioned in the same

17 S. Rit. C., May 9, 1857 (Dec. Auth., n. 3042).

18 Van der Stappen, S. Liturgia, Vol. IV, p. 342 ff.

19 We refer the reader to what will be said in Vol. VI and to the Rit. Rom., tit. VIII, cc. 20–21; but cc. 20–22 are no longer reserved.

20 S. Rit. C., Nov. 20, 1893, ad II (Dec. Auth., n. 3813).

21 Ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 95.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ritual under title VIII, c. 1–19, and in the Appendix under: "Benedictiones Non Reservatae."[22] Any priest may give these.

Observe that neither bishops nor vicars general are entitled to grant faculties to priests to impart all the blessings described as reserved in the Roman Ritual, and in which no anointment is employed. This would exceed their ordinary or customary power.[23] Nor may bishops, without an Apostolic indult, impart or delegate other priests to impart the blessings reserved to religious orders.[24] But if reservation is not explicitly accompanied by an invalidating clause, a blessing given without permission is valid, though illicit. An invalidating clause would be: "aliter non valeant," or one expressed by a conditional apposition, or in the form of an ablative absolute. Therefore the rescripts must be carefully read. The clause, "de consensu tamen Ordinarii loci," necessitates the (at least presumed) consent of the Ordinary for the valid use of the faculties. If only the words, "de consensu Ordinarii," without the additional "loci," are found in the rescript, the consent of the religious superior is sufficient for exempt religious, even though the clause contains the former formula, "de consensu Ordinarii loci," provided the faculty is to be used only for the convent, not for a public church or public oratory.[25]

§ 4. Deacons and lectors may validly and licitly perform only such blessings as are allowed them by law. When a deacon confers solemn Baptism, he is not allowed to bless the salt and water.[26] Hence these must be blessed 22 Ibid., p. 220–233; App., p. 26–71.

23 S. Rit. C., April 2, 1875 (Dec. Auth., n. 3343).

24 S. Rit. C., Dec. 2, 1884 (Dec. Auth., n. 3533).

25 See can. 198; Putzer, Comment. in Fac. Ap., p. 74, n. 54.

26 S. Rit. C., Feb. 10, 1888 (Dec. Auth., n. 3684).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for the purpose by the pastor or another priest. A deacon is not allowed, even though he has the permission of the parish priest, to bless houses on Holy Saturday with stole and surplice.[27] Although, if a priest can be had, a deacon is not allowed to accompany the funeral and bless the grave,[28] yet if no priest is at hand, and the Ordinary grants permission, a deacon may perform the funeral service, especially in private houses.[29] A right peculiar to deacons is the solemn blessing of the Easter Candle, after the five grains of incense have been blessed by a priest.

RITES TO BE OBSERVED

CAN. 1148

§ 1. In Sacramentalibus conficiendis seu administrandis accurate serventur ritus ab Ecclesia probati.

§ 2. Consecrationes ac benedictiones sive constitutivae sive invocativae invalidae sunt, si adhibita non fuerit formula ab Ecclesia praescripta.

In performing or administering Sacramentals, the rites approved by the Church must be carefully observed.

Consecrations and blessings, those called constitutive, as well as those called invocative, are invalid if the formulas prescribed by the Church have not been employed.

Constitutive consecrations or blessings are those by which persons or objects are dedicated to the ministry or service of God or religion and become permanently separated from profane use, having received, as it were, a higher or sacred existence.[30] Thus, for instance, persons

27 S. Rit. C., Aug. 8, 1835 (ibid., n. 27, 29).

28 S. Rit. C., Sept. 11, 1847, ad. 10 (ibid., n. 29, 51).

29 S. Rit. C., Aug. 14, 1858 (ibid., n. 3074).

30 Van der Stappen, l. c., IV, p. 340, n. 321; Reg. Juris 51 in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

become sacred by a blessing, as abbots and consecrated virgins.[31] Material objects, such as churches, chalices, and cemeteries, become sacred by being blessed and are withdrawn from common or profane use.

Invocative blessings are intended to confer a spiritual or temporal favor, through the bounty of God, upon persons or objects, without, however, changing their condition or natural state. Thus, e. g., the nuptial blessing is given to a person, women are "churched," machines, ships, etc., are blessed, and so forth.

For most of these blessings the Church has prescribed certain rites or formulas, which are all contained in the Roman Ritual, and should be carefully and accurately followed, without any admixture of frivolous ceremonies or the use of unsuitable objects.[32] This applies especially to the prayers prescribed for exorcisms. Stole and surplice are prescribed for most of these blessings. Those who have the privilege of wearing the rochette may use it, together with the surplice and stole.[33] The priest who imparts the general absolution to secular Tertiaries — and we suppose also to Oblates of St. Benedict — must use the purple stole.[34]

SUBJECT OF SACRAMENTALS

CAN. 1149

Benedictiones, imprimis impertiendae catholicis, dari quoque possunt catechumenis, imo, nisi obstet Ecclesiae prohibitio, etiam acatholicis ad obtinendum fidei lumen vel, una cum illo, corporis sanitatem.

31 The consecratio virginum is only imparted to moniales with solemn vows, and is, as far as we know, not customary in our country.

32 Benedict XIV, "Sollicitudini," Oct. 1, 1745, § 43.

33 S. Rit. C., March 11, 1871, ad II; July 11, 1892, ad I et II (Dec. Auth., nn. 3237, 3784).

34 S. Rit. C., Dec. 22, 1905 (ibid., n. 4176).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Blessings are to be bestowed chiefly upon Catholics; they may also be given to catechumens, and, unless the Church prohibits it, to non-Catholics in order to obtain for them the light of faith, or, together with it, bodily health.

Concerning the blessings which may be given to non-Catholics note that these persons should be instructed not to expect an absolutely sure effect from the use of them. Any superstition based on the number of words employed, or the kind of paper on which they are written, or some special hour must be discountenanced.[35] Relics or objects touched with the holy oils must not be left in the hands of unbelievers.[36] Priests may also bless the houses of schismatics or non-Catholics.[37] Non-Catholics may be admitted to public blessings, for instance, to receive candles, ashes, palms, etc.[38]

EFFECT OF CONSTITUTIVE BLESSINGS

CAN. 1150

Res consecratae, vel benedictae constitutiva benedictione, reverenter tractentur neque ad usum profanum vel non proprium adhibeantur, etiamsi in dominio privatorum sint.

Objects consecrated or blessed by a constitutive blessing should be treated reverently, and not be used for profane or foreign purposes, even though they may be in the possession of private persons.

This is true especially of churches, chapels, sacred vessels, and vestments, as will be seen under the proper heading.

35 S. O., Dec. 11, 1749 (Coll. P. F., n. 374).

36 S. O., Aug. 11, 1768 (ibid., n. 468).

37 S. C. P. F., April 17, 1758 (ibid., n. 411).

38 S. Rit. C., March 9, 1919 (Ephemerides Lit., Vol. 33, p. 771).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXORCISMS

CAN. 1151

§ 1. Nemo, potestate exorcizandi praeditus, exorcismos in obsessos proferre legitime potest, nisi ab Ordinario peculiarem et expressam licentiam obtinuerit.

§ 2. Haec licentia ab Ordinario concedatur tantummodo sacerdoti pietate, prudentia ac vitae integritate praedito; qui ad exorcismos ne procedat, nisi postquam diligenti prudentique investigatione compererit exorcizandum esse revera a daemone obsessum.

CAN. 1152

Exorcismi a legitimis ministris fieri possunt non solum in fideles et catechumenos, sed etiam in acatholicos vel excommunicatos.

CAN. 1153

Ministri exorcismorum qui occurrunt in baptismo et in consecrationibus vel benedictionibus, sunt iidem qui eorundem sacrorum rituum legitimi ministri sunt.

These three canons deal with exorcisms. That the influence of demons over men is real, Holy Writ abundantly proves, most particularly the Gospel of St. Mark. But no less do historical documents prove the power of the Church over the spirits of darkness. The activity of the latter explains not only the peculiar charisma, but also the development of the exorcistate in the Latin and the lectorate in the Oriental Church during the third century. Early writers recommend the invocation of the name of Jesus of Nazareth, warn against unnecessary and curious questioning of the demons, and recommend fasting and

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prayer. As to the rites or ceremonies the same writers mention exsufflatio, laying on of hands, and reading portions of Holy Writ. Classes of obsessed or possessed were distinguished and a special discipline for energumeni was developed.[39]

Our Code says that no one who is endowed with the faculty or power of exorcizing, is allowed to pronounce an exorcism over a possessed person unless he has obtained special and express permission to do so from the Ordinary. The Ordinary may grant this permission only to such priests as are distinguished for their piety, prudence, and integrity of life. No priest shall pronounce an exorcism until he has by a careful and prudent investigation ascertained the fact of real obsession.

The Ordinary who is to give this permission is the one in whose diocese the exorcism is to take place, or the one to whom the priest is subject. For exempt religious he is the immediate superior major, for the text simply says: Ordinarius. That the exorcising priest should be irreproachable and endowed with the necessary qualities follows from the astuteness of the demons and the awful task laid upon the exorcist. The text employs the term obsessos, but we hardly believe that it means only those obsessed by demons in the strict sense of that term, i. e., attacked bodily from without, but includes possession, i. e., control of man's body from within.[40] A conscientious medical expert should be consulted before exorcism is decided upon.

Exorcisms, continues the Code, may be pronounced not only over faithful Catholics and catechumens, but also over non-Catholics [41] and excommunicated persons. The 39 Cfr. Wieland, Die Genetische Entwicklung der sog. Ordines Minores, 1897, p. 114 ff.; Arendt, l. c., p. 347 ff.

40 See Cath. Encycl., s. v. "Possession" (Vol. XII, 315 f.).

41 S. O., Sept. 17, 1681 (Coll. P. F., n. 225).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ministers of the exorcisms employed in Baptism, consecrations and blessings, are the same persons who administer these sacred rites. Hence for these cases no special permission from the Ordinary is required.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

LATITUDES

DATES		0°	5°	10°	15°	20°	25°	30°	35°	40°	45°	50°	55°	60°	65°
		h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.	h.m.
JANUARY	1	1.16	1.16	1.16	1.18	1.20	1.23	1.27	1.32	1.39	1.48	2. 1	2.19	2.48	3.42
	16	1.15	1.15	1.15	1.17	1.19	1.21	1.25	1.30	1.37	1.46	1.58	2.14	2.39	3.22
	31	1.13	1.13	1.14	1.15	1.17	1.20	1.23	1.28	1.34	1.43	1.54	2. 9	2.30	3. 3
FEBRUARY	15	1.11	1.12	1.12	1.14	1.15	1.18	1.22	1.26	1.32	1.40	1.50	2. 4	2.23	2.51
MARCH	12	1.10	1.11	1.11	1.13	1.14	1.17	1.21	1.25	1.31	1.39	1.49	2. 3	2.21	2.49
	17	1.10	1.10	1.11	1.12	1.14	1.17	1.21	1.26	1.32	1.40	1.51	2. 5	2.26	2.58
APRIL	1	1.10	1.10	1.11	1.13	1.15	1.18	1.22	1.27	1.34	1.43	1.55	2.13	2.41	3.35
	16	1.11	1.11	1.12	1.14	1.17	1.20	1.25	1.31	1.39	1.49	2. 5	2.30	3.22	(1)
MAY	1	1.12	1.13	1.14	1.16	1.19	1.23	1.28	1.35	1.45	1.59	2.21	3. 7	(1)	(1)
	16	1.14	1.15	1.16	1.18	1.22	1.26	1.32	1.41	1.53	2.11	2.47	(1)	(1)	(1)
	31	1.15	1.16	1.18	1.20	1.24	1.29	1.36	1.45	2. 0	2.25	3.45	(1)	(1)	(1)
JUNE	15	1.16	1.17	1.19	1.21	1.25	1.31	1.38	1.48	2. 5	2.35	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
	30	1.16	1.17	1.19	1.21	1.25	1.30	1.38	1.48	2. 4	2.34	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
JULY	15	1.15	1.16	1.18	1.20	1.24	1.28	1.35	1.45	1.59	2.23	3.25	(1)	(1)	(1)
	30	1.14	1.14	1.16	1.14	1.21	1.25	1.32	1.40	1.51	2. 9	2.41	(1)	(1)	(1)
AUGUST	14	1.12	1.13	1.14	1.16	1.19	1.22	1.28	1.34	1.44	1.57	2.18	2.58	(1)	(1)
	29	1.11	1.11	1.12	1.18	1.17	1.20	1.24	1.30	1.38	1.49	2. 4	2.27	3.12	(1)
SEPTEMBER	13	1.10	1.10	1.11	1.13	1.15	1.18	1.22	1.27	1.34	1.43	1.55	2.12	2.38	3.26
	28	1.10	1.10	1.11	1.12	1.14	1.17	1.21	1.25	1.32	1.40	1.50	2. 5	2.25	2.56
OCTOBER	13	1.10	1.11	1.11	1.13	1.15	1.17	1.21	1.25	1.31	1.39	1.49	2. 3	2.21	2.48
	28	1.12	1.12	1.12	1.14	1.16	1.18	1.22	1.26	1.33	1.40	1.51	2. 5	2.24	2.52
NOVEMBER	12	1.13	1.13	1.14	1.16	1.17	1.20	1.24	1.28	1.35	1.43	1.54	2. 9	2.31	3. 4
	27	1.15	1.15	1.15	1.17	1.19	1.22	1.26	1.30	1.37	1.46	1.58	2.15	2.40	3.24
DECEMBER	12	1.16	1.16	1.16	1.18	1.20	1.23	1.27	1.32	1.39	1.48	2. 1	2.19	2.48	3.44
	27	1.16	1.16	1.17	1.18	1.20	1.23	1.27	1.32	1.39	1.49	2. 1	2.20	2.49	3.47

(1) The sun does not go down at 18° below the horizon

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 816

UNLEAVENED OR LEAVENED BREAD*

In Missae celebratione sacerdos, secundum proprium ritum, debet panem azymum vel fermentatum adhibere ubicunque Sacrum litet.

This canon recalls part of the history of the Eastern Schism begun under Photius (IXth century) and completed under Michael Caerularius (XIth century), the latter of whom styled the Latins "Azymites" because they used unleavened bread for the Holy Eucharist. It is certain that unleavened bread was commonly used in the Western, or rather Latin, Church since the ninth century, and that the Churches of the Latin Rite made use of such bread also at Constantinople, where the controversy became accentuated under the Patriarch Michael.[1] The question whether leavened or unleavened bread should be employed for the Holy Eucharist affected every attempt at re-union between the Latin and the Greek Church, although there was no dogma directly involved. Indirectly, indeed, an article of faith is implied, inasmuch, namely, as the Greeks and all Orientals who make use of leavened

1 See Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, IV, 733 f.; Hergenröther, Photius, III, 727 ff; Cath. Encycl., II, 172. The historico-critical question concerning the dogmatical point at issue is whether Christ celebrated the Last, respectively the Eucharistic, Supper with unfermented bread. This is confidently asserted by Benedict XIV (De Sacrif. Missae, l. II, c. 10, n. 8). It depends on whether Christ died on the 14th or the 15th of Nisan; for on the latter day the observance of the azymes began; see Smith-Cheetham, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, 1893, Vol. II, 601 f.; Valitutti, Chronology of the Life of Christ, 1918.

* By an oversight this canon was not inserted in its proper place.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bread must believe that leavened as well as unleavened bread is valid matter for the Sacrament.[2] This article of faith, of course, also concerns the Latins, suo modo. But in order not to mix up the different rites, the Church has, ever since the fight became acute, insisted that each Church should follow its own rite, provided only that the belief stated above was firmly held. At the same time the Popes always demanded that the Greeks should everywhere use the bread prescribed by their rite, i. e., leavened bread, and that the Latins should everywhere use unleavened bread, as prescribed by their rite.[3] This is what our canon states when it says that the priest in the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, wherever he says Mass, must use either unleavened or leavened bread, according as his rite prescribes. The obligation is gravis.[4] Since this matter plays quite a conspicuous part in the Oriental Churches, the S. Congregation of the Propaganda has laid down a rule for those of the Oriental Church who wish to be transferred from one Oriental rite to another Oriental rite. If the transfer concerns a change from a rite with unleavened bread to a rite with leavened bread, an Apostolic indult is required. Therefore, if a Melchite, a Copt, a Syrian or a Chaldaean wishes to be transferred to the Armenian or Maronite rite, he needs an indult of the Holy See (S. C. pro Ecclesia Orientali, can. 257). But where no such difference exists, the two bishops (a quo

2 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742, § I, n. II; "Allatae sunt," July 26, 1755, § 22; "Nuper ad nos," Mar. 16, 1743, § 5. The Armenians and Maronites, like the Latins, use unleavened bread; "Allatae," § 23; S. C. P. F., July 31, 1902, n. 1 (n. 2149).

3 "Etsi pastoralis," § VI, n. X.

4 Constit. cit., l. c., enforced it under penalty of perpetual suspension. Lehmkuhl, II, n. 121, 3, says: "A quo [praecepto] vix ulla ratio unquam excusat, exceptâ necessitate complendi sacrificium, si panis adhibitus deprehenditur corruptus, neque alius panis, qualem ritus requirit, potest haberi."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and ad quem) can settle the transfer.[5] This canon does not, of course, do away with special privileges or temporary papal indults.[6]

[5] S. C. P. F., Nov. 20, 1838 (Coll., n. 878). But the decree says nothing concerning a transfer from an Oriental to the Latin Rite.

[6] Thus the Benedictines of the Greek College are permitted to say Mass in the Greek or Latin Rite; this privilege had already been granted formerly to other colleges; see Bened. XIV, "Allatae," § 20.

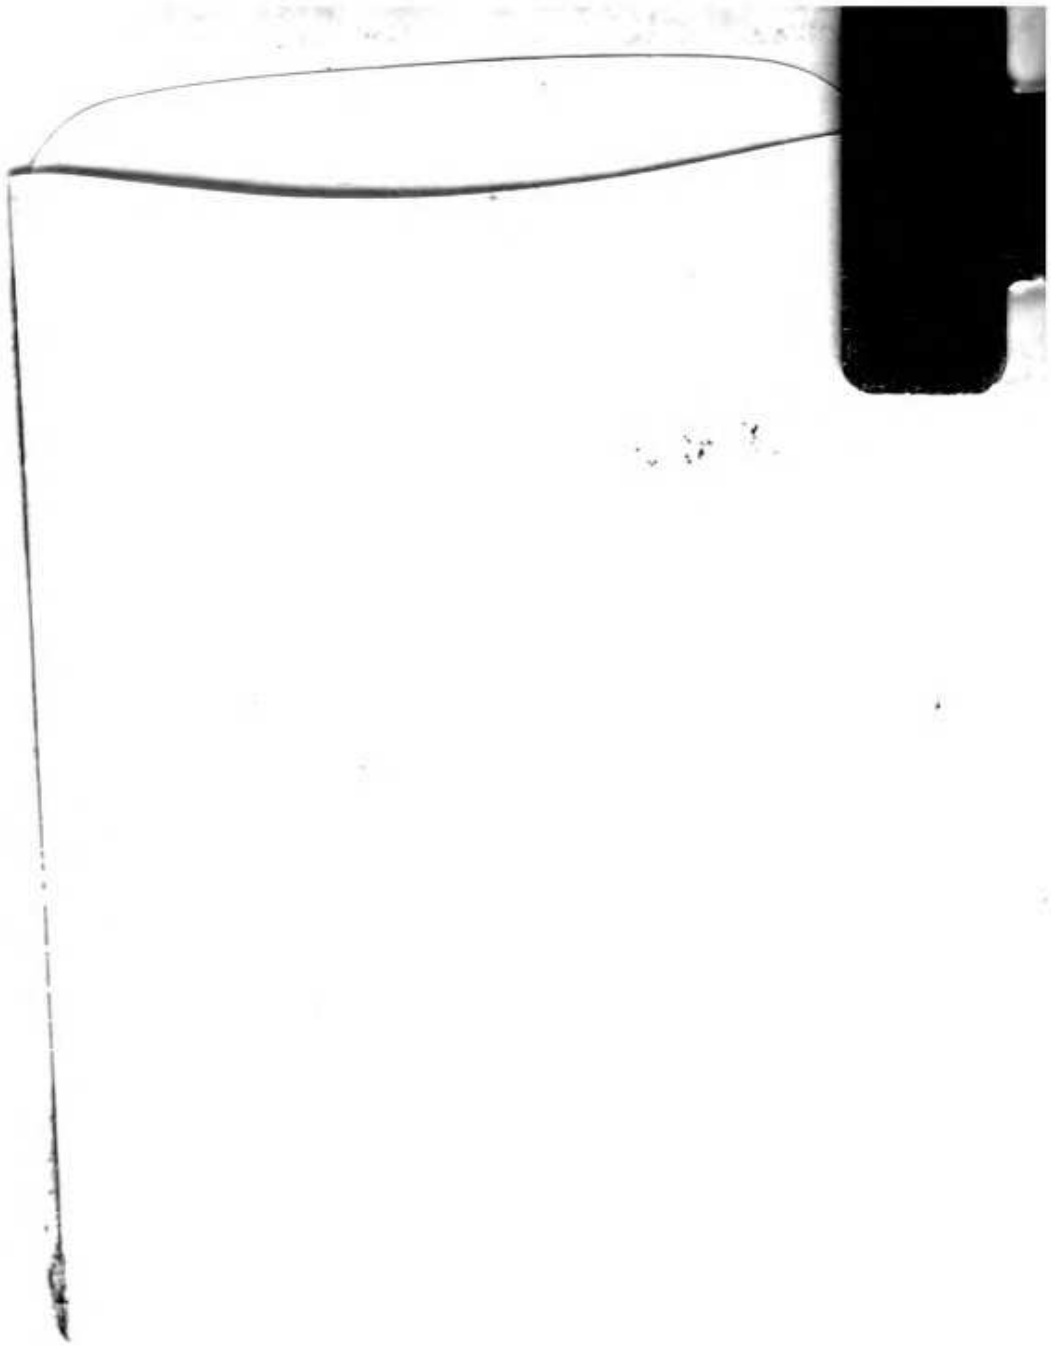
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN



89097198188

B89097198188A

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89097198188

b89097198188a

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library
of the
University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

BOOK III
De Rebus, or Administrative Law

VOLUME V
Marriage Law (can. 1012-1143)
Matrimonial Trials (can. 1960-1992)

SECOND, REVISED EDITION

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68 GREAT RUSSELL ST. LONDON, W. C.
1920

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Cum Permissu Superiorum

NIHIL OBSTAT
Sti. Ludovici, die 14. Jan. 1920.
F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR
Sti. Ludovici, die 15. Jan. 1920.
✠ Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright, 1920
by
Joseph Gummersbach

All rights reserved

Printed in U. S. A.

VAIL-BALLOU COMPANY
BINGHAMTON AND NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
B12
5

587681

FOREWORD

This Volume of our Commentary (the fifth) is published before Volume Four because of the great practical importance of the matrimonial law and because some of my clerical friends strongly urged that it be issued as soon as possible.

We have added the canons from Book IV treating of "Matrimonial Trials," not with the intention of correcting the logical order of the Code, but solely for the sake of convenience. This will, we believe, be appreciated especially by those who have to occupy themselves frequently with matrimonial matters,— we mean the diocesan court officials.

A word concerning the sources. The reader may perhaps be surprised at not finding a large array of secondary sources, i.e., authors cited. There were two reasons which prompted moderation in this respect. The first is that we have given prominence to the primary sources as quoted by Cardinal Gasparri, which we have consulted and made discreet use of. The other reason is a practical one. The English reader does not care to cast his eyes to the bottom of the page for every assertion in the text, and we did not deem it proper to swell the bulk of the book with endless quotations.

For the rest the authors chiefly used have been mentioned among the literary sources.

Conception, Mo., Jan. 14, 1919.

Emmaus Guam Book Shop SV

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

PRELIMINARY REMARKS 1

COMMENTARY 11

TITLE VII. MATRIMONY 11
End and Properties of Marriage 16
Favor Iuris 19
Species of Marriage 20
The Law of Marriage 22
Competence of the Civil Authority 27
Betrothal or Engagement 34
Instructions on Marriage 49

CH. I. THE PRELIMINARIES OF MATRIMONY, AND ESPECIALLY THE BANNS 51
The Bridal Examination (Instructio Sponsorum) . . 52
The Banns 56
The Pastor 57
Time and Place of Publication 60
Obligation of the Faithful to Divulge Impediments . 63
Dispensation from the Banns 64
Ascertaining of the Free Status 70
Consent of Parents 79

CH. II. Impediments in General 81
General Principle 82
Prohibitive and Diriment Impediments 83
Public and Occult Impediments 84
The Supreme Ecclesiastical Authority 85
The Power of Ordinaries 87
The Power of Establishing Impediments 90
Custom Powerless to Establish Impediments . . . 92
Classification of Impediments 93
List of Impediments 94
Dispensations 95

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Power of Dispensing Granted to Ordinaries in Case of Danger of Death 96
Powers Granted to Priests 102
Casus Perplexus 105
Dispensations to be Reported and Recorded . . . 109
Dispensations for the Internal Forum 110
Faculties of Ordinaries 112
Faculties of the Ordinaries of the U. S. and Great Britain 113
Cumulative Faculties 115
Concurrence of Dispensable and Indispensable Impediments 118
Legitimation of Children 119
Error in Dispensation 120
Implied Dispensation from the Impediment of Crime 122
Reasons for Dispensations 124
Execution of Dispensations 128
Charges for Dispensations by Rescript 130
Mention of Delegation When Dispensing 134

CH. III. PROHIBITIVE IMPEDIMENTS 135
Vows 135
Dispensation from Vows 139
Legal Adoption 140
Mixed Religion 141
Conditions under Which Mixed Marriages May Be Permitted 147
Conversion of the Non-Catholic Party 149
Non-Catholic Ministers Excluded 149
Duties of Pastors 153
Marriages with Indifferentists Discouraged . . . 154
Public Sin and Censure 157

CH. IV. DIRIMENT IMPEDIMENTS 162
Age 162
Impotency 164
Ligamen or Bond of a Previous Marriage 173
Disparity of Worship 179
Sacred Orders 187
Religious Profession 189
Abduction (Raptus) 192

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE
Crime 195
Consanguinity 200
Extent of Consanguinity 201
Lines and Degrees 203
Multiplication of Relationships 206
Affinity 208
Public Propriety 212
Spiritual Relationship 214
Legal Adoption 217

CH. V. MATRIMONIAL CONSENT 222
The Consent Itself 222
Error — Servitude 231
Error as to the Nature of Marriage 235
Internal and External Consent 239
Violence and Fear (Vis et Metus) 243
Mode of Expressing the Consent 249
Marriage by Proxy 250
Conditional Marriage 253
Continuance of the Consent 262

CH. VI. FORM OF CELEBRATING MARRIAGE 265
Historical Note 265
Tridentine Discipline 267
Present Legislation Concerning the Valid Form of Marriage 270
Requisites of Formal Validity 271
Requisites on the Part of Pastor and Ordinary . . 275
Requisites of Delegation 282
Requisites of Licit Assistance 286
Two Special Cases 293
Extent of the Law with Regard to the Form of Marriage 296
Marriage Rites 304
The Catholic Marriage Rite 305
Ceremony for Mixed Marriages 308
Recording Marriages 311

CH. VII. MARRIAGE OF CONSCIENCE 315

CH. VIII. TIME AND PLACE OF MARRIAGE CEREMONIES . 319
The Time 319

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

The Place 321

CH IX. THE EFFECTS OF MARRIAGE 324
Mutual Rights and Duties 325
Rights of the Wife 329
Duties of Parents towards Their Children 330
Legitimacy of Children 331
Legitimation of Children 335

CH. X. SEPARATION OF MARRIED COUPLES 339

ART. 1. DISSOLUTION OF THE MATRIMONIAL BOND . . 339
Ratified and Consummated Marriages Indissoluble . 339
Matrimonium Ratum 341
The Pauline Privilege 346
Nature of the Pauline Privilege 348
Character and Necessity of Interpellation 352
Mode of Interpellation 354
Effect of Interpellation 356
Three Papal Constitutions 360
Former Marriage Dissolved 365
Presumption in Doubtful Cases 367

ART. 2. SEPARATION AS TO BED, BOARD, AND DWELLING-PLACE 369
Adultery a Cause of Separation 370
Taking Back the Guilty Partner 374
Other Causes for Separation 376
Education of Children 378

CH. XI. REVALIDATION OF MARRIAGE 379

ART. 1. SIMPLE REVALIDATION 380
Nature of Revalidation 380
Mode of Renewal after the Impediment is Removed . 384
Marriage Null for Want of Consent 386
Marriage Null for Want of the Requisite Form . . 388

ART. 2. REVALIDATION IN RADICE 389
Nature of the Sanatio 389
When a Sanatio in Radice is Possible 392
When Renewal of Consent is Impossible 394
By Whom a Sanatio May Be Granted 396

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

CH. XII. SECOND MARRIAGES 397

MATRIMONIAL TRIALS (Book IV, Title XX, Can. 1960–1992) 400

TITLE XX 400

CH. I. THE COMPETENT COURT 400
Competency of the Church 400
The Roman Court 404
The Diocesan Court 406
Want of Consent 409

CH. II. CONSTITUTION OF THE TRIBUNAL 411
The Judge 411
The Defensor Vinculi 412
Duties of the Defensor 412
Rights of the Defensor 413

CH. III. WHO MAY ATTACK MARRIAGES AND ASK FOR A DISPENSATION FROM A RATIFIED MARRIAGE . . . 416
Who May Be Plaintiff 416
Accusation post Mortem 420

CH. IV. LEGAL PROCEEDINGS 422
Witnesses 422
Testimonium Septimae Manus 422
Bodily Inspection 424

CH. V. PUBLICATION OF THE ACTS — CLOSE OF TRIAL — SENTENCE 428

CH. VI. APPEALS 432

CH. VII. CASES EXCEPTED FROM THE PRECEDING RULES . 435

APPENDIX I. SOME SPECIMEN PETITIONS FOR MATRIMONIAL DISPENSATIONS 440
For Mixed Marriages or Disparity of Worship . . 440
Pro Sanatione in Radice 440
Double Impediment 441
For a Sanatio in Radice to the S. Poenitentiaria . . 441

APPENDIX II. (Table Illustrating Can. 1099, §2, p. 303) 443

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

APPENDIX III. 445

APPENDIX IV. 447

APPENDIX V. 450

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

THE LAW OF MARRIAGE

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

Marriage, from the medieval Latin word maritaticum (old French mariage), corresponds to the old Latin matrimonium, and signifies, in general, the union of man and woman for the purpose of procreation. This indicates the original and primary end of marriage; the difference of sex is the foundation of procreation and union is the source of generation. However this union is one of peculiar character and properties, and has been acknowledged as such by the long-standing tradition of mankind. It is not merely a mating of male and female, but a union based upon consent, such as only a human being is capable of giving.

We do not intend to enter upon an ethnographical or anthropological study of matrimony [1] or to relate the vicissitudes which it underwent among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. True, Church Law has borrowed impediments from the Sacred Writings of the Chosen People [2] and also embodied Roman laws in its Code.[3] Yet, in

1 The literature may be consulted in the Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. IX, 693 (by Prof. J. Ryan), and in the New International Encyclopedia, 1904, Vol. XIII, 86 ff.

2 For instance, the impediments of consanguinity and mixed religion.

3 The impediment of adoption is based on that law.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spite of these borrowings, Christian, more specifically, Catholic Marriage stands out quite singularly. First and above all, the character of Christian marriage is raised to the supernatural sphere through its elevation to the dignity of a sacrament. However, it would be wrong to imagine that this dignity destroyed its essential natural characteristics. For, as grace does not destroy nature but lifts it up, so neither does the sacramental character destroy Christian marriage but rather perfects it.

The primary end for which matrimony was instituted is the procreation of children or the propagation of the human race. This end is achieved by the means which nature dictates, i. e., by the intercourse of husband and wife. Therefore, matrimony is called a union. Now a union between human beings postulates mutual consent. Nowhere is sexual union regarded as marriage unless it is in some way socially sanctioned,[4] and social sanction presupposes an agreement between the parties concerned. It is therefore a hazardous attempt[5] to prove from scattered texts that sexual intercourse (copula) alone constitutes the formal element of matrimony. This opinion confuses the essential, elementary constituent of marriage with its primary and most important purpose. That there are secondary purposes connected with marriage is evident. They are two: mutual help and companionship and a lawful remedy against concupiscence.[6] But these two purposes are subordinate to the first and primary end, which is the propagation and continuation of the human race. These three ends of marriage seem to be alluded to in the definition of Modestinus: "Nuptiae sunt coniunctio maris et feminae et consortium omnis vitae, divini et

4 New International Encyc., XIII, 87.

5 Freisen did this in the first edition of his Geschichte der Quellen des Kan. Eherrechts, but he modified his position in the second edition, 1892, p. xix.

6 Gen. II, 18; 1 Cor. VII, 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

humani iuris communicatio." [7] Nuptiae indicated a marriage performed according to the Roman law, which strictly required mutual consent.[8] But there is another definition in Roman Law, viz.: Nuptiae sive matrimonium est viri et mulieris coniunctio, individuam vitae consuetudinem retinens,[9] i. e., a union of man and woman retaining the individual custom of life. To us there seems little doubt that this definition expresses two essential properties, namely, unity and indissolubility. Unity is indicated by the singular: man and woman, not men and women. It means that this union is to be entered upon by one man with one woman, and hence polyandry as well as polygyny are deviations from the Roman as well as the Christian law of marriage, and from its typical form. Polyandry, or the union of several husbands with one wife, existed among some primitive tribes,[10] but in most instances was the exceptional form of conjugal union. Polygamy or polygyny, i. e., the union of several women with one husband, existed among some ancient peoples, including the Hebrews, and still exists among some civilized nations and the majority of savage tribes. However, as has truly been observed, the great majority of peoples are monogamous, and the other forms of marriage are usually modified in a monogamous direction.[11] The Greeks and Romans show no traces of polygamy. The latter also prove the indissoluble character of matrimony as opposed to complete divorce. For up to the year 520 A. U. C. there was no divorce in Rome, and Sp. Carvilius Ruga greatly surprised his fellow-citizens by departing from the ancient custom.[12] At Athens divorce was more easily ob-

7 L. 1, Dig. 23, 2, de ritu nuptiarum.
8 L. 2, ib.; pr. Iust., I, 10.
9 L. 1, Inst., I, 9.
10 Cfr. Cath. Encyc., ix, 694.
11 Westermarck, The History of Human Marriage, 1891, p. 510.
12 Cfr. Savigny, Vermischte Schriften, 1850, Vol. I, p. 81 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tained, especially by the husband, whereas Sparta long maintained the purity of marriage.[13] The early Christian emperors, Constantine, Theodosius, and Justinian, legalized divorce, but before the tenth century the Catholic teaching on the indissolubility of marriage had become embodied in the civil legislation of every Christian country.[14] At the time of the Reformation, the Protestant Churches of the Continent rejected the sacramental character of marriage and admitted divorce.[15] Luther regarded matrimony as a purely secular matter, which should be regulated by civil law. This was done, and in the nineteenth century, the State took marriage entirely under its control, though civil marriage had already been imposed in Holland in 1580, Cromwell had introduced it in England and Ireland in 1653, and France required it for the Huguenots in 1685. But these are rather solitary examples. The nineteenth century, ushered in by the French Revolution, produced a wholesale civil legislation concerning marriage.

A civil marriage is one contracted according to the laws of the country before a civil magistrate and having a legal status without regard to ecclesiastical legislation.[16] Not all countries prescribe civil marriage in the same manner, but three kinds may be distinguished:

(1) Optional or facultative civil marriage, which leaves the parties free to contract marriage either before the civil magistrate or before the ecclesiastical authorities. This, we may safely say, is the statutory law in the U. S. And here it may be added that Lord Hardwicke's Act[17] was never applied to the colonies and therefore never be-

13 Müller-Bauer, Die griech. Privat- und Kriegsaltertümer, 1893, pp. 152, 142.

14 Cath. Encyc., IX, 696.

15 New International Encyclopedia, XIII, 90.

16 De Smet, De Sponsalibus et Matrimonio, ed. 2, 1910, p. 304.

17 Acts Geo. II, c. 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

came a part of the common law of the United States. This Act demanded that a church marriage be preceded by the publication of banns, except when a special license was secured, and declared any other form of marriage invalid. This act was modified for England by Lord Russell's Act, and supplemented by others.[18] This legislation left a choice between marriage according to the forms of the Established Church, marriage according to the forms of other registered denominations, and civil marriage before a registrar. But a registrar's certificate is required also for Catholics. In nearly all the States of the Union statutes have been enacted providing for a ceremonial marriage, and in most cases requiring also a license granted by a properly constituted officer. The ceremony is to be performed in the presence of two or more witnesses by a priest or clergyman of some church, or by certain civil magistrates, such as judges of courts of record, justices of the peace, police justices, mayors, aldermen of cities, and county clerks. Where the State[19] does not require this formality for a valid marriage, an informal marriage would be valid, though liable to prosecution. It follows that a clergyman, either Catholic or non-Catholic, who can prove his ordination by credentials, is a public civil official when he assists at marriage and in this regard is in no wise distinguished from a judge of the superior or county court or a justice of the peace.[20] It is evident that the State has the right to demand certain qualifications and conditions in the minister[21] of matrimony as 18 Acts Vict., c. 21 and 19, 20, Vict., c. 119.

19 According to the New Intern. Ency. (l. c., p. 92), the following States insist on this formality under an invalidating clause: Cal., Ky., Md., Mo., Mass., N. C., Vt., Wash., W. V.

20 K. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 332.

21 The term minister is here used in its legal, not its ecclesiastical, sense.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

well as in the contracting parties. Civil marriage in this sense can hardly be called objectionable.[22]

(2) Necessary civil marriage is that conditionally required by the State if the contracting parties belong to no religious sect or suffer from an ecclesiastical (not civil) impediment. Such a law exists in Austria since May 25, 1868.

(3) Civil marriage is called obligatory if it is prescribed by the State as an absolutely necessary condition to obtain civil acknowledgment of the matrimonial status with all its effects. The countries which have introduced it deny any civil effect or consequence to the religious ceremony and disregard ecclesiastical legislation. Obligatory civil marriage is in force in Belgium (Code, art. 109), France (Code civ., tit. 2), Germany (Bürgerl. Gesetz-Buch, §§ 1316–1322), Holland (Const. of 1833), Hungary (law of Dec. 9, 1894), Italy (Codice Civile, lib. I, tit. 5, art. 93–99), and Switzerland (Dec. 23, 1875, art. 29–43).

Against this abuse the Catholic Church, for obvious reasons, has never ceased to raise her voice. Her chief objections to obligatory civil marriage are: it deprives marriage of its sacred character, obstructs the legislation of the Church concerning her Sacraments, encourages divorce, and fosters religious indifference.[23]

ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION

The Code speaks of ecclesiastical legislation in two different places. One canon [24] says that matrimony among baptized persons is governed not only by divine, but also by canon law. Another text [25] states that the supreme ecclesiastical authority alone has the right to judge 22 England has optional civil marriage since 1836; Ireland since Aug. 29, 1844; Scotland since Aug. 7, 1854; Spain since 1883.

23 Leo XIII, "Ci siamo," June 1, 1879.

24 Can. 1016.

25 Can. 1038, 1040.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

whether divine law prohibits or invalidates matrimony, and to establish ecclesiastical impediments, and that no inferior authority may abrogate or derogate from such impediments or dispense from them. It would, however, be unhistorical to assert that this centralized legislation has been in force always. The fact is that the Council of Trent [26] first defined as an article of faith the power of the Church to establish impediments. The different impediments were determined gradually, as will be seen further on. Gratian [27] says that in his time marriages were governed not by civil, but by ecclesiastical law, as bishops and metropolitans decided matrimonial cases, especially at synods. This particular, local or provincial, legislation did not, however, prevent appeals to the Roman See, particularly from princes and nobles, as Lothair II (855–869) and Robert I (922–923).

Matrimonial laws were issued by Nicholas I (858–87) in his answers to the questions proposed by the Bulgarians.[28] The same Pope also stated the principle which should govern the application of civil laws to this subject. These, he says, must not be used for settling ecclesiastical controversies, especially if they are contrary to the evangelical teaching and canons.[29] The same view is expressed with regard to the civil law admitting divorce by SS. Ambrose [30] and Jerome. The latter says: The laws of Christ differ from those of the Caesars, and what Paul prescribes differs from what Papinianus says.[31] Hippolytus reproaches Pope Callistus for permitting noble Roman ladies to marry slaves, which was against the civil law.[32]

26 Sess. 24, cc. 3, 4, de Mat.

27 Dictum ad c. 7, C. 2, q. 3: "Cum Matrimonia hodie regantur iure poli, non iure fori."

28 C. 2, C. 27, q. 2; c. 3, C. 30, q. 5.

29 C. 1, Dist. 10.

30 C. 2, C. 33, q. 2; ep. 60, c. 8 (Migne, 16, 1185).

31 Ep. ad Ocean., 77, 3.

32 Döllinger, Hippolytus und Kallistus, 1853, p. 158 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Justin Martyr condemns concubinage and divorce as admitted by the civil law and says that those who practice polygamy, even though they may be in accord with human law, are sinners in the eyes of the Church.[33] From these few scattered testimonies it may be seen that the Church maintained her own matrimonial regulations and opposed civil enactments contrary to her teaching. The chief and most important laws were those upholding the unity and indissolubility, which are the main properties of Christian marriage, as understood by the Church. She authoritatively interpreted many texts of Holy Writ,[34] and from her interpretation important conclusions were drawn in the realm of Canon Law.

Properly speaking, there are no sources of matrimonial law, because it was a part and parcel of ecclesiastical legislation. Thus Gratian refers to marriage in the Causae XXVII to XXXVI of his "Decretum" with the exception of q. 3, C. XXXIII de Poenitentia. The Quinque Compilationes as well as the Decretals treat of Matrimony in Book IV. After the Tridentine Council the decisions of the S. C. Concilii were of great help to the canonist. Many of these decisions are found in John Baptist Pittono's "Constitutiones Pontificiae et Rom. Congregationum Decisiones ad Matrimonium Spectantes," Venice, 1735; in Gallemart's "Concilium Tridentinum," Venice, 1780; in Zamboni's "Collectio Declarationum S. C. Concilii," Atrebati, 1860; in Richter's "Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini," 1853. A very important collection containing much matter on our subject is the "Collectanea S. C. de Prop. Fide," Rome, 1907, 2 vols. Since Pius X's decree "Ne temere" (Aug. 2, 1907) the decisions on the same given by the S. C. Concilii and the S. C. Pro Re

[33] Apol., I, 15.
[34] Gen. 2, 23; Matth. XIX, 4 ff.; Eph. V, 25, 32; 1 Cor. VII, 11 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sacramentaria are valuable sources of information.

As to the literary apparatus, the following works may be profitably consulted: "Lex Dei sive Mosaicarum et Romanarum Legum Collatio"[35] of the fifth century; "Lex Romana Canonice Compta" (§ 27–32), interesting as a monument of the eighth century for reckoning the degrees of relationship;[36] the collections of Burchard of Worms, "Decretum" (lib. VII and IX) and Ivo of Chartres, "Decretum" (lib. VIII) and "Panormia" (lib. VI). A very interesting monograph is the work of Hincmar of Rheims, "De Divortio Lothari Regis et Theutbergae Reginae."[37] Rhabanus Maurus composed a "Tractatus de Consanguinorum Nuptiis."[38]

Noteworthy are the "Summae de Matrimonio" of BernardusPapiensis,[39] Robert of Flamesbury,[40] and Tancred,[41] and Roffredus de Epiphanio's "Libelli de Iure Canonico,"[42] especially book III. John Andreae compiled a "Summa de Sponsalibus et Matrimonio cum Arbore Consanguinitatis."[43]

Works of authors chiefly consulted by us are the commentaries of Fagnani, Engel, Reiffenstuel, Schmalzgrueber, Boeckhn, Wernz (fourth book). A classical work is the Jesuit Thomas Sanchez's "De S. Sacramento Matrimonii" (Nuremberg, 1706). Besides these the manuals of Heiner (1905), Leitner (1912), Smith's Marriage Process (1892), Gasparri's De Mat., ed. 3; Feije's De Imped. et Dispensat. Matrim., ed. 3; v. Scherer's K.-R., vol. II, have proved a great help in the making of this commentary. Of course, these sources and authors, 35 Freisen, l. c., p. 2.

36 Published by M. Conrat (Kohn), Amsterdam, 1904, pp. 29–35.
37 Migne, P. L., 125, 619 ff.
38 Ibid., 110, 1085 ff.
39 Ed. Laspeyres, 1860, Appendix, pp. 287 ff.
40 Cfr. Schulte, Quellen, I, 208 f.
41 Ed. Wunderlich, 1841.
42 Cfr. Schulte, l. c., II, 75 f.
43 Friedberg, Decretum Magistri Gratiani, p. 426.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google though still useful, are now somewhat antiquated. Concerning dispensations and procedure mention may be made of Giovine, De Dispensationibus Matrimonialibus, 1863; Joder, Formulaire Matrimonial, 1891; Zitelli, De Dispensationibus Matrimonialibus, 1884; Mansella-Solieri, De Causis Matrimonii, 1906. For historical researches we used Esmein, Le Mariage en Droit Canonique, 1891, and Freisen, Geschichte des Kan. Eherechts, 2nd ed., 1902. On the physiological and medical aspects we consulted Antonelli, Medicina Pastoralis, 1909; Eschbach, Disputationes Physiologico-Theologicae, 1901; and O'Malley-Walsh, Essays in Pastoral Medicine, 1911.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VII

ON MATRIMONY

CAN. 1012

§ 1. Christus Dominus ad sacramenti dignitatem evexit ipsum contractum matrimonialem inter baptizatos.

§ 2. Quare inter baptizatos nequit matrimonialis contractus validus consistere, quin sit eo ipso sacramentum.

The Lord Christ himself has raised the marriage contract between baptized persons to the dignity of a Sacrament, and hence there can be no valid marriage contract between baptized persons which is not at the same time a sacrament.

This canon enunciates two truths which no Catholic is at liberty to deny, viz.: (1) that matrimony is a Sacrament, and (2) that the marriage contract is the sacrament. To which must be added (3) that both statements apply only to baptized persons.

1. Marriage is a Sacrament, that is, as Dogmatic Theology proves, a visible sign instituted by Christ as a means of sacramental grace. The sign consists of matter and form, which are described by Benedict XIV as follows: The mutual and lawful surrender of the bodies indicated by words or signs expressing the interior consent is the matter of the Sacrament, whilst the mutual

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and lawful acceptance of the bodies is its form.[1] Hence the remote matter are the bodies of the contracting parties. Bodies, we say, as far as they are apt for generation, which is the primary end of marriage. A contract is made by two persons fit for marriage, and this contract is expressed by the mutual consent, which is an essential condition of a valid marriage.

The visible sign or nuptial consent conveys sacramental grace, according to the teaching of St. Paul, Eph. V, 25–32, where the matrimonial contract is represented as a symbol of the union between Christ and His Church. When Christ raised marriage to the dignity of a Sacrament is a matter of theological speculation.[2] Some say, at the wedding feast of Cana in Galilee; others, when He uttered the words recorded in Matt. XIX, 8, on His journey to Jerusalem; others, after the Resurrection.

The grace attached to the sacrament of matrimony corresponds to the threefold effect which usually follows marriage: (a) the bonum sacramenti, or sacramental effect, which is potential indissolubility or inseparability in a higher degree accruing to marriage by reason of the Sacrament; (b) the bonum fidelitatis, which touches the secondary purpose of marriage, viz.: mutual help and restriction of concupiscence; for the sacrament conveys the title to the actual graces necessary in the discharge of the duties of the married state; (c) the bonum prolis, or offspring, which is quasi-sanctified by a Christian marriage. Out of Christian wedlock are born children for the propagation of the Church.[3] Lastly, the education and bringing up of the children is ennobled by sanctified love.

1 "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758 (Bull., Prati, t. IV, app., p. 495).

2 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, Vol. IV, p. 151.

3 Cf. 1 Cor. 7, 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Matrimony being one of the Sacraments of the living, supposes the state of sanctifying grace. Should there be an obstacle (obex) at the time the contract is made, the sacramental grace is received as soon as this obstacle is removed.

That Marriage is a Sacrament conveying grace is an article of faith.[4] The Church condemned the tenets of the Gnostic Encratites, the Manichaeans, and the Albigenses, as well as that of the Protestants, who regard marriage as a purely worldly matter.

2. That contract and Sacrament cannot be separated is not strictly de fide, but "common and certain teaching," because the contrary proposition was condemned in the Syllabus of Pius IX (1864).[5] The Gallicans and Josephinists maintained that the sacramental character is purely adventitious and may be separated from the contract, and that the sacrament is constituted by the nuptial blessing.[6] This sounds very pious, but the purpose actuating these authors was obviously to subject the contract to the State and leave the nuptial blessing alone to the Church. We do not wish to say, however, that the theory was entirely destitute of a theological prop, because Melchior Canus (1560) and Tournely of the Sorbonne had defended the opinion that the sacerdotal blessing constituted the form of matrimony and that, consequently, the assisting priest was the real minister of Marriage. This opinion was novel. St. Thomas[7] and the Decretum pro Armenis[8] plainly state that the efficient cause of Matrimony is the mutual consent expressed by words in the present tense. It follows that the priest is not the minister of the Sacrament, but merely an authorized witness. But this view

4 Trid., sess. 24, can. 1 de mat.

5 Nn. 66, 73.

6 The names of Antonio de Dominis, Launoy, Theimer, Ziegler, J. N. Nuitz, Professor of Turin, are known.

7 Suppl., III, q. 42, art. 1, ad 1.

8 Denzinger, n. 702.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

involves a difficulty. If the matter and form of Matrimony essentially consist in the mutual surrender and acceptance of the bodies, as expressed by conclusive signs, how could the Church have dared to add something to the essential elements by requiring the presence of the priest for the validity of Marriage? The answer is that the Church, while preserving the matter and form of the Sacraments, is empowered to add new conditions of validity if the public welfare or other grave reasons advise such a course.[9] In doing so she does not change the essentials of the contract, but for the sake of public utility or necessity surrounds the contract with certain formalities that must be observed. Similarly the State prescribes certain formalities which must be observed before a contract receives official sanction and obtains juridical effects.

3. The Code adds in both paragraphs: "matrimonium inter baptizatos," i. e., only among baptized persons is the nuptial contract a Sacrament. The reason lies in the character of Baptism, which impresses on the soul the indelible mark of Christian initiation or dedication, and is therefore a conditio sine qua non of the Sacrament of Matrimony, though not its causa efficiens,[10] which is the mutual consent of the contracting parties.

Here two questions occur: (a) is Marriage between a non-baptized person and a baptized person a Sacrament? The answer, according to the more probable opinion, is no, because an infidel is absolutely incapable of receiving sacramental grace, and since the Sacrament is numerically one in both parties, as is the contract, when one party is incapable of receiving the Sacrament, the other is also in-

9 Cfr. St. Thomas, Quaestiones Quodlibetales, V, q. 8, art. 15, ad 1; Benedict XIV, "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758.

10 Thus Leitner, Eherecht, 1902, p. 61.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google capable.[11] The argument from the jurisdiction which the Church claims over such marriages is unsound because this jurisdiction is claimed by reason of one person belonging to the Church.

(b) Does the Marriage of an unbaptized couple become a Sacrament if they receive Baptism without renewing their consent? Sanchez and the majority of authors answer in the affirmative, and most logically, because the matrimonial consent endures and by the reception of Baptism the contract becomes a sacramental union symbolizing the union of Christ with His Church.[12] The same holds good concerning Matrimony by proxy. Such a marriage, if duly contracted, does not differ substantially from any other, and since the Sacrament cannot be severed from the nuptial contract, a marriage by proxy is a true Sacrament.[13]

We will add a note on the different Latin names given to Marriage.

Matrimonium is derived from the office (munus) of the mother (mater), because the principal purpose which a woman should have in getting married is to become a mother.[14]

Connubium is derived from nuptiae (nubere), to veil, and meant, according to Roman law,[15] the rite of marriage, and also the privileged Marriage of Roman citizens among themselves; marriage between slaves they called contubernium. Nuptials in the Christian sense also signified a rite because, as St. Ambrose observes, brides veiled themselves as a sign of modesty.[16]

Coniugium, or wedlock, denotes the conjugal union,

11 Sanchez, l. II, disp. VIII.
12 Ibid., l. II, disp. IX.
13 Cfr. Pohle-Preuss, l. c., p. 163.
14 See the explanation in c. 2, X, III, 33.
15 Dig. 23, 2.
16 Cfr. Catech. Conc. Trid., P. II, c. 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the effect of the marital consent being to make the two one flesh.[17]

Christian Marriage may therefore be defined as the lasting conjugal union between a capable man and a capable woman, raised to the dignity of a Sacrament.

CAN. 1013

END AND PROPERTIES OF MARRIAGE

§ 1. Matrimonii finis primarius est procreatio atque educatio prolis; secundarius mutuum adiutorium et remedium concupiscentiae.

§ 2. Essentiales matrimonii proprietates sunt unitas ac indissolubilitas, quae in matrimonio christiano peculiarem obtinent firmitatem ratione sacramenti.

1. As stated in the preliminary remarks, the primary end of Marriage is the procreation and education of offspring, while its secondary purposes are mutual help and allaying concupiscence. The latter are entirely subordinate to the former. The consequences of this proposition will be seen more palpably under can. 1068, can. 1086, § 2, and can. 1092.

2. The essential properties of Marriage are unity and indissolubility, which obtain a special firmness or stability in Christian Marriage by reason of its being a sacrament. This firmness must be traced to the typical union between Christ and His Church and also to the sacramental grace attached to Christian Marriage. The Code therefore distinguishes between marriage as a natural contract and Christian Marriage. But this distinction, as stated in the preceding canon, does not touch the consent or its properties essentially, but merely in 17 Sanchez, l. c., Prooem., n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

degree. A Marriage between non-baptized persons is as essentially one and indissoluble as between baptized persons, but there are degrees of stability in so far as a non-consummated Marriage can be more easily dissolved and Christian Marriage represents the typical union between Christ and His Church and through its sacramental character possesses greater firmness, although it is not completely indissoluble.

Unity is another essential property of every Marriage, whether Christian or non-Christian. An objection here naturally arises as to the Old Testament. Lamech, a great-grandson of Cain, took two wives,[18] and the holy patriarchs followed his example. Therefore polygamy (or polygyny) and divorce seem to have been legalized by the law of Moses.[19] How was such a deviation from the natural law — if the latter prohibits polygamy — possible? This question was solved by Innocent III, and we have not yet discovered a better solution. He says that the Patriarchs and the Chosen People as a whole had by divine revelation obtained permission to have several wives.[20] The reason for this permission was the more rapid increase of God's people, and, in general, of the human race. However, under the new dispensation, after Christ had restored [21] the original idea of marriage, this concession ceased.

Now the further question arises: How could Yahweh dispense from the natural law? Here it is necessary to make a distinction. The natural law pure and simple ("do good and avoid evil"), in other words, the primary natural law, cannot be proved to condemn either polygyny or divorce. But if we take natural law as meaning the 18 Gen. 4, 19.

19 Deut. 17, 17; 21, 15 f.; 24, 1 ff.
20 C. 3, Gaudeamus, X, IV, 19, de divortiis.
21 Matth. 19, 4 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conclusions or deductions drawn from the original or primary law, it is opposed to polygyny and divorce. The reasons are given by St. Thomas [22] as follows:

(a) The certainty of offspring is jeopardized by polyandry, which therefore must be rejected altogether. Polygamy impedes the training of children, which not only belongs essentially to the purpose of marriage, but also forms a substantial care of the father. Where there is unity of marriage, as a rule, there is also uniform and tender care of offspring.

(b) The equality of woman, especially as to mutual rights and love, is lessened by polygamy, the wife is little more than a slave, and the dignity of womanhood is lowered. This reason, we believe, will appeal strongly to modern women.

(c) Divided love cannot be so intensive and lasting as love centred on one. This reason also touches the indissolubility of the marriage tie and the education of children.

(d) Baptismal records prove that the numerical distribution of the sexes is about equal, at least in normal times. Add to these reasons the social equality of men; for to have several wives is expensive and only the rich could afford this luxury.

As to indissolubility, the reasons just stated may be alleged in a modified way also against complete divorce. St. Thomas [23] says that:

(a) The uniform and constant care of offspring requires permanency of the marital bond or the continued cohabitation of father and mother.

(b) The right of the wife to desert her husband is neu-

22 Summa contra Gentiles, III, c. 124; Suppl., III, q. 65, a. 1, ad 8. Sanchez, l. c., l. VII, disp. 80.

23 Summa contra Gent., III, c. 123.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tralized by the fact of her subjection to him; and if the wife is not allowed to leave her husband, he is not allowed to leave his wife, else there would be inequality of rights.

(c) The more intense mutual love is, the more enduring and lasting will it be; and thus loyalty is fostered by a permanent union, which, moreover, prevents serious dissensions and quarrels and diminishes the occasions for adultery or unlawful unions.

We need not dwell further on this subject, as the divorce evil, especially in our large cities, is constantly producing effects which confirm the wisdom of the Catholic attitude.

In view of these facts it is plain that the Church was right in anathematizing those who, like Luther and Melanchthon, admitted simultaneous polygamy,[24] and in proscribing divorce in these severe terms: "If any one saith that on account of heresy, or irksome cohabitation, or feigned absence of one of the parties, the bond of marriage may be dissolved, let him be anathema." [25]

CAN. 1014

FAVOR IURIS

Matrimonium gaudet favore iuris; quare in dubio standum est pro valore matrimonii, donec contrarium probetur, salvo praescripto can. 1127.

The law always favors Marriage, and hence if a doubt arises as to the validity of any particular Marriage, the presumption is in its favor until the contrary is proved (excepting the case of the Privilegium Paulinum; see can. 1127).

24 Trid., sess. 24, can. 2, de sac. mat.
25 Ibid., can. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The reason for this ruling lies in the fact that Marriage is a public, not a private, institution, and that consequently the legislator always intends to favor it by his dispositions, which are therefore of the nature of a favorable law (lex favorabilis).[26] However the presumption mentioned, while called "praesumptio iuris," is not a praesumptio iuris et de iure. Solid proofs are admissible against it if a doubt should arise as to whether a Marriage is valid. If the reasons against the validity of a Marriage are such as to convince the mind of the judge, he must pronounce accordingly. For although the law favors the validity of Marriage, yet, as law it pertains to reason, and hence is subject to the demands of reason. Where conviction is complete, the law ceases to exercise its force. The Holy Office[27] has given a decision to the purpose. A girl whose precise age was unknown wanted to marry or was married. Was it valid? The Vicar Apostolic was instructed to procure undoubted testimonies as to the natural capacity of the girl for marriage. "Malitia supplet aetatem," and only if the marks of puberty were missing and the necessary age (twelve years) was lacking the Marriage was certainly invalid. In other words, the natural impediment of age ceases as soon as there is a natural capacity for generation.

The privilegium fidei will be explained under can. 1027.

CAN. 1015

SPECIES OF MARRIAGE

§ 1. Matrimonium baptizatorum validum dicitur ratum, si nondum consummatione completum est;

26 Sanchez, l. I, disp. I, n. 4; Reiffenstuel, De Reg. Iuris in 6°, reg. 15, n. 2 f.

27 March 18, 1903, referred to by Card. Gasparri (see Coll. P. F., n. 2165); S. O., Dec. 10, 1885 (Coll. cit., n. 1645). But can. 1067 is not affected thereby.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ratum et consummatum, si inter coniuges locum habuerit coniugalis actus, ad quem natura sua ordinatur contractus matrimonialis et quo coniuges fiunt una caro.

§ 2. Celebrato matrimonio, si coniuges simul cohabitaverint, praesumitur consummatio, donec contrarium probetur.

§ 3. Matrimonium inter non baptizatos valide celebratum, dicitur legitimum.

§ 4. Matrimonium invalidum dicitur putativum, si in bona fide ab una saltem parte celebratum fuerit, donec utraque pars de eiusdem nullitate certa evadat.

§ 1. A valid marriage, contracted between baptized persons, is called ratified (ratum) as long as it has not been consummated by conjugal intercourse; ratified and consummated, if perfected by the conjugal act to which matrimony is by nature directed and by which the partners become one flesh.

§ 2. If the parties have lived together after the celebration of marriage, consummation is presumed, until the contrary is proved.

§ 3. A marriage validly contracted between unbaptized persons (e. g., Mohammedans, Jews, Gentiles) is legitimate but not sacramental.

§ 4. An invalid marriage is called feigned (putativum) if contracted in good faith by at least one party, until both become aware of its invalidity.

As to the first paragraph, note the requirement of consummation, which, the Code says, must be a conjugal act. Carnal intercourse before marriage is fornication, not a conjugal act. Nor can onanistic[28] intercourse be regarded as a consummation,[29] though it is not required that the wife should cooperate actively in the act.[30] Other questions connected with this matter will be discussed in connection with impotence.

[28] Thus called from Onan; see Gen. 38, 9 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In § 2 the Code requires strict proof as to the non-consummation of a Marriage if the parties have lived together after the wedding. This proof must be obtained by inspection on the part of two physicians or competent nurses or midwives, unless circumstances render such inspection unnecessary,[31] as when, for instance, it could be established by trustworthy witnesses that one of the parties left the other immediately after the matrimonial celebration,[32] or if the woman had been a prostitute.

That a valid Marriage between unbaptized persons is simply called legitimate (§ 3) points to a natural contract to which no sacramental character is attached.

Can. 1016

THE LAW OF MARRIAGE

Baptizatorum matrimonium regitur iure non solum divino, sed etiam canonico, salva competentia civilis potestatis circa mere civiles eiusdem matrimonii effectus.

The Marriage of baptized persons is governed not only by the divine law, but also by canon law, with due regard to the competency of the civil power concerning the merely civil effects of Matrimony.

Note the two powers mentioned in the text: the ecclesiastical and the civil, and remember that the text says, 29 Cfr. c. 36, C. 27, q. 2; c. 11, C. 35, q. 2 and 3; Sanchez, l. II, disp. 21, nn. 1, 5.

30 Sanchez, l. c., n. 11, says that this is the more common opinion, although he maintains that the seminatio of both parties is required for consummation.

31 Cfr. can. 1976 ff.

32 S. C. Prop. Fide, May 10, 1801.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

baptizatorum matrimonium, the marriage of baptized persons. The Church therefore claims jurisdiction over the Marriages of baptized persons. What is the reason for this claim? The scope of Marriage is the generation or procreation of offspring. This has a threefold aim: (1) the perpetuation of the human race, which is embodied in nature itself, because nature inclines towards it; (2) the continuation of civil society, and as such marriage is subject to the State; (3) the peopling of the City of God and increase of the number of the faithful, and from this point of view Marriage is subject to the Church.[33]

However, the last-mentioned consideration would not be sufficient to vindicate to the Church the power of controlling Marriage to the full extent to which she claims it, namely, in every respect excepting its purely civil effects. Whence has she this power? Her claim is based upon the view she takes of Marriage as a Sacrament. As the sacramental character of marriage cannot be separated from the underlying natural contract, and as all strictly spiritual matters, such as the Sacraments, belong to the exclusive sphere of ecclesiastical legislation, the Church logically claims full and unhampered power over the Marriages of baptized persons. As these persons[34] are themselves, by reason of valid Baptism, subject to the Church, it is evident that she has a legal right to regulate their matrimonial union.

As to the extent of this power, it embraces the whole range of the nuptial contract, aside from its purely civil effects. Thus engagement or betrothal, as a preliminary to marriage,[35] falls under the legislation of the Church.

33 St. Thomas, Summa contra Gentiles, IV, 78.

34 Cfr. Trid., sess. 7, can. 7; can. 8, de baptismo.

35 "Tametsi," Trid., sess. 24, c. 1, de ref. mat.; "Ne temere," Aug. 2, 1907, n. I.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Marriage as a contract in fieri, or the transient act of matrimonial consent, is also subject to the Church, as long as the substance of the natural consent is not essentially changed. Therefore, the Church may add accidental formalities to the wedding ceremony, as she has done by demanding a public act,[36] and she may set up impediments, either prohibitive or invalidating marriage, touching the persons themselves or the solemnity of the contract.

Of course, the Church could never abolish or supply the conditions of the natural contract. Neither could she declare persons who are incapable of contracting marriage to be capable. For she has no right to change the natural law, although she may interpret it as well as the divine positive law.

It is not our task to prove from history the power of the Church to establish matrimonial impediments. We merely note that ecclesiastical impediments, being established by human authority, are liable to change, because the power of the Church is not for destruction but for edification and the welfare of society, and what may suit one age may be useless and even detrimental in another.

Finally the power of the Church extends to the vinculum perdurans or marriage as a legal status. With regard to that enduring union, only ratified marriages, not those consummated, may be solved by the Church for weighty reasons. Here enter the "Privilege of faith," the separation from bed and board, the prohibition of the use of the conjugal act as a punishment for crimes committed, and finally the legitimation of offspring.

What has been said so far must be accepted as the common and certain doctrine of the Catholic Church [36] Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., IX, 9, 4; Wernz, Ius Decretal., IV, ed. 2, 1911, Vol. 1, pp. 78 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

uttered in solemn form at the Council of Trent[37] and in papal constitutions.[38]

We again draw attention to the text: "matrimonium baptizatorum," the marriage of baptized persons. Notice that we use the genitive, instead of saying, "between" baptized persons. The reason for this distinction is: when we say: between baptized persons, we mean that both parties are baptized; while if we say: of baptized persons, we do not necessarily intend to say that both parties are baptized. Thus James may be baptized, whereas his bride Gemma is not. May the Church dictate what James has to do? Or, in other words, has the Church any power to legislate concerning mixed marriages, taking the word "mixed" in the wider sense as including disparity of religion? The answer is affirmative if we accept the view taken by several popes. Thus Innocent III and Honorius III say that the Sacrament of Matrimony exists among the faithful as well as among infidels.[39] Leo III, after citing these texts, concludes that since marriage is by its very nature a sacred thing, it is meet that it be regulated and directed, not by civil rulers, but by the divine authority of the Church, who is the sole teacher in sacred matters. The underlying idea is that Marriage, having God for its author, foreshadowed the Incarnation of the Word, and is therefore something sacred both by its institution and as a type.[40] However, with all due respect to these utterances, it must be stated that the Church never claimed legislative power over Marriages in which both parties were not baptized. This is 37 Trid., sess. 24, can. 3, 4, 9, 12, de sacr. mat.

38 Benedict XIV, "Singulari nobis," Feb. 9, 1749; Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, nn. 59, 60; Pius IX, Syllabus, nn. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 74; Leo XIII, "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880.

39 C. 8, X, IV, 19, de divort.; c. 11, X, I, 36, de transact.

40 "Arcanum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the plain meaning of our canon, which vindicates the right of ecclesiastical legislation only for Marriages of baptized persons. Therefore the "res sacra" must not be urged too rigidly.[41] Marriage as a merely natural contract is not a sacred thing, properly so-called, because things sacred are such either by a blessing, or consecration, or a special dedication to the service or worship of God.[42] But the natural nuptial contract receives no blessing at all. Wherefore we should be careful not to urge a double-edged argument.

A more solid argument is that derived from the purpose of marriage as a means of propagating the Church. If one of the contracting parties is, by Baptism, a member of the Christian community, he is subject to the Church, whose sign and seal he has received, and therefore must obey her laws, which bind and oblige all her members, whether they are willing or not. For the Church not only is entitled, like any other society, to defend her own interests, but she is also obliged to repel dangers from individuals. And, as sad experience teaches, many dangers attend mixed marriages. Therefore, both by reason of her jurisdiction over her members and in virtue of her divine calling, the Church is empowered to regulate Marriages, even if only one of the contracting parties belongs to her pale.

A most important question, which reflects on the whole range of ecclesiastical impediments in general, and on that of disparity of worship in particular (can. 1070), must here be touched. Who are meant by the term baptized? For the text says "Matrimonium baptizatorum." The answer can be deduced from the text itself. But 41 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 85, insists too strongly on this argument.

42 Reiffenstuel, Reg. Iuris in Quinto, 7, n. 1; we miss a definition in the Code.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

we shall first attempt to sum up the doctrine of the Church held up to the moment of the promulgation of the Code.

(a) Valid Baptism per se incorporates a person in the body of the Church, and by Baptism all are subject to the laws of the Church.[43]

(b) Hence heretics, too, if validly baptized, were bound by the impediments of ecclesiastical law, for instance, disparity of worship.[44]

(c) An express exception was made with regard to non-Catholics when they marry among themselves, because they are not obliged to observe the form prescribed.[45]

(d) Our Code appears to restrict disparity of worship to Catholics, as will be seen under can. 1070. Hence from May 19, 1918, this impediment de facto touches only Catholics.

So far our statements are borne out by the common doctrine of the Church and the present Code. But are the other impediments iuris ecclesiastici also abolished by the Code? It is certain that the Code legislates only for Catholics, but that it is the intention of the legislator to declare all baptized non-Catholics free from other ecclesiastical laws and impediments, we cannot maintain.[46]

COMPETENCE OF THE CIVIL AUTHORITY

Canon 1016 grants to civil or secular law a certain competency in matrimonial matters, which, however, touches only the civil effects of marriage contracted by 43 Trid., sess. 7, can. 7 f., de bapt.

44 Bened. XIV, "Singulari Nobis," Feb. 9, 1749, § 1; "Magnae Nobis," June, 1748; "Ad tuas manus," Aug. 8, 1748; S. O., Inst. of March 20, 1860 (Coll. P. F., n. 1318); S. C. C. 1903 (Anal. Eccl., XI, 284 ff.), etc., etc.; can. 87.

45 "Ne temere," Aug. 2, 1907; Can. 1099, § 2.

46 This is also the view of a Roman professor of Canon Law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

baptized persons. These civil effects have to do with the dowry, the right of succession, the division of property between husband and wife, the right of children to titles and property, and similar merely material matters. For the Church, says Leo XIII, is not unaware, and never calls in doubt, that the Sacrament of Marriage, being instituted for the preservation and increase of the human race, has a necessary relation to human affairs, but a relation which concerns the civil order only; and concerning such things the State is justified in making laws and giving decisions.[47]

Is that all the State has to say concerning Marriage? As to the Sacrament, this is undoubtedly all. The rest the State may confidently leave to the Church. However, we must not shut our eyes against the circumstances of the time. To-day, by reason of an almost general indifference in matters religious and the so-called parity of religion granted by the State to a hundred and more sects, nearly every State contains a large percentage of citizens who, practically at least, escape the enforcement of ecclesiastical laws. Should we, then, entirely deny to the State the power of framing marriage-laws? No, the State is deeply interested in marriage and the family and hence must assert a certain control, not only over the civil effects of marriage, but also over the contract itself, or at least its formalities. However, before we explain this power we must lay down some self-evident rules.

1. No State, whether Christian or infidel, has any right to legislate concerning Marriage as a Sacrament, for this is a purely spiritual matter. This proposition is, though 47 "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880; J. J. Wynne, S.J., The Great Encyclical Letters of Leo XIII, 1903, p. 78; cfr. Gasparri, De Matrimonio, ed. 3, n. 278; Wernz, Ius Decretalium, ed. 2, IV, Vol. I, p. 96 ff.; De Smet, l. c., p. 292.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not de fide, certain and common doctrine of the Catholic Church.[48] Therefore,

2. The State is not empowered to set up impediments, either prohibitive or invalidating, with regard to Christian Marriages vested with the sacramental character. This power belongs exclusively to the Church.[49] Some[50] have distinguished between prohibitive and invalidating impediments set up by the State, but this distinction is groundless.[51] For to determine the time and circumstances proper for the reception of the Sacraments is an ecclesiastical right. Neither can an appeal to the recognition by the Church of civil laws, for instance, concerning adoption, justify this interference. These civil laws bind, not as civil, but as ecclesiastical laws acknowledged or "canonized" by the Church.

3. The State may frame laws governing the civil effects of matrimony and prescribe a civil form to be followed by the contracting parties under penalty.[52]

4. Besides, the State may for a time and for weighty reasons prohibit Marriage or its consummation, at least indirectly, e. g., to soldiers.

5. But the State may never, under any condition, claim the right to enact laws that clash with the natural or the divine law, no matter whether there be question of a Marriage of baptized or unbaptized persons. For the State is not above these laws. Thus laws favoring divorce or polygamy in any shape or form are looked upon by the Church as antagonistic to the divine law and she

48 Gasparri, l. c., n. 283.

49 Instructio S. C. Prop. Fide, 1753 (Coll., n. 385).

50 Thus Schulte, Eherecht, 1855, p. 327.

51 The S. C. C. rejected the assertion of the provincial council of Rouen, 1855, that no one should get married ecclesiastically before evidence is given of the civil marriage; cfr. Wernz, l. c., ed. 1, p. 1127.

52 Gasparri, l. c., n. 288.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

never fails to denounce them. Moreover, laws "regulating the birth rate" or affecting parties previously to marriage are unjust, because unnatural. A recent writer [53] has expressed his view of the suggestion that only the healthy shall be permitted to marry, in the following energetic language: "I am nauseated by this blithering rot about the scientific breeding of human beings as if they were cattle and hogs. The State has no right to select your wife. This privilege belongs to the realm of personal liberty where the individual is king [to a certain extent, of course]. Laws cannot impart love. Compulsion breeds rebellion." We may add another reason: As Marriage is intended and directed by nature, the author of which is God, no human power has the right to interfere with it. There is only one impediment that can prevent men or women generally from getting married, and that is absolute and incurable impotence. This is an impediment set up by nature, and no other impediment equals it.

Having said this much by way of general principles, we now proceed to determine what rights may be claimed by the State concerning the Marriages of unbaptized persons. When we say the State, we mean the authority which rules any autonomous commonwealth. Autonomy or sovereignty, however, need not be complete. Thus our American States and the cantons of Switzerland are sovereign to some extent, but not completely. In the U. S. marriage laws are made not by the Federal but by State authority. Unfortunately there is no uniformity of legislation. Whether our State legislatures may be called Christian or not, does not matter, as long as the laws they 53 Windle, Word Pictures, 1918, p. 48. This language is justified by the proposal of some laws to that effect in the State of Illinois. But the war has made such precautions superfluous.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google make are based, to a great extent at least, on Christian principles. "Christianity is not the legal religion of the State as established by law. If it were, it would be a civil or political institution, which it is not; but this is not inconsistent with the idea that it is in fact and ever has been the religion of the people. This fact is everywhere prominent in all our civil and political history and has been from the first recognized and acted upon by the people as well as by constitutional conventions, by legislatures and by courts of justice." [54]

This much premised, we say that the State is entitled to legislate concerning Marriages of non-baptized persons.[55] For whatever belongs to the State, by reason of persons or matter, is subject to the State's power to make laws. And since Matrimony, as a public institution of great importance, interests the State, and the contracting parties, as citizens, are subject to it, the competency of the civil authority is evident. We need not dwell upon this argument. As to the first premise, every one will readily concede that the range of civil legislation is as wide as the end for which the State is established. This end is the temporal welfare and prosperity of men, and therefore the State must be competent in all such matters. Marriage, too, as far as it is merely a natural contract, falls in this category because it is, as St. Thomas says, a means of propagating the political society, which is maintained by family life. A family is founded by the union of a man and a woman, and this union is effected by the consent of both or the nuptial contract. Hence the civil authority is empowered to surround this contract with such safeguards as are apt to guarantee a well or-

54 K. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 12 f.

55 We follow here Resemans, De Competentia Civili in Vinculum Conjugale Infidelium, Rome, 1887.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dered and prosperous relation. But the State, no more than the Church, has the right to supply, essentially alter or abolish the mutual consent, because it is the essence of the matrimonial contract. Besides, since Marriage has been established by the Author of nature for a well-defined purpose, which precedes all human intervention, the State has no power to limit or prevent the scope of Marriage. Lastly, since indissolubility and unity of marriage are dictated at least by secondary conclusions drawn from natural law, the civil authority ought to refrain from framing contrary laws.

Another argument for our thesis may be derived from the fact that the contracting parties are withdrawn from the sphere of ecclesiastical legislation. As the Church has no jurisdiction over the unbaptized, either the individuals or civil society as such must regulate their Marriage. To leave this important matter in the hands of individuals is impracticable, because selfish and sensual motives would cause them to pervert the true notion of Marriage. Hence only the legitimate civil authority can impartially and equitably moderate and direct the sacred institution according to the dictates of public welfare and common exigencies.

The extent of the legislative power of the State over the marriages of the non-baptized has been stated at the beginning of this section. One thing should be added. We except no impediments, unless, of course, they clash with the natural or the positive divine law. Concerning the authentic interpretation of the divine law, the Code states that it lies exclusively with the supreme ecclesiastical authority [56] to determine whether it invalidates or impedes marriages. As the text here does not add, "of baptized persons," it seems to include all marriages.

[56] Can. 1038, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Therefore it is safe to say that authentic declarations must be expected from the Church alone. Of course, the Church will not give decisions in cases that are not brought before her tribunal. But it is not asking too much of the civil authorities that they should take cognizance of her views and laws.

Is the thesis we defend safe to hold? It is undoubtedly safe, because the majority of eminent canonists [57] propose and Roman decisions plainly admit it. Thus the S. C. Prop. Fide says: "Marriages of infidels must be governed by natural and civil law." [58]

This would be sufficient for the explanation of our canon. However, as we have adverted to civil laws, it may not be amiss to add a word or two about our State laws concerning Marriage. Broadly speaking it is safe to say that our civil laws do not interfere with the laws of the Catholic Church, if we except divorce. Polygamy is suppressed and punished, but the law is indifferent to the theological doctrine of polygamous marriage "for eternity," such as the Mormons propose.[59] For the greater part of marriage law turns about the class (race) and conditions of parties to a marriage, the prohibited degrees of kindred, the marriage license, and the duties of the solemnizing clergymen. It would exceed the limits of this commentary to cite the laws of the different States. We may refer the reader to the Ecclesiastical Review Year Book for 1910, and to the Ecclesiastical Review, Vol. 42, pp. 586 f.

57 Cavagnis, De Angelis, Gasparri, Laurin, Santi-Leitner, Wernz; cfr. Resemans, p. 54.

58 Cfr. Coll. P. F., Vol. I, p. 435; n. 71; n. 744.

59 Zollmann, l. c., p. 12.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

BETROTHAL OR ENGAGEMENT

After determining certain preliminary questions and notions in regard to Matrimony the Code discusses the preparatory act, i. e., betrothal. Note that engagement is not put under Ch. I, which treats of the things that must precede Marriage. This shows that it is not essential to marriage. Too much importance should not be attributed to it. A few historical observations, however, may not be amiss.

1. Engagement is a promise of marriage, the Latin term, sponsalia, being derived from spondere, to promise or to stipulate. The ancient Greeks employed the term sponthai, which originally signified drink-offerings made to the gods in the act of betrothal. The modern Greeks call them mnesteia instead of progameia or proteleia.[60] With the Hebrews a certain solemnity preparatory to Marriage was in vogue. These were the thenaim or schidduchim, which terms properly signify the promise of the parents or guardians to give the girl in marriage. The more elaborate ceremonies described by the Mishnah of Rabbi Raba,[61] are of a later date.

Engagement occupies a prominent place in the Roman Law,[62] from which we gather that sponsalia were made by consent at an age when the parties knew what they were doing. A breach of promise was severely punished in the bride, but not in the bridegroom,[63] and a second promise, if broken, entailed infamy.[64] Formerly the privilege of a lawsuit (actio in id quod interest) was 60 Cfr. Cironius, Paratitla, l. IV, tit. 1, n. 4; Milasch-Pessic, K.-R. der abendländ. Kirche, 1905, p. 587. Nicholas I defines sponsalia as "futurarum nuptiarum promissa foedera" (c. 3, C. 30, q. 5).

61 Benedict IV, "Postremo mense," Feb. 28, 1747, §§ 62 ff.

62 Dig., l. 23.

63 L. 13, § 3, Dig. 48, 5.

64 L. 13, Dig. § 3, Dig. 3, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

granted before the judge, but later on this was prohibited.[65]

The Germanic tribes (Alamanni, Bavarians, Franks, Lombards, Saxons) admitted a promise made by the father or guardian of the bride, when she was delivered into the power (mundium) of the groom. The latter had to pay a stipulated sum and to promise to marry her. From this promise followed the obligation of loyalty and the right to punish the bride as if she were guilty of adultery. An engagement could be dissolved for leprosy, insanity, or blindness befalling the bride. If it was broken off without a just cause, a fine was imposed upon the bridegroom or the guardian of the bride.[66]

There can be no doubt that the early Christians, following the Roman law, observed a time of preparation or engagement before Marriage. The first known document touching ecclesiastical legislation on betrothal is a canon of the synod of Ancyra (314). The matter is more plainly mentioned in a letter of Pope Siricius (384–398) to Bishop Himerius, which speaks of the sacerdotal blessing accompanying the act.[67] In the eleventh or twelfth century we find an impediment called "quasi-affinitas" or public honesty attached to engagement. This impediment at first concerned only the bride,[68] but Innocent III extended it to the groom and to the fourth degree.[69] Boniface VIII limited this law to certain engagements excluding all spurious and conditional ones as long as the condition was not fulfilled.[70] The Council of 65 L. 15, § 24, Dig. 47, 10; Gellius, Noctes Atticae, l. 24, c. 4.

66 Lex Visigoth, III, 1, 2; III, 4, 2; III, 6, 3; L. Roth. Longob., c. 179; Lex Salica, 12, 10; Lex Alam. Hlothwic., Lex, 52; Lex Bojuv., 8, 16; edict. Roth., cc. 179, 180, 192; Lex Luitp., c. 119.

67 Coustant, Epp. R. Pontt., 1721, coll. 627 f.; c. 50, C. 27, q. 2.

68 C. 3, Comp. I, IV, 1.

69 C. 5, X, IV, 2; c. 8, X, IV, 14.

70 C. un. 6°, IV, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Trent restricted this impediment to the first degree.[71] Now it is abolished.

As to the formalities of betrothal, no law was ever universally introduced to oblige the parties to observe any special ceremonies. Spain had a peculiar law since Charles III's Pragmatic Sanction, which provided that a valid engagement had to be set down in writing.[72] This statute was at first tolerated by the Church and is now formally established as a universal law.

CAN. 1017

§ 1. Matrimonii promissio sive unilateralis sive bilateralis seu sponsalitia, irrita est pro utroque foro, nisi facta fuerit per scripturam subsignatam a partibus et vel a parocho aut loci Ordinario, vel a duobus saltem testibus.

§ 2. Si utraque vel alterutra pars scribere nesciat vel nequeat, ad validitatem id in ipsa scriptura adnotetur et alius testis addatur qui cum parocho aut loci Ordinario vel duobus testibus, de quibus in § 1, scripturam subsignet.

§ 3. At ex matrimonii promissione, licet valida sit nec ulla iusta causa ab eadem implenda excuset, non datur actio ad petendam matrimonii celebrationem; datur tamen ad reparationem damnorum, si qua debeatur.

§ 1. A promise of marriage, made either by one party or by both, is void of effect in the court of conscience as well as in the external forum, unless it is made in writing and signed by the parties themselves and by the parish

71 Sess. 24, c. 3, de ref. oeces., XII, 5, 1; A. S. S., I, 528;
72 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Di- XIII, 185 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google priest, or the diocesan Ordinary, or at least two witnesses.

This paragraph lays down the requisites of a valid betrothal and its consequences.

(1) The promise may be made unilaterally (by one) or bilaterally (by both). This distinction refers to contracts. A contract is an agreement between two or more persons to do or not to do a particular thing.[73] A unilateral contract (pactum nudum) is one that obliges one person only, as if James would say: "I will marry you, Gemma," without any obligation on Gemma's part to marry James. Such a contract is hardly imaginable, and the English law[74] looks upon unilateral promises of this kind, without a consideration of some sort or other, as totally void of juridical effect. Our Code, according to the views of most canonists, admits such a contract, provided it complies with the necessary requisites. The whole question is speculative rather than practical. A bilateral contract obliges both parties equally and belongs to the species of contractus innominati, more especially those called facio ut facias, when a man agrees to do something for another, provided the other does something for him. A marriage promise, therefore, is an agreement of future marriage between two determined persons.

(2) These persons are not described in our Code. But it stands to reason that they must be capable of making a contract, as the Gloss says: All persons who understand the nature of a contract, and are not prohibited

73 Cfr. Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 442; cfr., l. 1, Dig. II, 14: "Duorum vel plurium in idem placitum consensus"; on contracts in general see X, I, 35, de pactis, and the commentators.

74 Herein the English law follows the Roman; but Canon Law differs from both as to the moral obligation; Engel, I, 35, n. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by law, may enter upon an agreement.[75] This excludes those who are actually or habitually deprived of the use of reason or of the necessary senses, unless the latter are supplied by artificial means.[76] As to age, the Code determines nothing except so far as marriage itself is concerned.[77] But no restriction is made or year fixed, and hence if reason and senses are not wanting, any age is admissible. As to freedom from compulsion we refer to can. 103, which renders any act done under external compulsion, invalid. Fear would, according to the same canon, not render a betrothal invalid, but merely rescindable.

(3) As regards the contract itself, it must be an external manifestation of internal consent. Hence a frivolously or fictitiously given consent would be invalid. Such a thing is now almost excluded, and if it is not entirely excluded, the alleged motive would require strict proof.[78] The consent may be given, as formerly, by proxy,[79] for neither the "Ne temere" nor the Code excludes this mode. But the proctor would have to show his credentials and be instructed by the respective parties ad hoc and for a determined person.

(4) The object of the promise is future marriage, not the promise itself; wherefore if James and Gemma would merely intend to make the promise without any intention of marrying one another, it would be null and void. But there may be a real intention of marriage with an impediment blocking the way of its fulfilment; for instance, consanguinity. Is it permissible to contract an engage-

75 Ad c. 23, X, IV, 1.

76 Cfr. Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 124, n. 93.

77 Cfr. can. 1067.

78 S. C. C., Dec. 18, 1728; March 12, 1729 (Richter, Trid., p. 222); A. S. S., I, 342; III, 304; VII, 667.

79 Cc. 1, 11, X, IV, 2; c. 9, 6°, I, 19; l. 2, Dig. II, 24; this extension is made from the parents to the proctor.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ment notwithstanding such an impediment? And if contracted, would it be valid? Supposing the prescribed form to have been duly observed, the answer is as follows:

(a) If the impediment is one that cannot be removed by a dispensation, the promise is both invalid and illicit, because the object of the promise being marriage, and marriage being impossible, forbidden, and therefore sinful, the promise has a sinful object and is therefore destitute of the necessary moral and juridical qualities, namely: liceity, honesty, possibility.[80]

(b) If the impediment is of a kind that may be and generally is removed by a dispensation, the nature of the promise depends on the intention of the contracting parties. If they conclude the engagement without regard to the permission to be obtained, or with the intention of forcing the authorities to grant a dispensation, their promise would be sinful and, we believe, invalid, because no one may bind himself to commit a sin. If the parties enter upon the engagement with the express condition, "provided we can obtain a dispensation," the promise is valid and the parties would be bound to apply for a dispensation and await the grant. In case of refusal, both would be free to enter a new engagement with some other party not subject to an impediment.[81] However, these hypotheses are now-a-days rather futile, because if the pastor is present, he will tell the parties to abstain from an engagement until the dispensation is obtained. The required witnesses, too, would probably be aware of the impediment and caution the parties.

80 Cfr. l. 137, Dig. 45, 2; A. S. S., I, 78, 81, 121; S. C. C., Jan. 26, 1709; Dec. 12, 1733 (Richter, Trid., p. 220); v. Scherer, II, 130.

81 Wernz, l. c., IV, 1, p. 127 f., pays too much attention to a decision of a nameless congregation quoted by Giovine.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The same distinction applies if the impediment is only a prohibitive one, for instance, mixed religion. If the parties engage themselves unconditionally, i. e., without the explicit mention of the condition, "Provided we can obtain a dispensation," or, "Provided you become converted," or, "Provided the impediment ceases," the promise is invalid, because the contract is illicit as promising a dishonorable thing.[82] But if the condition is added, the promise holds good and is licit, since the parties wish to abide by the decision of the Church and therefore, what they promise each other is not dishonorable.

If parents (not relatives or guardians) are, for weighty reasons, opposed to an engagement, for instance, because of danger to the faith or to the peace of the family, the promise is invalid unless made with the condition: "If the parents consent," because it violates the natural law, which dictates submission to parents in all lawful matters.[83] If the parents' opposition is unreasonable, for instance, based merely on considerations of money, social standing, or personal dislike, the promise is valid and licit.[84]

Soldiers may lawfully and licitly contract engagements during military service, for in time they may marry.

(5) The form of betrothal is now strictly prescribed. The engagement must be made in writing. And here we may add what § 2 of can. 1017 says: "In case both parties or one of them, does not know or is unable to write, it is required for the validity of the act that this fact be noted in the document itself and another witness be added, who, together with the pastor or the Ordinary of the diocese or the other witnesses, shall sign the document."

82 Cfr. ll. 26 f. Dig. 45, 1; § 24, Inst., III, 19; c. 8, X, I, 35.

83 Sanchez, l. IV, disp. 23, n. 11; Gasparri, l. c., n. 62.

84 C. un. C. 31, q. 3; cc. 1, 4, 11, X, IV, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

From these two paragraphs it follows:

(a) That writing is absolutely necessary; but no specific form is prescribed, provided the intention is clearly manifested. And here we must return to the "unilateral" promise. If James wants to make a promise on his part only, without obliging Gemma to marry him, he may do so. But in that case what necessity is there for Gemma's signing her name to such an informal contract, which leaves her free to marry? So far it has generally been held that the promise of one party must be followed by the promise of the other, which was called repromissio,[85] because the object was marriage between two determined or designated persons.[86] Such written engagements are not likely to become popular.

(b) If both contracting parties, or one of them, does not know how, or is unable to write, a substitute must be employed and the fact be set down in the paper embodying the engagement. The Code adds to the decree "Ne temere" the words: "vel nequeat." Hence the inability to write may be either intellectual (nesciat) or physical (nequeat). The one indicates illiteracy, the other may be caused by sickness, for instance, paralysis or bodily weakness. In all such cases a substitute or additional witness must be employed, who shall sign his own name, not that of the parties, and the fact must be expressly noted.

(c) Besides the contracting parties and the additional witness, where such a one is required, there must be official witnesses and private witnesses to every canonical engagement.

85 Boekhn, IV, 1, n. 53; Gasparri, l. c., n. 52; the "Ne temere" has no such "unilateral" term.

86 S. C. C., April 14, July 13, 1725 (Richter, Trid., p. 222, n. 6). If one party said "I take thee and none else," it was considered insufficient.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

α) The official witnesses are either the pastor or the Ordinary of the diocese. The pastor may be anyone whom the Code describes as such.[87] It is not necessary that he be the pastor of either of the parties, as the apposition "proprius" is not found in the text.[88]

Delegation is not admissible either for the pastor or the Ordinary.[89]

Distinct from delegation is the office of vicar or assistant (oeconomus), i. e., a priest who has entire charge of a parish ad interim.[90]

As to military chaplains, their faculties must be consulted.[91]

An assistant (cooperator; see can. 476), though he may have general delegation to assist at marriages, may not be official witness at a betrothal, because the interpretation given to the text excludes all delegation, hence also habitual delegation.

β) The private witnesses, if pastor and Ordinary are absent, must be at least two. Concerning the qualities of these witnesses nothing is said in the text, but it is evident that they must be able to write and to understand what they are doing. For the rest, it does not matter whether they are men or women or what their moral character or religious belief may be.

(d) The parties or their substitute, i. e., the additional witness and the other witnesses, i. e., the pastor, the Ordinary, or the two private witnesses, should sign the engagement contract in the presence of one another.[1] Hence they must all be present at the same time. The certificate must show the day, month, and year of the

87 Cfr. can. 451.
88 S. C. C., March 30, 1908, ad VII. Cfr. can. 334, § 2.
89 S. C. C., March 30, 1908, ad VI.
90 Can. 451, § 2, n. 2.
91 Ibid., n. 3.
1 S. C. C., July 27, 1908, ad I.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google engagement in order to be valid.[2] The place may conveniently be added, but is not required for validity.

6. The effects arising from a valid betrothment are the following:

(a) The parties are bound by a grievous obligation to contract matrimony. The time is left to their own prudent judgment, but it should not be unreasonably protracted.

If the engagement contract was made with the explicit stipulation of a certain date for the marriage,— ad finiendum contractum,— the engagement contract becomes null and void after the lapse of that time, and both parties are free. If the date is not set as a condition proper, but only in order to accelerate the fulfillment,— ad urgendum contractum,— the parties should get married within a reasonable time.[3] In the latter case the ecclesiastical judge may, of his own accord, determine the time within which the marriage must take place. Thus the Ordinary may appoint a term of six months on condition that if the marriage is not performed within this period, the betrothment becomes void.[4]

(b) An engagement made with another person whilst a former engagement is still valid, is without effect, even if made under oath.[5]

(c) A third effect is moral. If one of the contracting parties has carnal intercourse with a third person, the act involves a sin against justice.[6] However, since not a few moralists contradict this statement, especially concerning the groom, it is difficult to admit a change in the species of the sin.[7]

2 Ibid., ad II.

3 Cfr. l. 14, Dig. 50, 17; l. 14, Dig. 45, 1; Gasparri, l. c., n. 121.

4 S. C. C., Oct. 2, 1723 (Richter, Trid., p. 223, n. 20).

5 Reg. Iuris 69 in. 6°; c. 18, X, II, 24; Boekhn, IV, 4, 1.

6 Thus Boekhn, IV, 4, n. 103; Benedict XIV, Inst., 46, n. 19.

7 Thus Noldin, De Sexto Praecepto, 1905, p. 21.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(d) A fourth effect is the negative one mentioned in § 3 of can. 1017, which reads thus: From the promise of marriage, although this be valid and no just reason excuses, no action is admissible to compel the celebration of marriage. However, an action to recover damages is permitted. Because marriage should be freely entered upon, and forced marriages seldom have a happy issue,[8] the legislator forbids any lawsuit to be brought against the recalcitrant party. For the same reason various decisions of the Roman Congregations admonish ecclesiastical judges not to threaten unwilling parties, especially women,[9] with censures. However, if damage was done, especially in case of pregnancy or contracted illness, or if expensive preparations were made for the marriage, the party guilty of a breach of promise can be sued for an amount sufficient to cover the expenses. A penalty or fine added to an engagement contract for the party violating the same has no juridical effect, since such a penal sanction would be unlawful.[10] Small presents[11] given on the occasion of an engagement may be either reclaimed or condoned.

Note that all these effects follow only betrothments made in writing, as prescribed by the Code. No other form of engagement, no matter how pompously celebrated, produces any of these effects, either before the tribunal of the ecclesiastical judge, or in the court of conscience. Hence confessors have no right to oblige anyone to anything arising from a broken informal engagement, though it goes without saying that a man who has damaged a young lady's reputation by undue famili-

8 Cc. 2, 17, X, IV, 1.

9 S. C. C., March 30, 1748 (Richter, Trid., p. 223, n. 18); S. C. P. P., Nov. 22, 1790 (Coll. n. 603).

10 See the gloss on c. 29, X, IV, 1 s. v. "gemma"; Sanchez, IV, 1, 140.

11 Arrhae, from the Hebrew arab, or Greek arrabon, i.e., pawn, are given as a token and proof of engagement; Forcellini, Lexicon, s. v.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

arities is bound in conscience to make restitution, or if no remedy can heal the damage, to marry her. This obligation arises not from the betrothal, but from the natural law and has nothing to do with the form of engagement. If a valid engagement has preceded a breach, caused, for instance, by a marriage with another person, the competent judge to decide in a damage suit is either the ecclesiastical or the civil court. But a lawsuit for recovery of damages does not suspend the marriage with another, neither has it any effect on the merits of the cause that brought about the breach and the new marriage. In other words, the suit must be strictly limited to the recovery of damages sustained by the breach of a legally valid betrothal.

To this authentic interpretation a remark must be added. The Code has abolished the impediments which formerly followed valid betrothal. Hence no prohibitive or invalidating impediment,— public honesty (can. 1078), — arises even from a valid engagement. It was but natural that a doubt should arise as to the retroactive force of the Code (can. 10) with regard to impediments contracted before the new law went into effect. The papal Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code [12] has decided that no retroactive force must be attributed to the Code concerning betrothal and marriage, but that both are governed by the present law when they are already contracted or shall be contracted, excepting only the action mentioned in can. 1017, § 3. This means in plain English that a betrothal, though made before May 19, 1918, produces no impediment to a marriage contracted after that date. Therefore James, validly engaged to Gemma before said date, may marry her sister, daughter, or mother without any dispensation.

12 June 2–3, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 345).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Our civil laws do not differ much in this point from the ecclesiastical law. Thus the different States of the Union acknowledge no strict obligation of marriage, nor do they grant legal action on account of a betrothal, but allow the party suffering from a breach of promise to bring a damage suit.[13] In England, 26 Geo. II, c. 33 enacts that no suit shall be heard in any ecclesiastical court to compel a celebration of marriage in facie ecclesiae for or because of any contract of matrimony whatsoever.[14]

7. Dissolution of Engagements. "For the cancelling of an engagement contract," says a recent commentator[15] on the decree "Ne temere," "no new rules have been made in this decree. The reasons, therefore, heretofore commonly held to be sufficient by moralists and canonists will suffice also now for the breaking of the engagement contract." This remains true after the promulgation of the Code, because no special provisions are made to that effect. Neither does Bk. IV mention betrothal in treating of marriage procedure, nor is it touched in the chapter on dispensations. All this is but the logical consequence of the present legislation, which has removed all impediments that formerly arose from valid betrothal. The reasons proposed by canonists as permitting the solution of an engagement were briefly these:

(a) An engagement may be cancelled by mutual consent according to the Regula Iuris: "By whatever causes a thing is produced, it may be dissolved by the same."[16] Thus engagements made by impuberes may be cancelled by them after they have reached the age of puberty, even though made under oath.[17]

13 Bishop, New Commentaries on Marriage, 1891, I, § 226 f.

14 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., III, 94.

15 S. Woywod, Marriage Laws, 1913, p. 9.

16 Reg. Iuris in 5° (c. 1, X, V, 41).

17 Cc. 7, 10, X, IV, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) An engagement is cancelled by marriage with another. Thus if James, after having been engaged to Gemma, marries her sister, the prior engagement is broken, and Gemma is free to marry another. Nor does that obligation ever revive,[18] especially now, since there is no impediment attached to betrothal, it seems but natural that the obligation should cease altogether after the marriage.

(c) An engagement is cancelled if one of the parties embraces the religious state, or rather makes profession, for the latter act implies the religious state. Formerly religious profession and solemn vows were considered equal, and older canonists, like Panormitanus[19] and Sanchez,[20] attributed the power of cancelling a betrothal only to solemn, not to simple, vows. However, the present tendency and the view sustained by our Code favors equalization of religious vows on that point. The Code[21] makes the act of embracing the religious state a prohibitive impediment without distinction. Hence it is safe to say that if both parties would make religious profession, the engagement would be dissolved. It is also certain that if one of the parties makes solemn profession, the betrothal is dissolved.[22] Finally, the present practice of the Church favors the view that even temporary profession, made in either a papal or diocesan institute, cancels a marital engagement. For every engagement is understood to contain the implied condition: "Unless I choose a more perfect state."[23] The religious state, honored and distinguished by the Church, enjoys the favor of law and preference. Of course, a resulting damage 18 Thus Sanchez, v. Scherer, Wernz, etc., whose views are, theoretically speaking, the only correct and moral ones.

19 Ad c. 5, X, 6, n. 6.

20 De Mat., I, disp. 46 f.

21 Can. 1058.

22 Cc. 2, 7, X, III, 33.

23 Wernz, IV, 1, n. 113, note 118.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google suit would have to be settled either peaceably or in court.

(d) An engagement may be cancelled for personal reasons. A valid personal reason would be, (α) If one of the engaged persons would absent himself from the other for a long time without giving notice.[24] (β) If the moral character of one of the parties has considerably deteriorated. Hence, any attempt at making another engagement or having sexual intercourse with a third person would justify the innocent party in withdrawing from the engagement. Sexual intercourse with another than the engaged person, made known only after the engagement, but had before it, is a sufficient reason for breaking the contract,[25] unless it has been condoned. If both parties have committed fornication either before or after their engagement, and no pardon has been given, both may recede from the engagement.[26] A considerable deterioration in character would take place if one became a spendthrift or drunkard, or had to face an accusation in a criminal court.[27] (γ) If a physical or mental change has taken place in both or either of the engaged persons. Mental derangement, especially if incurable, or a contagious and lasting sickness, or a noticeable deformity of the body, would be a sufficient cause for breaking an engagement.[28] (δ) If a change of fortune or social condition should occur in one of the parties, the other would have reason to withdraw from the engagement. Thus if a poor fellow or girl should receive a rich legacy or bequest, or if a social or political or commercial event would raise him

24 C. 5, X, IV, 1.

25 Boekhn, IV, 1, n. 150: "paria sunt in iure nunc scire et nunc esse."

26 Cc. 6, 7, X, IV, 16; v. Scherer, II, p. 134.

27 S. C. C., Nov. 14, 1725 (Zamboni, Coll., n. 17, s. v. "Sponsalia"); S. C. C., May 29, 1852 (Lingen-Reuss, Causae Selectae, 1871, pp. 881 f.).

28 S. C. C., May 14, 1729 (Zamboni, l. c., n. 20); c. 25, X, II, 14.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to "higher" social rank, there might be a reason for breaking the engagement, not only on the advantaged side, but on both. For too great disparity in fortune and social position often causes marriages to be unhappy.[29]

(e) Finally, family reasons may render the dissolution of an engagement advisable, e. g., if serious enmities, hatred, dissension, aversion are apt to result from the contemplated marriage, as is sometimes the case in feudally inclined nations and countries. The S. C. of the Council has repeatedly cancelled engagements for this reason. Another cause would be strong parental opposition, but not in all instances, even if threats of disinheritance are employed.[30]

Whether engaged parties are obliged to manifest to each other their secret defects is a debated question. Justice certainly obliges one to reveal such defects as would prove very injurious to the other, for instance, pregnancy, contagious disease, etc.[31] Concerning juridical procedure nothing need be added, since the ecclesiastical courts would hardly occupy themselves with a damage suit, or if they did, would decide it summarily.[32]

CAN. 1018

INSTRUCTIONS ON MARRIAGE

Parochus ne omittat populum prudenter erudire de matrimonii sacramento eiusque impedimentis.

Before turning to the chapter on immediate preparations for marriage, the Code exhorts pastors to instruct 29 Wernz, l. c., IV, 1, n. 116.

30 S. C. C., Feb. 28, 1733; Nov. 29, 1783; July 31, 1728 (Zamboni, l. c., nn. 28, 41, 23).

31 De Smet, l. c., p. 25 f.

32 The Roman Pontiff, and he alone, may dissolve engagements; but they are hardly ever brought before him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

their people on the Sacrament of Marriage and its impediments. It does not say how often such instructions should be given or on what occasions. Instructions may be public or private.

(a) Public instructions (given, for instance, on the second Sunday after Epiphany) should be couched in general terms and deal with the nature and dignity of the Sacrament, the duties of the married towards each other and their children, and their respective rights. Leo XIII, addressing chiefly the bishops, says: "Let special care be taken that the people be well instructed in the precepts of Christian wisdom, so that they may always remember that marriage was not instituted by the will of man, but, from the very beginning, by the authority and command of God; that it does not admit of a plurality of wives or husbands; that Christ, the author of the New Covenant, raised marriage from a rite of nature to a Sacrament, and gave to His Church legislative and judicial power with regard to the bond of union." [33] The evil of divorce, illustrated by statistics, may also form a topic of public instruction.

(b) Private instructions should be given to those who are about to enter the married state by the pastor, along the lines laid down in Pastoral Theology and in the canons which immediately follow the present one. The confessor, too, may, if he is asked or finds that the parties are ignorant, instruct them on the lawfulness and the obligations of marriage. He may tell them that everything is permitted that is conducive to the end and purpose of Matrimony, and that, generally speaking, sins against chastity among married people are not grievous, unless illicit means are employed.[34]

33 "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880, ed. Wynne, l. c., p. 79 f.
34 Cfr. De Smet, l. c., p. 461.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

ON THE PRELIMINARIES OF MATRIMONY AND ESPECIALLY THE BANNS

This chapter deals with certain preparatory acts, especially the examination of the candidates and the proclamation of the banns.

CAN. 1019

§ 1. Antequam matrimonium celebretur, constare debet nihil eius validae ac licitae celebrationi obsistere.

§ 2. In periculo mortis, si aliae probationes haberi nequeant, sufficit, nisi contraria adsint indicia, affirmatio iurata contrahentium, se baptizatos fuisse et nullo detineri impedimento.

Before a marriage may be celebrated, certainty must be had as to whether there exists an obstacle to its validity or liceity, for, as will be explained further on, a Marriage may be contracted validly, yet unlawfully, because prohibited by the Church. From this the distinction between prohibitive and invalidating impediments appears. Pastors are sometimes called to a sickbed, or rather deathbed (periculo mortis), to "straighten out" a marriage. The couple is alone, without witnesses and papers, perhaps strangers in a far off country; what is to be done? When there is danger of death, and no other proof can be procured, and signs do not point to the contrary, the sworn statement of the parties that they are

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

baptized and suffer from no impediment will suffice to admit them to the celebration of marriage. Note the requirement of baptism, which is not further determined, wherefore valid, nay presumably valid, Baptism suffices. Of course, if the parties should wish to be baptized conditionally, this would settle the first requisite. But the time may be very precious. We believe that, if possible, a witness should be called to hear their sworn testimony.

THE BRIDAL EXAMINATION (EXAMEN SPONSORUM)

After having glanced at the quotations in Cardinal Gasparri's edition of the Code and searched for the instructions which were said to be universal law by some authors,[1] we were surprised not to find any reference to those which emanated from Rome in 1658, 1665, and especially 1670. The last-named instruction is a rather extensive document.[2] Traces of such questioning may be found in a Capitulare Regum Francorum and allusions to it in Gratian's Decretum and the Decretals.[3] But of a previously existing universal law we could discover nothing. The Code now prescribes such an examination in

CAN. 1020

§ 1. Parochus cui ius est assistendi matrimonio, opportuno antea tempore, diligenter investiget num matrimonio contrahendo aliquid obstet.

§ 2. Tum sponsum tum sponsam etiam seorsum et caute interroget num aliquo detineantur impedimento, an consensum libere, praesertim mulier, praestent, et

1 Cfr. Wernz, l. c., IV, 1 ed., p. 189.

2 Collect. P. F., I, n. 192.

3 Cap. 35; also in the Liber Canonum, Cod. Vat. 1339, fol. 254, l. V, c. 4; c. 13, C. 32, q. 6; c. 19, C. 35, q. 2 and 3; c. 3, X, IV, 3 (Lat. Counc. IV); v. Scherer, l. c., II, p. 145.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

an in doctrina christiana sufficienter instructi sint, nisi ob personarum qualitatem haec ultima interrogatio inutilis appareat.

§ 3. Ordinarii loci est peculiares normas pro huiusmodi parochi investigatione dare.

§ 1. The pastor who is entitled to assist at a marriage shall, at a convenient time, carefully investigate whether there is an obstacle to the marriage to be contracted. He may delegate another, for instance, his assistant, to make this investigation. But the personal obligation remains, insofar as negligence on the part of the delegate would recoil on the pastor. If the parties belong to his parish, the parochial books should be consulted and relatives who know the parties asked. If the parties are strangers, the investigation is more difficult, but should be conducted by means of a friendly correspondence between the pastors. Here the value of properly kept registers appears. Of course, if the pastor is certain as to the perfect freedom of the parties from impediments, no investigation is necessary; in the case of an elopement or a hurried marriage, it is often impossible. This is the previous and, we might say, informal investigation.

§ 2. At a fixed date follows the examination proper. The pastor who is entitled to assist at the marriage, should question the bridegroom and bride separately and cautiously as to the possible existence of an impediment, ascertain whether both, especially the woman, consent freely to the marriage, and whether they are sufficiently instructed in Christian Doctrine. The last question may be omitted where the character and standing of the parties renders it useless.

The formal examination has two parts: the juridical questioning and the doctrinal examination. If we say

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

juridical questioning, this term must be understood as far as it relates to the juridically free status. Benedict XIV in his "Nimiam licentiam," May 18, 1743, from which our text is almost verbally taken, says: "seorsim caute et, ut dicitur, ad aurem explorare," that is to say, in a very cautious and strictly private and secret way. The reason is obvious: the matter is of a delicate nature and therefore requires prudence. Unnecessary questioning, especially about illicit familiarities, might lead to serious consequences, and the parties might make use of it in order to get a dispensation more readily. Benedict XIV (l. c.) advises pastors to ask whether there be an impediment, and if so, of what kind, whether there was a former engagement (this is no longer absolutely necessary), and whether the parents consent to the proposed marriage. About defamatory impediments, such as crime or public honesty, the pastor should inquire by way of instruction rather than by direct questioning, or he may omit this point entirely.[4]

The doctrinal examination should be held to ascertain whether the parties are sufficiently instructed concerning the commandments of God and of the Church, the Apostles' Creed, the "Our Father," "Hail Mary," the acts of faith, hope and charity, and contrition.[5] However, says the Code,—and this is a mitigation of the former practice,[6]—if the pastor knows that questioning would be useless, he may omit it with a certain class of persons. What is meant by personarum qualitas? Such qualities may be of the laudable sort, for instance, in the case of a well-educated layman who is a prominent Catholic, or who has written books which prove his doctrinal sound-

4 De Smet, l. c., p. 453 f.

5 Rituale Romanum, tit. VII, c. 1, n. 1.

6 Benedict XIV, "Etsi minime," Feb. 7, 1742, § 11; De Syn. Dioec., VII, 14, 3–6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ness, or of a lady who has taught Sunday School in a Catholic parish, or who is regular in attending the sermons and catechetical instructions, etc. But there is another class of persons who have barely a smack of Christian doctrine. These, says the authentic interpretation,[7] the pastor should diligently instruct, at least in the elements of Christian doctrine (as set forth above), but if they refuse to be taught, he may nevertheless admit them to marriage, in accordance with can. 1066.

§ 3. It is the business of the diocesan Ordinary to issue special regulations to pastors on the instruction of nupturients. This may be done in an appendix to the "Diocesan Statutes," unless the Ordinary himself wishes to compose or recommend a manual for the purpose.

The S. Poenit., Sept. 5, 1899, says that, besides the witnesses, the parties themselves may be asked as to the existence of impediments.

CAN. 1021

§ 1. Nisi baptismus collatus fuerit in ipso suo territorio, parochus exigat baptismi testimonium ab utraque parte, vel a parte tantum catholica, si agatur de matrimonio contrahendo cum dispensatione ab impedimento disparitatis cultus.

§ 2. Catholici qui sacramentum confirmationis nondum receperunt, illud, antequam ad matrimonium admittantur, recipiant, si id possint sine gravi incommodo.

§ 1. Unless Baptism was conferred in his own parish, the pastor must demand a baptismal certificate from both parties, or from the Catholic party only if the marriage

[7] June 2–3, 1918, n. 3 (A. Ap. S., X, p. 345).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google is to be contracted with a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship.

The S. C. Sac. had previously insisted on such a certificate whenever one or both of the parties were baptized outside the parish whose pastor was to assist at the ceremony.[8] If they were baptized in his own parish, he should look up the baptismal record.

§ 2 is new because it demands the reception of Confirmation before marriage, provided this Sacrament can be received conveniently. The reason for this regulation consists in the sacramental grace of Confirmation, which strengthens the faith and enriches the state of grace.

THE BANNS

The fourth Lateran Council[9] alludes to a custom prevailing in some places, of publicly proclaiming an intended marriage. This custom was observed in Italy and France.[10] Odo of Soliac is said to have introduced it into the latter country about the year 1198. The Council of Trent prescribed a threefold publication of the banns.[11] The Code determines by whom, when, and where the publication is to be made, the obligation of the faithful to reveal existing impediments, and finally the required dispensations.

CAN. 1022

Publice a parocho denuntietur inter quosnam matrimonium sit contrahendum.

8 S. C. Sacr., March 6, 1911, ad I (A. Ap. S., III, 102).

9 C. 3, X, IV, 3. Banns is from bannum, a public edict or proclamation; Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v.; Cath. Encyl., Vol. II, s. v.

10 v. Scherer, l. c., II, 146.

11 Sess. 24, c. 1; "Tametsi," de ref. mat.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The pastor must publicly announce between whom a marriage is to be contracted.

Stress is laid on publicly. A public announcement means one that can be understood by the hearers. Therefore it should be made with an audible voice, distinctly, and in the vernacular language. Inter quos signifies the parties between whom the marriage is to take place. The baptismal (and also any colloquial) name, the family name, the condition of the parties, whether married before or not and the number of publications must be stated. The age or social condition of the parties need not be stated, and injurious or ludicrous remarks must be omitted.[12]

CAN. 1023

PUBLICATION TO BE MADE BY THE PASTOR

§ 1. Matrimoniorum publicationes fieri debent a parocho proprio.

§ 2. Si pars alio in loco per sex menses commorata sit post adeptam pubertatem, parochus rem exponat Ordinario, qui pro sua prudentia vel publicationes inibi faciendas exigat, vel alias probationes seu coniecturas super status libertate colligendas praescribat.

§ 3. Si aliqua sit suspicio de contracto impedimento, parochus etiam pro breviore commoratione consulat Ordinarium, qui matrimonium ne permittat, nisi prius suspicio, ad normam § 2, removeatur.

§ 1. The publication of the banns is to be made by the parties' own pastor (parochus proprius), i. e., the pastor in whose parish the parties have their domicile or quasi-domicile. The diocesan domicile cannot be alleged in the case of banns, else all the pastors of a diocese would 12 Rituale Rom., tit. VII, c. 1, n. 7; De Smet, l. c., p. 42 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

be competent to make the announcements. But the question naturally arises: Is a pastor parochus proprius of those who have been only one month in his parish? Can. 1097 allows him to assist at the marriage, and hence it would seem that he should also be entitled to publish the banns. Yet we cannot adopt this view [13] because the law itself as well as a decision of the S. Congregation of the Council [14] restricts the monthly stay precisely in regard to the celebration of marriage. Besides, the purpose of the law, which is to discover possible impediments, can scarcely be attained by proclaiming the banns in a place where the parties have resided only for one month. Lastly, the Code itself manifestly favors our interpretation, because in § 2 of our canon it speaks of a six months' stay in another place. Therefore, with regard to the banns only domicile and quasi-domicile [15] are to be considered. Now it may happen that James has his domicile in one parish, and Gemma in another. In that case the banns must be published in both parishes. The same rule holds concerning quasi-domicile. We may even stretch the possibilities. If James has a winter and a summer domicile, and Gemma also has two domiciles different from those of James, the banns must be published in all four parishes. Also, if James has a domicile and Gemma only a quasi-domicile, both in different parishes, the banns must be published in both. As to vagi, or vagabonds, the pastor of the parish in which they live here and now, must make the announcement.

But what if they have recently left their domicile or quasi-domicile? This question is answered in § 2. If a 13 Vermeersch, De Forma Spons. et Mat., n. 59.

14 S. C. C., March 28, 1908 ad V.

15 Cfr. can. 92, Vol. II, p. 14 f., of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google party has lived in a place other than the parish of the parochus proprius for six months after the age of puberty, the pastor shall report the matter to the Ordinary, who may prudently order either the banns to be published in that place or else proofs or conjectures to be gathered which establish the party's free status.

§ 3. If the pastor suspects the existence of an impediment, he should report to the Ordinary, even though the party has lived less than six months in the other place, and the Ordinary shall not give permission to marry until the suspicion has been removed by the means mentioned in the preceding paragraph (§ 2).

The question concerning a recently abandoned domicile is touched at least indirectly. For alius locus, the other place, plainly has reference to a change of domicile or quasi-domicile.[16] Therefore the Ordinary's decision must be sought, and he should make inquiries through the respective chanceries and from the pastors and also the civil magistrates, if possible. Conjectures would be probable indications, for instance, from travels or sojourns, as also from the moral character of the party. After he is morally certain the parties are free, the Ordinary may either order the banns to be published or instruct the pastor to proceed with the marriage ceremony. Hence it might happen that the banns would have to be published in several places, if the bishop insisted.

How is pubertas to be understood? We believe it is the age required for marriage according to can. 1067, i. e., sixteen and fourteen years, respectively, because an instruction of the Holy Office[17] mentions that age, although 16 Benedict XIV, "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758. The Holy Office, Aug. 22, 1890, ordered that the banns be published in the place of birth, and in every place where the parties lived for ten months after having reached the age required for marriage (Coll. P. F., n. 1376).

17 See the preceding note.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to can. 88 the age would be fourteen and twelve, respectively.

Concerning soldiers we have not seen the faculties granted to our Episcopus Castrensis. In the camps, as a rule, the banns would have to be proclaimed by the pastor in whose parish the camp or barracks are located and by the pastor of the bride. In some countries [18] it is the office of the military chaplain to proclaim the banns of soldiers.

In addition to what we have said about the six months in another place, an authentic interpretation has been issued concerning a stay of that length of time in very distant and remote parts (in longissimis et dissitis oris), probably on account of soldiers and legionaries or colonial troops.[19] The answer is that in such cases the Ordinary may content himself with the oath of the party and the statement of two witnesses, or at least one, who has lived with the party, though other proofs may also be demanded.

CAN. 1024

TIME AND PLACE OF PUBLICATION

Publicationes fiant tribus continuis diebus dominicis aliisque festis de praecepto in ecclesia inter Missarum sollemnia, aut inter alia divina officia ad quae populus frequens accedat.

The banns are to be proclaimed in church on three successive Sundays or holydays of obligation during the solemnity of the Mass or at other services which are frequented by the people.

18 Thus in Austria; cfr. Aichner, l. c., § 164.

19 Pont. Com. Auth. Int., June 2–3, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 345).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1025

Potest loci Ordinarius pro suo territorio publicationibus substituere publicam, ad valvas ecclesiae paroecialis, aliusve ecclesiae, affixionem nominum contrahentium per spatium saltem octo dierum, ita tamen ut, hoc spatio, duo dies festi de praecepto comprehendantur.

The Ordinary may, however, substitute for said publication the public posting of the names of the contracting parties at the doors of the parish church or some other church; the announcement must remain posted for eight days, including two holydays of obligation.

(a) The Sundays and holydays of obligation are those celebrated in foro externo by the hearing of Mass and abstaining from servile labor.[20] It matters nothing whether these feast-days fall within the prohibited time, for the publication of banns is not forbidden during that period.

They are successive if one follows another without interruption through another Sunday. If, for instance, Christmas immediately follows Sunday, the publication is to be made on these days as they follow each other. But an interruption by ferial days is not only allowed, but even desirable.[21]

In church (in ecclesia) says the text, following the Tridentine Council, which intended first and above all the parish church. Hence the publications may not be made in a public or semi-public oratory. However, if a public oratory serves as a temporary church for the people, the 20 In the U. S. the holydays of obligation are: Immac. Conc. B. M. V.; Christmas, New Year, Ascension, Assumption (Aug. 15), and All Saints.

21 S. C. C., June 17, 1780 (Richter, Trid., p. 225); Gasparri, n. 213.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

banns may be published there.[22] Semi-public oratories are not churches.[23]

The term missarum sollemnia is also taken from the Council of Trent and implies, not precisely a solemn High Mass or Missa Cantata, but such a one as is generally regarded as a conventual or parochial Mass. The law now permits, as a rule and not only in exceptional cases,[24] that the banns be published at services other than the Mass, provided they be well attended by the people, e. g., at Vespers or evening service if there is a large gathering on these occasions. This will be a welcome opportunity, especially if the last publication has been forgotten.

Can. 1025, permitting the posting of the banns at the church-door, is new, although the practice had been previously permitted, not, however, as a substitute, but as an additional mode of publication.[25]

Can. 1026

Publicationes ne fiant pro matrimoniis quae contrahuntur cum dispensatione ab impedimento disparitatis cultus aut mixtae religionis, nisi loci Ordinarius pro sua prudentia, remoto scandalo, eas permittere opportunum duxerit, dummodo apostolica dispensatio praecesserit et mentio omittatur religionis partis non catholicae.

The publication of the banns is to be omitted in marriages contracted with a dispensation from either dis-

22 S. C. C., 1901 (Anal. Eccl., 1901, p. 58); this, however, is a particular decision not to be generalized; it was a case of church repairs.

23 S. C. C., Aug. 19, 1702 (Zamboni, l. c., s. v. Mat., § VI, n. 6).

24 S. C. C., Oct. 25, 1586 (Richter, Trid., p. 226, n. 30).

25 Coll. Lac. Conc., t. I, 198; v. Scherer, II, 147.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

parity of cult or mixed religion, unless the Ordinary discreetly permits it, provided no scandal is given, and provided that the apostolic dispensation has been obtained, and no allusion is made to the non-Catholic party's religion. Apostolic dispensation is here to be understood of the dispensation from the impediment of worship or mixed religion.

Scandal might arise among the people because of the non-Catholic party's aversion to the Catholic religion, or because of a Catholic's marrying a non-Catholic, especially in preponderantly Catholic parishes.

CAN. 1027

OBLIGATION OF THE FAITHFUL TO DIVULGE IMPEDIMENTS

Omnes fideles tenentur impedimenta, si qua norint, parocho aut loci Ordinario, ante matrimonii celebrationem, revelare.

All the faithful are bound in conscience to reveal, either to the pastor or to the bishop, any impediment they may have knowledge of, before the celebration of the marriage.

As the parish priest could not be absolved from grievous guilt were he to omit the publication of the banns,[26] so the faithful are under a grave obligation to manifest impediments known to them.[27] This obligation is based, if not on positive law,[28] at least on the nature and scope of the publication, and consequently on the public welfare, and therefore obliges all Catholics. Consequently 26 Benedict XIV, "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758: "Non idcirco denuntiationum omissionem gravi culpa carere."

27 Rituale Rom., tit. VII, c. 1.

28 Gasparri, n. 221. Wernz, IV, p. 204 (1 ed.), assumes a positive law besides the natural obligation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

all are included, none is excluded, as the Gloss says.[29] The only persons exempt from this general obligation are those bound by professional or privileged secrecy, such as confessors, physicians lawyers, counsellors, midwives. If one knows of an impediment but under secret which he has promised to keep, perhaps under oath, he would nevertheless be bound to divulge it, unless by doing so he would incur great danger to his soul or body, or give scandal.[30] But if the impediment is notorious, it may and must be manifested by anyone who has knowledge of it (except the confessor), even those who are bound by secrecy.[31] If the pastor has extra-sacramental knowledge of what he believes to be an impediment, he must stop the publication of the banns until he has convinced himself that no impediment exists.[32]

CAN. 1028

DISPENSATION FROM THE BANNS

§ 1. Loci Ordinarius proprius pro suo prudenti iudicio potest ex legitima causa a publicationibus etiam in aliena dioecesi faciendis dispensare.

§ 2. Si plures sint Ordinarii proprii, ille ius habet dispensandi, in cuius dioecesi matrimonium celebratur; quod si matrimonium extra proprias ineatur dioeceses, quilibet Ordinarius proprius dispensare potest.

The diocesan Ordinary may, according to his discretion, dispense from the publication of the banns in his own diocese or in a strange diocese, provided there is a lawful reason. If the parties belong to different dio-

29 Ad c. 3, X, IV, 3, s. v. "voluerit."

30 Lehmkuhl, Theol. Moral., II, n. 677.

31 Gasparri, n. 226.

32 C. 27, X, IV, 1; v. Scherer, II, 148.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceses the bishop in whose diocese the marriage is to be celebrated, is entitled to dispense; if the marriage takes place in neither of the two dioceses, either of the Ordinaries may dispense. The Council of Trent[33] left it to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary to dispense, if he sees fit, from some or all of the banns. By Ordinary is understood the bishop, the vicar-general, or the vicar-capitular, even without a special commission (administrator and abbas nullius). But inferior clergymen, such as deans, pastors,[34] or assistants have no power to grant a dispensation. However, in case a marriage would surprise a pastor, as it were, and he is aware that it could be maliciously hindered, and certain that no impediment exists, he may omit the publication, vi declarationis, if no time is left for consulting the bishop. This holds especially in danger of death.[35]

The Code also mentions causa legitima. Such a lawful reason, in general, is one which neutralizes or counterbalances the law. When a law has a penal sanction attached, this indicates that it is considered important by the lawgiver. Still more is this the case with a lex plus quam perfecta or one with a nullifying sanction. Less serious is a law which has neither. To this last-mentioned class belongs the omission or dispensation of the banns, because neither is nullity of the marriage nor any other penalty pronounced in the Code. The Code simply states that there should be a legitimate reason.[36] Such a reason would be, for instance, a suspicion that the marriage would be maliciously impeded if the banns

33 Sess. 24, c. 1, de ref. mat.

34 S. C. C., Jan. 25, March 26, 1707 (Gallemart, Trid., I, 282); the pastor is not allowed to omit the publications, even if he deems them entirely useless or thinks those made by civil authority to be sufficient; S. O., Jan. 12, 1881 (Coll. P. F., n. 1545).

35 De Smet, l. c., ed. 1, p. 42.

36 Stricter Benedict XIV, "Satis nobis," Nov. 17, 1741; "inevitable reason"; Id., De Syn. Dioec., XII, 6, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

were published;[37] or if it appeared probable that the other party would break the engagement because of a protracted delay caused by the publication, or if disparity of age or unequal social condition, or inequality of wealth would make the parties a laughing-stock, or if the woman would be enceinte.

The Ordinary who may dispense is he in whose diocese both contracting parties have their domicile or quasi-domicile, or, if they are vagi, the Ordinary in whose diocese they happen to live at the time. Thus, if James belongs to the diocese of St. Joseph, and Gemma to the diocese of Kansas City, the bishop of the latter diocese dispenses if the marriage takes place in that diocese; because ordinarily the bridegroom follows the bride in this matter. Should James insist on being married in the diocese of St. Joseph, the bishop of that diocese dispenses. Should the parties choose a third diocese for their marriage, for instance, the archdiocese of St. Louis, either the bishop of St. Joseph or the bishop of Kansas City may dispense. No preference is here accorded to the bride. But the pastors of both parties must be notified of the granting of the dispensation (from the proclamation of the banns) by either bishop, and the episcopal chancery from which the dispensation emanates should give notice to the other, to prevent misgiving or suspicion on the part of the pastor in the other diocese.

Finally it may not be useless to add that, though no penalties are specified in the Code for the omission of the banns, the Ordinary would not exceed his power if he proceeded against pastors carelessly omitting the banns or assisting at marriages for which the banns have not been proclaimed. This right belongs to the bishop as guardian of the law, as Fagnani says.[38]

37 Gasparri, l. c., n. 232 ff. 38 Ad c. 25, X, v. 1, n. 78.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1029

Si alius parochus investigationem aut publicationes peregerit, de harum exitu statim per authenticum documentum certiorem reddat parochum, qui matrimonio assistere debet.

Should it happen that another pastor has attended to the examination of the candidates or made the publications, he must as soon as possible authentically inform the pastor who is to assist at the marriage of the results of his inquiry.

Thus, Father Luke of a parish in the St. Joseph diocese has made the publications or conducted the examination of the contracting parties James and Gemma, or perhaps only of the former, who is his parishioner, but the marriage is to take place in Father John's parish in the diocese of Kansas City (or in the same diocese of St. Joseph, because the case remains the same). Father Luke discovered no impediment, but is nevertheless bound to notify Father John because the text simply says, de harum exitu, i. e., he should advise him of the result obtained by either the examination or the publication, no matter whether that result was positive or negative, i. e., no matter whether an impediment was discovered or not. Benedict XIV says [39] that the pastor who assists at marriage must ask whether the publications were duly made, and hence the pastor who published the banns is bound to inform his colleague of the fact. Of course, this obligation becomes more urgent if pastor Luke has discovered an impediment.[40] The Code imposes both investigation and

[39] "Paucis abhinc," March 19, 1758 (Bull., Prati, IV, p. 494): "ad hoc, ut tuto interesse possit matrimonio."

[40] This is the case mentioned in the instruction of S. C. Sacr., March 6, 1911, ad II (A. Ap. S., III, 102).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google examination, and it may happen that one pastor performs the examination, while another publishes the banns, and a third assists at the marriage. In such a case the first two have to inform the third of the result of the investigation and publication before he may assist at the ceremony.

This information must be given by means of an authentic document. Can. 470, § 4, prescribes that every pastor should have a parish seal for official papers. The Rituale Romanum [41] distinguishes two cases: (a) if both parishes lie within the same diocese, Father Luke has simply to send his information under the parish seal and with his signature to Father John, who must file it and make a note of it in the Matrimonial Book, as prescribed by said Rituale Romanum. (b) If one of the contracting parties belongs to another diocese, where the banns must also be published, the mere statement of the pastor that the publications were made, is of no value, unless the paper containing the statement is signed and sealed by his bishop or vicar-general and recognized by the bishop or vicar-general in whose diocese the marriage is to take place and who must give his permission for the marriage. Therefore pastor Luke of the St. Joseph diocese must send the statement to his own bishop or vicar-general, who shall forward it, signed and sealed, to the bishop or vicar-general of the Kansas City diocese, who in turn shall transmit the paper together with his own permission to Father John. If the bishop has a chancellor to whom he wishes to entrust the matter, he may do so, because what a bishop may do himself, he may entrust to another. The formula is given in the Ritual and would read in English as follows: "We hereby testify that the publications of the marriage between N. and N. have been 41 Tit. X, c. 5 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 330).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

duly made by pastor N. of the parish N., to whom (he) N. or (she) N. belongs, as may be ascertained from the papers included. The first publication was made on [date], the second on [date], the third on [date: day, month, year] during the parochial Mass, and no canonical impediment was found to be in the way. Wherefore we grant you permission to assist at said marriage.

Signed: .....
Sealed: ....."

CAN. 1030

§ 1. Peractis investigationibus et publicationibus, parochus matrimonio ne assistat, antequam omnia documenta necessaria receperit, et praeterea, nisi rationabilis causa aliud postulet, tres dies decurrerint ab ultima publicatione.

§ 2. Si intra sex menses matrimonium contractum non fuerit, publicationes repetantur, nisi aliud loci Ordinario videatur.

To emphasize the preceding canon and make it more effective, canon 1030 provides that after the examination and the publication of the banns the pastor shall not assist at the marriage until he has received all the necessary papers, and until at least three days have passed after the last call, unless a plausible reason should dictate otherwise. Should a marriage be delayed for six months after the banns have been published, the publication must be repeated, unless the Ordinary decides otherwise.

The first clause of this canon is decidedly new and, as we have said, devised for the purpose of making sure that the candidates are free. The marriage should not take place on Monday or Tuesday if the last announcement was made on Sunday. Wednesday could be chosen, for Sunday may be reckoned as one of the three days, since the publication was most probably made in the forenoon. However, if the pastor has a plausible reason, he may go ahead with the marriage sooner, nor need he report the fact to the Ordinary. A plausible reason would be, for instance, if one of the parties or the pastor would have to leave before Wednesday, or if there would be an anniversary of the parents' wedding, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A report to the Ordinary must be made if the marriage is delayed for six months after the last call. This is a necessary precaution because it might happen that meanwhile an impediment is contracted or discovered. Hence the Rituale Romanum [42] as well as an Instruction of the Holy Office [43] demand repetition of the banns if two or three months have elapsed since the last publication. Our Code extends the time to six months, and says that even then the Ordinary — not the pastor — may declare a repetition unnecessary if he is morally certain that the parties are free to contract Matrimony.

CAN. 1031

ASCERTAINING OF THE FREE STATUS

§ 1. Exorto dubio de exsistentia alicuius impedimenti:

1.° Parochus rem accuratius investiget, interrogando sub iuramento duos saltem testes fide dignos, dummodo ne agatur de impedimento ex cuius notitia infamia partibus oriatur, et, si necesse fuerit, ipsas quoque partes;

2.° Publicationes peraget vel perficiat, si dubium ortum sit ante inceptas vel expletas publicationes;

[42] Tit. VII, c. 1, n. 11 (ed. cit., p. 212).

[43] Aug. 22, 1890, ad VI (Coll. P. F., n. 1740).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Matrimonio ne assistat, inconsulto Ordinario, si dubium adhuc superesse prudenter iudicaverit.

§ 2. Detecto impedimento certo:

1.° Si impedimentum sit occultum, parochus publicationes peragat vel absolvat, et rem deferat, reticens nomina, ad loci Ordinarium vel ad Sacram Poenitentiariam;

2.° Si sit publicum et detegatur ante inceptas publicationes, parochus ulterius ne procedat, donec impedimentum removeatur, etsi dispensationem pro foro conscientiae tantum obtentam norit; si detegatur post primam aut secundam publicationem, parochus publicationes perficiat et rem ad Ordinarium deferat.

§ 3. Demum si nullum detectum fuerit impedimentum, nec dubium nec certum, parochus, expletis publicationibus, ad matrimonii celebrationem partes admittat.

Since the examination of the nupturients and the publication of the banns all tend to ascertain their freedom from canonical impediments and since a reasonable doubt may arise in the pastor's mind as to the existence of an impediment, the Code lays down certain rules, which should be applied to disperse such doubts. A reasonable doubt is one which is not merely momentarily entertained, but clings to the mind and makes the contrary opinion appear less probable. Thus, if one of the parties was married before, and his consort died in a distant country, from which no certain notice could be gotten, there would be a reasonable doubt — a dubium facti, not iuris. Doubts of the latter kind must be settled according to the Code, and, if necessary, according to the rules of interpretation and the opinion of the School. Having premised this much, let us hear what the Code

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google says of a doubt arising as to the existence of an impediment.

(1) In such a case the pastor shall investigate more thoroughly by querying at least two trustworthy witnesses (provided the impediment is not defamatory) and also the parties themselves, under oath, if he deems it necessary. Concerning this examination several instructions have emanated from the Holy Office,[44] which are summarized in that [45] of Aug. 22, 1890, from which we learn that

(a) The witnesses to be cited may be either men or women, preferably relatives of the contracting parties and citizens.[46] Non-Catholics may be admitted if they are known to be trustworthy.

(b) Before being examined the witnesses must be admonished concerning the sacredness of an oath. Then they must be asked about their name, parents, age, profession and dwelling place, whether they are citizens and how long they have lived in the place. Those who volunteer to testify are to be rejected. Those that are called as witnesses must be questioned, by whom, where, when, how, before whom, and how often they were called to testify. They must also be asked whether they received anything from anyone for acting as witnesses. Then they must be questioned whether they know the contracting parties, their character, social standing, and how long, and in what place and on what occasion the parties became known to them. If a witness says he has no knowledge, he must be dismissed; if he says he knows the parties to the contemplated marriage, he should be asked 44 Coll. P. F., nn. 192, 1267, 1283, 1342, 1399, 1427.

45 Ibid., n. 1740.

46 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll. cit., n. 1427, Vol. II, p. 87). Cives are contrasted with exteri, but the former must be taken as inhabitants, not citizens in the legal sense, whilst exteri are outsiders or foreigners who do not live in the parish or diocese.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

whether they are citizens (i. e., have a domicile somewhere) or foreigners. If they are foreigners, the proceedings are to be suspended, but if they are known to the witnesses as citizens, the witnesses must be asked in what parish the parties lived or are living, whether one or both of them were ever married before, or made religious profession or received major orders, and if there be any impediment to the Marriage. If the witnesses answer all these questions negatively, they should be interrogated as to the source of their knowledge and whether there is any probability that either of the parties is married or bound by an impediment If the answer is affirmative, proceedings must be stopped, unless other witnesses conclusively prove the contrary. If the answer is negative, then the witnesses must again be asked concerning the source of their knowledge (hearsay, eye-witnesses, etc.?) in order to establish their trustworthiness. If they say that the contracting party was previously married, but that his or her partner is dead, they must be asked about the death and its circumstances and whence they got the knowledge of the former marriage and subsequent death of the other party. If they claim that the death occurred in a hospital, or that they saw the party buried from a certain church or in a certain cemetery, authentic information must be obtained from the respective authorities (hospital, church, cemetery) before permission for the wedding may be granted. If no documents can be obtained, other proofs are admissible. The witness must also be asked whether the surviving party married, or may have married, again. If the answer to the last question is affirmative, permission for the wedding is to be suspended until other witnesses testify conclusively that no marriage has taken place. If the answer is negative, the witnesses should be asked concern-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing the sources of their knowledge, and after due deliberation the judge or pastor may decide whether or not permission may be granted.

(c) The pastor is not allowed to assist at the marriage of vagi, or vagabonds, unless he has obtained the necessary documents from the Ordinaries (see can. 1032).

(d) If the contracting parties, or one of them, is in prison, the testimony of the prison chaplain may be admitted as proof of his status; and if this cannot be obtained, the party, if trustworthy, may be admitted to the supplementary oath.[47]

This detailed investigation, is, however, to be omitted if the impediment would entail defamation, or rather infamy, upon the parties or one of them. The only defamatory impediments are rape, crime, and public dishonesty.[48]

(e) Where one of these impediments is suspected, the parties may be put under oath concerning their free state. This oath, too, is called supplementary (iuramentum suppletorium) because it is imposed to supply deficient proof. Hence the pastor may ask the parties, or party, to swear on the gospel, or by merely holding up three fingers and calling God as a witness that they speak the truth.

(2) The pastor, says the canon, shall continue or complete the publication of the banns if the doubt arose before or during the publications, because in that case it is possible that the doubt may be cleared up or stronger proofs be brought showing the existence of an impediment.

(3) If the doubt still remains after the publications, the pastor shall not assist at the marriage before having consulted the Ordinary. An instruction of the Holy Office, 47 S. O., Feb. 28, 1866 (Coll. cit., n. 1283).

48 Cf. canons 1074, 1075, 1078.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Aug. 22, 1670, rules that the publications should not be begun until the pastor has obtained a document from the bishop or his vicar-general, testifying to the free status of the contracting parties. And although this instruction need no longer be followed in regard to time, concerning the necessary paper it is certainly advisable to follow it, since other instructions of the same Holy Office have insisted upon this requirement.[49]

§ 2 says that if the existence of an impediment is certainly established, then, (1), if it is secret, the pastor shall continue or complete the publication of the banns and refer the matter either to the Ordinary or to the S. Poenitentiaria, without naming the parties; (2) If the impediment is public and is (a) discovered before the publications are begun, the pastor shall not proceed further until the impediment is removed, even though he may know of a dispensation granted for the court of conscience; (b) if a public impediment is discovered after the first or second publication, the pastor shall finish the publications and then report to the bishop.

The difference between a secret and public impediment is explained in can. 1037. From secret impediments the Ordinary may have power to dispense, and hence they should be brought before the episcopal court. If the Ordinary cannot dispense, the matter must be referred to the Sacra Poenitentiaria. What is necessary to know concerning that power will be explained in the chapter on dispensations.

Reticens nomina does not mean that no names should be given, but that assumed or fictitious names may be made use of. If the impediment is public, the proper 49 The consequence is, as said instruction rules (Coll. P. F., n. 192), that the Ordinary has to proceed like the pastor, i.e., according to the rules laid down above.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google names are to be stated in the report made to the Ordinary.

The Code further says that any knowledge a pastor may have of a dispensation obtained solely for the court of conscience is tantamount to no knowledge. He may know of the dispensation through the confessional or from some other source; but as a dispensation granted for the internal forum only does not hold for the public forum, the pastor must act as if he had no knowledge at all.

§ 3. If no impediment was discovered, either doubtful or certain, the pastor shall, after all the banns have been published, admit the parties to the celebration of marriage.[50]

CAN. 1032

Matrimonio vagorum de quibus in can. 91, parochus, excepto casu necessitatis, nunquam assistat, nisi, re ad loci Ordinarium vel ad sacerdotem ab eo delegatum delata, licentiam assistendi obtinuerit.

No pastor shall, except in case of necessity, assist at a marriage of vagi, unless he has previously referred the case to the Ordinary of the diocese, or to a priest delegated by the latter, and obtained his permission.

Who are vagi is explained in can. 91. They are such as have neither a domicile nor a quasi-domicile, and, with regard to marriage, have not stayed for thirty days in any one place, i.e., parish or diocese.[51] Hence one who has roamed about a diocese for thirty days without settling in any parish thereof, cannot strictly be called vagus, 50 Trid., sess. 24, c. 1, de ref. mat.; Rituale Rom., tit. VII, c. 1, c. 2, n. 1 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 211 f.).

51 S. C. Sacr., March 12, 1910, ad V: "Nomine vagorum veniunt omnes et soli, qui nullibi habent parochum vel ordinarium proprium ratione domicilii vel menstruae commorationis."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and the present canon does not apply to him. Here we perceive the benefit of a "diocesan domicile."

If he is dealing with a real vagabond, and the case is one of necessity, the pastor need not report to the Ordinary, but, servatis de iure servandis, may proceed to the marriage. Whether the case is one of necessity is left to the pastor to judge.[52] A soldier who has to leave immediately, as also a pregnant woman, might claim necessity. If the case is not one of necessity,[53] it must be reported to the bishop. What the latter must do is stated in the instruction of the Holy Office, Aug. 22, 1890, which demands that the parties produce authentic documents from the Ordinaries in whose diocese they have lived for less than a year. If none such can be had, the parties may be admitted to the supplementary oath concerning the diocese from which the required documents cannot be obtained. At any rate, at least two witnesses must be produced to testify to the free state of the contracting parties during their vagabondage. In addition the Ordinary may, if he deems it necessary, demand a supplementary oath from the groom.

The "priest delegated by the bishop" may be one delegated for a particular case, or for all matrimonial cases (the chancellor or rural dean). If the custom prevails in a diocese that the procedure concerning the free state of nupturients is reserved to the episcopal court, this custom may be observed.[54]

CAN. 1033

Ne omittat parochus, secundum diversam personarum conditionem, sponsos docere sanctitatem sacra-

52 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 294.
53 Coll. P. F., n. 1740 ad 8.
54 S. C. C., Feb. 1, 1908 ad 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are to be thus admonished, not those who are of age.[62]

If the parents know nothing of the intended marriage it is the pastor's duty to inform them, whether the contracting parties like it or not. Of course, this rule applies only when conditions are normal. In many cases it will be next to impossible to notify the parents, and then [63] the pastor is excused from that duty. He is also excused, in the opinion of some canonists, if the parents live very far from the place where the marriage takes place.

If the parents know of the marriage, but oppose it with good reason, the pastor must consult the bishop. Before doing so, however, he should dispassionately hear the objections, in order to communicate them to the Ordinary. A reasonable objection would be, for instance, that the family would suffer disgrace or notable material loss, or that the marriage would cause scandal or dissension, or that one of the parties belongs to a family of low or base degree (jail-bird, irreformable drunkard, gambler), or to a different religion, or is in precarious health. Social distinctions should not weigh much in a democratic state, nor should inequality of wealth, all other things being equal, be a decisive factor.

Unreasonable objections are those inspired by personal dislike or political differences, or based on idle gossip or mere sentiment.

62 Can. 88, § 1.

63 Cfr. De Smet, l. c., p. 333 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

IMPEDIMENTS IN GENERAL

The publication of the banns is intended to disclose impediments, if there be any, and hence the Code logically proceeds to the consideration of the obstacles which may either impede or invalidate a prospective marriage.

The technical term impedimentum was coined by the Glossators, and the distinction between impedientia and dirimentia occurs in the Summa of Magister Rolandus, who was followed by Bernardus Papiensis.[1] The number of the impediments was not fixed. The gloss ad pr. C. 27, q. I, mentions sixteen, Tancred[2] prefers the mystic number fourteen $(7+7)$, twelve "diriment" and two "impeding" impediments. Some of the impediments mentioned by these early writers are now grouped under the heading of defective consent. Thus compulsion, fear, condition, error really affect the consent. But there are other obstacles which natural, or divine, or ecclesiastical law has set up in a more particular manner. Berardi[3] has laid down a good rule for distinguishing between invalidating and prohibitive impediments. He says: Those marriages which the natural or positive-divine law reprobates in a more especial manner, are not only illicit, but invalid; marriages which the ecclesiastical law

1 Cfr. Freisen, l. c., p. 222 f.

2 Summa de Spons. et Mat., ed. Wunderlich, p. 17. It may be permitted to say that the term diriment is not well chosen. What has not yet been joined, cannot be rent asunder. But the term has the force of custom and is now sanctioned by the Code.

3 Comment. in Ius Eccl. Universum, t. III, dissert. IV, c. 1 (ed. Venet., 1778, Vol. II, p. 77).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google intends to invalidate must be expressly declared null and void, otherwise they are only illicit. This rule is clearly discernible in our Code.

GENERAL PRINCIPLE

CAN. 1035

Omnes possunt matrimonium contrahere, qui iure non prohibentur.

All can contract marriage who are not forbidden to do so by law.

Marriage being based upon the natural distinction of sex, and intended by the Creator for the preservation and propagation of the human race as well as for the increase of His true worshippers, is permitted to all. This does not mean that all men must marry. There is no general command that compels each and every individual to contract marriage. Nature itself prevents some from getting married; others are called by God to a state of life which compels them to devote themselves to His exclusive service. This is the doctrine preached by the Apostle of the Gentiles,[4] and it has been followed by the Church and dogmatically defined at Trent.[5] The Tridentine Council condemns those "who say that the conjugal state is to be preferred to the state of virginity or celibacy." Therefore the Code says, "All can contract marriage."

It adds: "who are not forbidden to do so by law." The forbidding law may be either the natural or a divine or human law. The natural law, as stated above, prohibits polygamy, whence the impediment of ligamen or 4 I Cor. 7, 25 f., 38, 40; cfr. Matth. 19, 11 f.

5 Sess. 24, can. 10, de sacr. mat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

existing marriage bond. The natural law also bars from marriage those who are absolutely impotent, i. e., unable to engender children. Hither may also be referred the impediment of age, as far as it is connected with impotence. Blood-relationship in the degrees of the direct line, and in the first degree of the collateral line, are likewise generally referred to the natural and divine law. But we cannot stretch that law any further. Human or ecclesiastical law has set up other restrictions, all intended to safeguard marriage, which is preeminently a public institution.

PROHIBITIVE AND DIRIMENT IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1036

§ 1. Impedimentum impediens continet gravem prohibitionem contrahendi matrimonium; quod tamen irritum non redditur si, non obstante impedimento, contrahatur.

§ 2. Impedimentum dirimens et graviter prohibet matrimonium contrahendum, et impedit quominus valide contrahatur.

§ 3. Quanquam impedimentum ex una tantum parte se habet, matrimonium tamen reddit aut illicitum aut invalidum.

§ 1. A prohibitive impediment implies a grave prohibition of contracting marriage, but does not render it invalid if contracted.

§ 2. A diriment impediment both gravely forbids marriage and prevents it from being contracted validly.

§ 3. Even when the impediment exists only on one side, it renders marriage illicit or invalid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLIC AND OCCULT IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1037

Publicum censetur impedimentum quod probari in foro externo potest; secus est occultum.

An impediment is considered public when it can be proved in the external forum; otherwise it is occult.

These terms are plain; the difference between prohibitive and diriment impediments lies in their effect, that between public and occult, in their liability to be proved. An occult impediment is supposed to be and remain unknown, except perhaps to one or two trustworthy persons,[6] but it becomes public if the parties concerned reveal or prove its existence. Therefore the Code naturally looks at the juridical side of the knowledge, for one may be "cocksure" about an impediment and yet at the same time unable to prove its existence. If two trustworthy persons, besides the party or parties concerned, know of the impediment, and have means to prove it, it can no longer be styled occult.[7] One authentic document (e. g., a baptismal record) is sufficient to prove the existence of an impediment.

Note § 3, can. 1036, which clearly indicates the individual character of the marital union. "Matrimonium claudicare nequit," and hence if one party is affected by an impediment, the other party, in virtue of the bilateral contract, is also affected.[8] Therefore, if James suffers from an impediment, his bride Gemma is also affected. Disparity of cult, age, ligamen, etc., affect not only the 6 Gasparri, De Mat., n. 259 (ed. 3).

7 S. C. C., July 9, Sept. 10, 1881 (A. S. S., t. 14, p. 465).

8 S. O., Sept. 16, 1824 ad 2 (Coll. P. F., n. 784).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

party directly concerned, but indirectly also the other. But here a distinction must be made. If James becomes a Catholic, the impediment ceases and he may freely marry his Catholic friend, Gemma. Again, if Gemma and James are second cousins, they suffer equally from the impediment. But if James wants to marry Lola, who is not related to him, the impediment ceases for James. Therefore a distinction must be made between absolute and relative impediments. The former affects the person completely and with respect to every other person, for instance, ligamen, as long as it lasts, and absolute impotency; whereas the latter concerns only a certain person or class of persons. Of little practical value is the distinction between impediments juris publici and juris privati, except in so far as the right of accusing the marriage is concerned,[9] and in this sense it coincides with the distinction between public and occult impediments.

THE SUPREME ECCLESIASTICAL AUTHORITY

CAN. 1038

§ 1. Supremae tantum auctoritatis ecclesiasticae est authentice declarare quandonam ius divinum matrimonium impediat vel dirimat.

§ 2. Eidem supremae auctoritati privative ius est alia impedimenta matrimonium impedientia vel dirimentia pro baptizatis constituendi per modum legis sive universalis sive particularis.

§ 1. It belongs to the supreme authority of the Church to declare authentically when the divine law forbids or invalidates a marriage.

§ 2. To the same supreme authority belongs the ex-

[9] Thus Wernz, IV, ed. 1, p. 345; De Smet, l. c., p. 288.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

clusive right to establish, for persons baptized, other impediments, prohibitive or invalidating, by way of universal or particular law.

The first section is based upon the dogmatic decree of Trent which condemns the assertion that only those degrees of consanguinity and affinity which are mentioned in Leviticus (18, 6 ff.) constitute diriment impediments and that the Church has no power to set up others.[10] Our canon also excludes the usurped power of the civil authority which undertakes, of its own accord, to enact laws concerning the dissolubility of marriage. Such an attempt is called violence to the divine and to the natural law, or rather a corruption of the law.[11] But the Church claims exclusive authority only for declaring whether the divine law forbids or invalidates a marriage. A palpable example is the impediment of disparity of cult vs. mixed marriage, which both certainly rest on divine law, and that of simple and solemn vows.

§ 2 is also based on the dogmatic canons of the Council of Trent,[12] as emphasized anew against the Rationalists in the Syllabus of Pius IX, which was aimed at the so-called Regalists, who pretended that the power of establishing impediments was given to the Church by the civil authority and that the latter ought to do away with them. The power of establishing impediments belongs inherently to the Church and is not derived from the State, as the dogmatical canons of the same council show.[13] The Church claims the right to establish impediments for baptized persons.[14] This right may be asserted

10 Sess. 24, can. 3, De Sacr. Mat.

11 S. O., July 6, 1817; Sept. 3, 1772 (Coll., nn. 725, 492).

12 Sess. 24, can. 3, 4, 9, De Sacr. Mat.

13 Propp. 68–70.

14 There is always the same difficulty concerning the term baptized. If baptized means what the expression properly conveys, then all, whether Catholics or non-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

either by way of a universal or a particular law. A universal law is one that affects every province and all persons without exception; a particular law is one like the "Tametsi," which was conditioned upon local promulgation. Particular laws were the declaration of Benedict XIV concerning mixed marriages in the Netherlands and the "Provida" of Pius X for Germany (1906).

But the Church does not deny the power of the State over marriages of non-baptized persons, as is evident from a decision of the S. P. F., of June 26, 1820.[15] However, civil impediments obliging baptized persons, especially that of lack of consent on the part of the parents, are discountenanced by the Church.[16]

THE POWER OF ORDINARIES

CAN. 1039

§ 1. Ordinarii locorum omnibus in suo territorio actu commorantibus et suis subditis etiam extra fines sui territorii vetare possunt matrimonia in casu peculiari, sed ad tempus tantum, iusta de causa eaque perdurante.

§ 2. Vetito clausulam irritantem una Sedes Apostolica addere potest.

The "vetitum Ecclesiae" was formerly one of the prohibitive impediments, but has ceased to be such, at least ipso iure. Yet the Code vindicates to the local Ordinaries the right of forbidding a particular marriage or a Catholics, are comprised by the term, provided they are validly baptized. An authentic interpretation would not be superfluous.

15 Coll. P. F., n. 744. In China certain ceremonies were prescribed either by law or custom, the non-observance of which rendered marriage invalid; the S. Congregation declared them invalid.

16 S. O., Nov. 17, 1835; S. C. P. F., April 1, 1816 (Coll., nn. 842, 711).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage in a particular case. Therefore their power extends only to individual cases and, besides, cannot be exercised except for a just cause. Such a cause would exist, e. g., if the Ordinary would have reason to doubt the free status of one or both of the contracting parties, either because no papers were received or because papers had been refused by another bishop.[17] Another just cause would be a reasonable doubt as to the existence of an impediment,[18] or a strong presentiment of future trouble.[19] However, the bishop may not forbid a marriage indefinitely, but only for a time, as long as the reason lasts.[20] Therefore a certain term should be set, say two or three months, which, in ordinary times, would enable the parties to obtain the necessary papers and remove existing difficulties. Lastly, the Ordinary's power extends only to those who actually live within his diocese or are his subjects, even if they dwell outside the diocese. Therefore all Catholics who live in a diocese, no matter for how short a time, must abide by the order of the bishop if he forbids their attempted marriage. The same rule applies to subjects who have their domicile or quasi-domicile in the diocese, but momentarily live elsewhere, though in such cases it will be proper to notify the Ordinary of the other diocese.

As to the effect of an episcopal prohibition, it may delay a marriage, but cannot invalidate it, and hence a marriage contracted against the bishop's injunction is valid if the prescribed form was observed.

A bishop would not exceed his power if he proceeded 17 S. C. C., Feb. 20, 1723 (Richter, Trid., p. 269, n. 112).

18 S. C. C., March 15, 1727 (ibid., n. 113).

19 Cfr. A. S. S., t. 8, p. 211 ff.

20 If the reason for which the prohibition was made, ceases, the prohibition also ceases ipso facto, and the pastor may lawfully assist and the parties lawfully contract.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

against offending parties and the assisting priest and witnesses with ecclesiastical punishments.[21]

The text ascribes this power to the Ordinary, i. e., to bishops and all who go by the name of Ordinary, therefore also vicars-general. Pastors and their assistants, being destitute of jurisdiction in foro externo, cannot forbid a marriage, though a pastor may stay a marriage for a while until the case is settled by the ecclesiastical court, to which he would have to report if the contracting parties were vagi, or if there were doubts as to the existence of an impediment, or if the parents of a minor would oppose the marriage,[22] or if family troubles could be foreseen.

If the pastor stayed a marriage and refused permission or delegation to his curate to assist at it, the marriage would be invalid, not because of the pastor's prohibition, but on account of lack of permission or delegation. But if the pastor would simply forbid his curate to assist, without expressly restricting the general delegation previously given to him, (can. 1096), the assistant could validly assist at that marriage.[23]

§ 2 mentions the case where the Apostolic See forbids a marriage. Only an invalidating clause explicitly added to the prohibition, says Benedict XIV, would render invalid a marriage attempted against the Pope's prohibition. If the decretum irritans is not expressed in the prohibition, the marriage would be merely illicit. Examples of such prohibition are exceedingly rare. A famous one is that by which Stephan III endeavored to deter Charlemagne from marrying the daughter of Desiderius, King

21 S. C. C., Florentina, Feb. 17, 1629; Feije, l. c., n. 549, p. 424.

22 S. C. C., March 15, 1727 (Richter, Trid., p. 269, n. 113); cfr. can. 1031, §§ 1, 3; 1032, 1034.

23 S. C. C., April 22, 1719 (Richter, l. c., n. 110 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the Lombards, and the son of Desiderius from marrying Charlemagne's sister, Gisela.[24] That the Pope can make such an invalidating prohibition follows from his power of establishing ecclesiastical impediments.[25]

A kind of prohibition is sometimes made by the S. Congregations, especially if a matrimonium ratum tantum is to be dissolved, in the following form: "Vetito mulieri transitu ad alias nuptias inconsulta S. Congregatione, idque mulieri notificetur ante novam propositionem." This clause is used in cases of impotence or inviolate virginity, when there is doubt as to the absolute proof of said physiological condition.[26] But this clause does not savor of an invalidating decree.

A prohibition, papal or episcopal, ceases by revocation, or lapse of time, or cessation of the cause for which it was made.[27]

THE POWER OF ESTABLISHING IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1040

Praeter Romanum Pontificem, nemo potest impedimenta iuris ecclesiastici sive impedientia sive dirimentia abrogare, aut illis derogare; item nec in eisdem dispensare, nisi iure communi vel speciali indulto a Sede Apostolica haec potestas concessa fuerit.

What we have said above concerning ecclesiastical legislation will suffice to explain this canon. It is now, 24 Migne 89, 1253 ff.; despite all imprecations the Pope does not employ the clausula irritans, but considers the planned marriage invalid because of previous betrothal; hence Wernz (l. c., IV, Vol. II, p. 462) is wrong if he says, sub poena nullitatis.

25 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XII, 5, 3.

26 S. C. C., Dec. 18, 1869; Dec. 15, 1877 (A. S. S., V, 553; XI, 141).

27 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 604, p. 467.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and has been since the Council of Trent,[28] the teaching of the Church that the Roman Pontiff alone can either totally or partially abolish impediments established by ecclesiastical law, whether prohibitive or diriment. Note the term ecclesiastici iuris, for impediments of natural or divine law, such as those of ligamen or impotency, or blood-relationship of the first degree, can never be abolished or modified by the Pope. But ecclesiastical impediments were established by the Church and can be either totally or partially abrogated by her. No examples of complete abolition of diriment impediments are discoverable in the Code, if we except betrothal with regard to public honesty. But several impedient impediments have been abolished. Thus the ecclesiae vetitum, the tempus feriatum, the sponsalia, the banns, have all been done away with.[29] A partial abrogation of diriment impediments has been made concerning the degrees of kinship, spiritual relationship, affinity and public honesty.[30]

§ 2 says that the Sovereign Pontiff alone can dispense from matrimonial impediments, and no one else, unless the power has been granted to him by the common law or by special papal indult. This, too, is now the established teaching and practice of the Church, as may be seen from the condemnation of contrary tenets.[31] Benedict XIV was not a little surprised to hear that some 28 Sess. 24, can. 3, de sacr. mat.; c. 2, de ref. mat.

29 They were contained in the following verse:

Ecclesiae vetitum, tempus, sponsalia votum,
Mixtaque religio, si proclamatio desit.

30 The diriment impediments are contained in this verse:

Error, conditio, votum cognatio, crimen,
Cultus disparitas, vis, ordo, ligamen, honestas,
Aetas, affinis, si clandestinus et impos,
Si mulier sit rapta, loco nec reddita tuto,
Haec socianda vetant connubia, facta retractant.

31 Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, prop. 59 f.; Syllabus of Pius IX, prop. 68.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Polish prelates held a different opinion, especially with regard to the impediments of disparity of cult and mixed religion.[32]

What the general or common law grants to Ordinaries is contained in our Code, and they are allowed to go beyond the powers therein conferred only if a special papal indult gives them additional faculties. Such an additional faculty is that of April 25, 1918, and August 2, 1918, of which more will be said under can. 1048.

CUSTOM POWERLESS TO ESTABLISH IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1041

Consuetudo novum impedimentum inducens aut impedimentis exsistentibus contraria reprobatur.

Customs tending to introduce a new impediment or to abrogate those in force, are hereby reprobated.

There was a custom acknowledged concerning the "Tametsi," in so far as it was taken or presumed as a proof that the promulgation of said decree was duly made in a parish. This custom is quite different from one tending to introduce a new impediment, as that which crept into Servia, of regarding the act of being a witness to a marriage as an impediment to marriage. Benedict XIV strictly forbade any such custom.[33]

What the term reprobated means has been explained in the first Volume (pp. 112 ff.) of this Commentary. It is the intention of canon 1041 to preclude the rise of such customs, as well as to state that they cannot be called reasonable.

32 "Magnae Nobis," June 29, 1748.

33 "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 17. An even sillier custom, mentioned in the same Constitution, was that of considering the act of shearing the locks of a boy for the first time as an impediment to marriage.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CLASSIFICATION OF IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1042

§ 1. Impedimenta alia sunt gradus minoris, alia maioris.

§ 2. Impedimenta gradus minoris sunt:

1.° Consanguinitas in tertio gradu lineae collateralis;

2.° Affinitas in secundo gradu lineae collateralis;

3.° Publica honestas in secundo gradu;

4.° Cognatio spiritualis;

5.° Crimen ex adulterio cum promissione vel attentatione matrimonii etiam per civilem tantum actum.

§ 3. Impedimenta maioris gradus alia sunt omnia.

§ 1. Impediments are divided into higher and lower.

§ 2. Impediments of a lower degree are the following:

1.° Consanguinity in the third degree of the collateral line;

2.° Affinity in the second degree of the collateral line;

3.° Public decency in the second degree;

4.° Spiritual relationship;

5.° The impediment of crime arising from adultery with a promise of, or attempt at, marriage, even by a merely civil contract.

§ 3. All other impediments are of the higher degree.

This division was introduced for convenience sake by the officials of the Roman Curia, because dispensations from minor impediments were issued by the subsecretary of dispensations attached to the S. C. of Sacraments, or his substitute, whereas dispensations from major impediments were granted by the Cardinal Prefect or the Secretary of the Congregation.[34]

[34] Cfr. A. Ap. S., I, 90 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It may here be noted that the Code does not treat as impediments in the proper sense error, servile condition, condition proper, compulsion and fear, but deals with them under ch. V, on Matrimonial Consent, as affecting the substantial form of marriage.

We will now exhibit in parallel columns the impediments of the major and minor degrees as enumerated in the present chapter.

LIST OF IMPEDIMENTS

Major	Minor
1. Age.
2. Impotence (iuris nat.).
3. Ligamen (iuris nat.).
4. Disparity of Cult and Mixed Religion.
5. Sacred Orders.
6. Solemn Profession.
7. Rape.
8. Crime, with adultery and uno machinante, or without adultery, but utroque machinante.	1. Crime with adultery and promise of marriage.
9. Consanguinity, whole direct line and first and second degree of the collateral line (iuris nat. 1° deg. lin. rectae).	2. Consanguinity in the third degree of the collateral line.
10. Affinity in the whole direct line and first degree of collateral line.	3. Affinity in the second degree of the collateral line.
11. Public honesty in the first degree.	4. Public honesty in the second degree.
12. Legal Adoption.	5. Spiritual relationship.

We put the impediment of mixed religion, though only prohibitive, among the major impediments, as the Code seems to justify this classification (see can. 1071). As to the impedient impediments, a classification of them is superfluous.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DISPENSATIONS

In Vol. I of this Commentary (pp. 173 ff.) the general principles governing dispensations have been outlined. A dispensation is a relaxation of the law in particular or individual cases. The sovereign lawgiver, and he alone, can by his inherent power dispense from laws subject to his domain. Hence the general principle asserted in can. 1040 concerning matrimonial dispensations is but a logical application of the general rule to a special class of dispensations. The same sovereign power may communicate the right of granting dispensations to inferiors, and the communication may be made by law or by personal commission. The latter may be given either to single individuals, for instance, the bishop, or a confessor or pastor chosen for this single instance, or by a general commission to Ordinaries as such, at least for a certain time and for certain countries. The powers thus conferred were formerly contained in fixed formularies, which now, however, are obsolete, though the S. C. Consistorialis, in virtue of the decree "Proxima sacra," April 25, 1918, has again granted to the Ordinaries of the U. S. and other far-distant countries faculties concerning matrimonial dispensations which we shall discuss under can. 1048. These faculties we may call delegated, as they are delegated by the Supreme Pontiff. Besides, the lawgiver as such, or the law itself, has granted to Ordinaries, pastors, and other priests powers with regard to matrimonial dispensations, which consequently belong, as the decree quoted above intimates, to their ordinary jurisdiction, and may therefore be delegated to others. Of these the Code says:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

POWERS OF DISPENSING GRANTED TO ORDINARIES IN CASES OF DANGER OF DEATH

CAN. 1043

Urgente mortis periculo, locorum Ordinarii, ad consulendum conscientiae et, si casus ferat, legitimationi prolis, possunt tum super forma in matrimonii celebratione servanda, tum super omnibus et singulis impedimentis iuris ecclesiastici, sive publicis sive occultis, etiam multiplicibus, exceptis impedimentis provenientibus ex sacro presbyteratus ordine et ex affinitate in linea recta, consummato matrimonio, dispensare proprios subditos ubique commorantes et omnes in proprio territorio actu degentes, remoto scandalo, et, si dispensatio concedatur super cultus disparitate aut mixta religione, praestitis consuetis cautionibus.

In danger of death, Ordinaries may for the relief of conscience and, if the case demands, for the legitimation of children, dispense their own subjects, wherever they may be, and all other persons actually residing in their territory, from the form of marriage, and from all impediments of the ecclesiastical law, diriment and impedient, public and occult, simple and multiplex, including clandestinity, but not the impediment of priestly orders and affinity in the direct line, arising from consummated marriage.

In granting these dispensations all danger of scandal should be removed, and in the case of disparity of worship and mixed religion, the usual conditions should be imposed.[35]

This is, as noted above, no longer [36] a merely personal [35] Translation adapted from Irish Eccl. Record, 1918, Vol. XI, p. 121 f.

[36] S. O., Feb. 20, 1888; April 23, 1890 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1685, 1728). In the latter of these decisions the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google commission or faculty in the strict sense, but a communication by law. For the rest a delegation is hardly necessary, on account of can. 1044.

Our canon then states under what circumstances, when, by whom, in whose behalf, from which impediment, and under which clauses a dispensation may be granted.

(1) Circumstances:

(a) Danger of death is present when a physician declares that it is, and the Ordinary may rely on the physician's verdict. Besides, a priest with some practice learns to perceive the danger. Lastly, if the patient himself believes there is danger, he must be believed.

(b) For the relief of conscience (ad consulendum conscientiae) is a reminiscence of the "Ne temere," art. VII, which has a similar phrase concerning the danger of death, only that it employs the term imminente, which is about the same as urgente. A conscience needs relief when it is troubled or oppressed by sadness, as is apt to be the case in an illicit marital relation. The term is quite general and does not exclude other causes.[87] The question may arise: Does ad consulendum conscientiae refer only to persons in danger of death or may it be applied to others who are in no such danger. Our answer is: As marriage is an individual contract, and the troubled conscience of the party that is not sick may at least indirectly affect the party who is, it would seem that the legislator means also to grant a dispensation in that case. This interpretation is corroborated by a declaration of the Holy Office. A dispute had arisen about the words, "aegrotos in gravissimo mortis periculo constitutos." Some maintained that the faculty (as formerly understood) could be applied only in case the faculty was explained "veluti ordinaria."

87 Vermeersch, De Sponsalibus et Mat. (Ne temere), p. 39.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

impediment affected the sick person, but not if the sick person was free (solutus) and the impediment affected only the person who was well. Others asserted that the faculty could be applied also in case the sick person was free from impediments and only the other party was involved. The Holy Office decided that the dispensation may be applied in both cases.[38] This answer was the only logical and consistent one that could be given in view of the reasons stated above.

(c) Another and doubtless a grave circumstance is that of legitimation of children. Note, however, that this is not a requisite for applying the dispensation; the latter can be granted even if there is no offspring to be legitimated. Hence the insertion, "et si casus ferat." Legitimation must be interpreted according to can. 1116 f.

(2) Who are meant by Ordinaries is explained under can. 198, to which we refer. The Vicar-general is included here as well as in the following canons. The diocesan chancellor, however, is not ipso facto included, unless he has obtained the power, which is now an ordinary one, from his bishop, either for a special case or generally.[39]

(3) On whose behalf the dispensation may be granted is determined by the words: subjects and actual residents. Subjects are those who have their domicile or quasi-domicile in the diocese. There is no need of making use of the privilege of the monthly sojourn, for all actual residents may avail themselves of this favor. There is this

[38] S. O., July 1, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1758), the example is as follows: "Unde quum civiliter sint coniuncti, aut alias in concubinatu vivant, ex gr., puella soluta et diaconus, illaque aegrotante, hic valens sit, possetne Ordinarius cum his dispensare? Vel si monialis aegrotans in concubinatu viveret cum diacono bene valente, essetne locus dispensationi, quum diaconus non sit in gravissimo mortis periculo constitutus?"

[39] Can. 199, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

difference, however, between these two classes of persons, that the Ordinary's power, because voluntary, may be exercised over his subjects even outside his own territory. The distinction is of little practical value, because if subjects of the diocese of St. Joseph actually dwell in Kansas City, the bishop of the latter diocese may dispense them. The case is somewhat different if one travels on land or sea, because an Ordinary can dispense his own subjects everywhere, hence also in a monastery of exempt religious.[40]

It has been customary with canonists[41] to assert that a dispensation can be applied only when a person had either contracted a civil marriage or lived in concubinage. This condition is no longer required, for the Code makes no such restriction, and Cardinal Gasparri has, certainly not without reason, omitted to cite the decision of Sept. 17, 1890, to which canonists were wont to appeal. For the rest it may be stated that this condition was not attached to the dispositive part of the well-known decree of Feb. 20, 1888.[42] Let us illustrate. James is about to marry Gemma, who is his second cousin, and with whom he has had illicit relations which were apt to result in pregnancy. But he is overtaken by the influenza and in danger of death. Here the Ordinary may grant a 40 The text says: "locorum Ordinarii," and hence religious superiors are excluded. That exempt religious are residents of a diocese needs no proof, for exemption — unless there is question of an Abbatia Nullius — is not directly local, but personal. That such religious belong to a diocese also follows from the fact that they receive not only orders, but also faculties from their Ordinaries.

41 Thus Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 617, p. 493; De Smet, l. c., p. 491.

42 Neither was this clause inserted in the decision of March 1, 1887 (Coll., n. 1698), to which Wernz (l. c.) refers. But it is true that the decree of Feb. 20, 1888, refers to that condition in the narrative part, and that the decision of Sept. 17, 1890, directly contains this clause; wherefore the authors mentioned were perfectly entitled to their interpretation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dispensation. We again refer to what was stated under n. I, viz., that even if the sick party is not affected by the dispensation, e. g., in case of disparity of cult, the dispensation may be made use of. Note, however, what is said infra, under (5).

(4) What impediments may be dispensed from? The Code says: all impediments of the ecclesiastical law, whether public or occult, diriment or impedient, with the sole exception of the priesthood and affinity in the direct line. Hence, negatively speaking, no dispensation can be granted for the impediment of ligamen or marriage bond; impotence; consanguinity in the direct line, and — at least most probably — in the first degree of the collateral line; affinity in the direct line; and sacred orders, i. e., the priesthood. But dispensations may be granted from all impediments, public or occult, diriment or impedient, which latter include the five vows mentioned in can. 1058 and the impediment of mixed religion. That of clandestinity is also included in the ordinary power of dispensation, and solemn profession and the sacred orders up to subdeaconship and the diaconate may be dispensed from in such circumstances. Neither does the Code require that the Holy Office should be notified of dispensations granted to solemnly professed persons or persons in sacred orders if they recover.[43] The multiplex impediments of consanguinity and affinity[44] may also be dispensed from by the Ordinary in the case mentioned.

(5) Clauses or clausulae attached are: (a) Consummato matrimonio, which is the most important condition, undoubtedly affecting the validity of the dispensation. The legislator supposes a marriage which has been consummated by the copula carnalis. Juridically

43 Such notification was required by decree of Feb. 20, 1888.

44 Cfr. can. 1076 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

speaking, of course, there was no marriage at all. Hence the union must bear the aspect and semblance of a marital union. This may be effected either by a civil marriage, or a putative union, or one which was considered such by the parties and their surroundings. It may even be a concubinage, either legal or illegal. But the semblance at least of a marriage is required, and the supposed marriage must be consummated whether with or without resulting offspring. Upon this point the parties should be asked unless the existence of children makes the question unnecessary. That any marriage carrying with it the figure and semblance of a marital union is here included is evident from the text. For this comprises also dispensation from the observance of the form required.

(b) Remoto scandalo, as enjoined by the decree of Feb. 20, 1888, especially concerning religious and clergymen dispensed in danger of death. If they recover, the decree says, they should be induced to leave and go to some place where their ecclesiastical status is unknown, or if this is impossible, they should be given a wholesome penance and have a conduct prescribed that would repair the scandal given to the faithful. Concerning other persons the decree is silent. The scandal of concubinage is removed by marriage, which should be made known to those who were scandalized, either by the pastor or by the parties themselves. This clause does not affect the validity of the dispensation.

(c) Concerning the impediments of disparity of cult and mixed religion the legislator requires that the usual condition imposed for such marriages should also be demanded in cases where there is danger of death. Now in case of disparity of cult these conditions (called reversales) must be demanded and obtained under pen-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alty of the dispensation being null and void;[45] in case of mixed marriages the validity, of course, is not affected, as this is only a prohibitive impediment.

POWERS GRANTED TO PRIESTS

CAN. 1044

In eisdem rerum adiunctis de quibus in can. 1043 et solum pro casibus in quibus ne loci quidem Ordinarius adiri possit, eadem dispensandi facultate pollet tum parochus, tum sacerdos qui matrimonio, ad normam can. 1098, n. 2, assistit, tum confessarius, sed hic pro foro interno in actu sacramentalis confessionis tantum.

This canon extends the favor to parish priests and to every priest who is called upon to assist at a marriage in accordance with can. 1098, n. 2, as well as to confessors. But there is a restriction: pastors, assistant priests, and confessors can use this faculty only when access to the Ordinary is impossible, and confessors only in the court of conscience and in the act of sacramental confession. Otherwise the power granted to the Ordinary by can. 1043 may be used by these to the same extent and in the same urgent cases.

(1) Pastors enjoy the faculty, not assistants as such, unless they are actually in charge of souls. Vice-pastors and chaplains are excluded.[46] However, since

(2) Every priest who is entitled to assist at marriages according to can. 1098, n. 2, may use the faculty of dispensing, assistants may also exercise it. Whether the pastor may, within his own district, delegate his assistant to assist at a marriage which would not fall under can.

[45] S. O., March 18, 1891 (Coll., n. 1750); June 21, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 442 f.).

[46] S. O., April 23, 1890 (Coll., n. 1728).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1098, is not quite evident. The text as well as a decision of the Holy Office seem rather against such delegation.[47] On the other hand, since the power is given by law, and not merely by the Ordinary as a subdelegated faculty,[48] and since the pastor is empowered to delegate his authority of assisting at marriages to any priest within his district, it would seem that he may also delegate his assistant for such a case. This is our personal view.

(3) The confessor may make use of the power granted by law only in the court of conscience and in the act of sacramental confession. Here a doubt may arise as to public impediments, e. g., consanguinity in the third degree. For example: James, being in danger of death, is engaged to Gemma, who is his second cousin. Father John is his confessor, but not his pastor. The couple would like to get married. What shall Father John do? The first thing he should do is to ask the pastor of James to hurry to the sickbed, or if no time is left for that, Father John should act himself, not as confessor, but as a priest who is allowed to assist by virtue of can. 1098, n. 2, and call two witnesses, after having heard James's confession. In the presence of two witnesses Father John should then ask and receive the consent of James and Gemma and say: "By the authority granted to me by the Holy Church, I dispense you from this impediment and unite you in the holy bond of matrimony." If the impediment is occult and concerns James only, Father John may grant a dispensation in the act of sacramental confession, and then assist at the marriage as above.[49] If the impediment is public, he may also

47 Ibid.: "posse illum subdelegare habitualiter parochis tantum."

48 This is supposed in the decree just alleged.

49 No recourse to the Holy See is required for a dispensation; cfr. Feije, l. c., n. 638, p. 576.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dispense in the act of sacramental confession, but as this is valid only for the court of conscience, a regular dispensation will have to be asked for afterwards.[50]

(4) Pastors, priests, and confessors can make use of the faculty here under consideration only when access to the Ordinary is impossible. This impossibility must be understood of the ordinary means of communication, by messenger, letter, or "express." Concerning telegraphic communication, the Holy Office has decided that a dispensation given by the Ordinary in response to a telegraphic message, is not valid before the authentic document of the grant of favor has arrived, unless the message was sent officially by authority of the Holy See.[51] As to the use of the telephone, its validity depends upon prompt, reliable, and secret service. The ordinary "party line" is no trustworthy and confidential means of communication. But in no case is the use of the telegraph or telephone mandatory,[52] and even if these means of communication are available, pastors or priests or confessors could safely make use of the faculty granted by can. 1044.

In order to complete our notes on these two canons it may be well to ask a question concerning the distinction between a marriage to be contracted and a marriage already contracted. Does the power of the Ordinary and the faculty of the pastor, priest, or confessor hold in both instances? The answer is yes, because the Code makes no distinction, though this was not the common 50 Either from the Ordinary, if he enjoys the faculty, or from the Holy See, i. e., the S. Cong. of the Sacraments. This dispensation is not superfluous, even if the other party should die in the meanwhile, because the marriage has to be verified and registered, and the offspring perhaps legitimated.

51 S. O., Aug. 24, 1892 (Coll., n. 1810).

52 Thus also De Smet, p. 507 (ed. 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

doctrine of writers before the Code.[53] Their attitude was doubtless based upon the theory that the faculties could be applied only in cases of civil marriage or concubinage. But the decision of the S. C. Sacr. had already done away with that theory.[54]

CASUS PERPLEXUS

CAN. 1045

§ 1. Possunt Ordinarii locorum, sub clausulis in fine can. 1043 statutis, dispensationem concedere super omnibus impedimentis de quibus in cit. can. 1043, quoties impedimentum detegatur, cum iam omnia sunt parata ad nuptias, nec matrimonium, sine probabili gravis mali periculo, differri possit usque dum a Sancta Sede dispensatio obtineatur.

§ 2. Haec facultas valeat quoque pro convalidatione matrimonii iam contracti, si idem periculum sit in mora nec tempus suppetat recurrendi ad Sanctam Sedem.

§ 3. In iisdem rerum adiunctis, eadem facultate gaudeant omnes de quibus in can. 1044, sed solum pro casibus occultis in quibus ne loci quidem Ordinarius adiri possit, vel nonnisi cum periculo violationis secreti.

§ 1. Under the conditions laid down in can. 1043, if the impediment is discovered when everything is ready for the marriage, and the ceremony cannot be delayed without the probable danger of a grave inconvenience until a dispensation is obtained from the Holy See, Ordinaries can dispense from all the impediments mentioned in the same canon.

§ 2. This faculty holds good for the revalidation of a 53 Cfr. Putzer, Comment. in Fac. Ap., p. 83 (ed. 4); Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 617, p. 493.

54 S. C. Sacr., Venet., Aug. 16, 1909 (A. Ap. S., I, 656).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage already contracted, if delay is dangerous and there is no time to have recourse to the Holy See.

§ 3. In the same circumstances the pastor, priest and confessor mentioned in can. 1044 enjoy the same faculty, but they are allowed to apply it only in occult cases which admit of no recourse to the local Ordinary or if access to the Ordinary would entail danger of violating the secret.

This is the well-known casus perplexus of canonists,[55] which, however, by reason of can. 1043 and 1044, is now reduced to a minimum.

(1) The local Ordinaries empowered to grant a dispensation are all those mentioned in can. 198, therefore also the vicar-capitular and the vicar-general.

(2) They must observe the conditions or clausulae mentioned in can. 1043, i.e. scandal must be removed, if there be any, because the case of one in sacred orders or with solemn profession is hardly imaginable. But the other clause may easily occur; hence the conditions required for disparity of cult and mixed religion must by all means (and under penalty of the nullity of the dispensation) be complied with.

(3) The impediments from which the dispensation may be granted are those set up by ecclesiastical law only, with the sole exception of the priesthood and affinity in the direct line. Whether these impediments be diriment or impedient, occult or public, matters nothing; the Ordinary may dispense from all except the two expressly mentioned.

(4) The circumstances in which the dispensation may be granted are (a) if everything is ready for the marriage (omnia sunt parata ad nuptias) and (b) if the marriage cannot be postponed without the probable danger of [55] See, for instance, Feije, l. c., n. 640 ff., p. 581 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a serious inconvenience until the dispensation could be obtained from the Holy See. No doubt the latter clause determines the first one. It is not necessary for the couple to be already in church for the wedding.[56] We understand the phrase "all things ready for marriage" to mean that the final arrangements have been made and the day set for the wedding. The reason why the marriage cannot be postponed is the probable, not certain, danger of a grave inconvenience, such as the fear that one of the parties might change his mind, or the probability that scandal or disgrace might arise from a delay.[57] Pregnancy of the bride would also justify the granting of the dispensation, for this is a grave inconvenience.

What if the parties have purposely waited until the last moment, and hence are evidently not in good faith, especially if neither of them shows signs of repentance? Some authors who wrote before the Code would not permit a wedding under these conditions. However, the old rule must be applied: The law does not distinguish, and hence neither are we at liberty to distinguish, and therefore, even if the impediment were purposely concealed up to the last moment, when recourse to the Holy See is no longer possible, a dispensation may be granted by the Ordinary. Abuse or frivolous extension of the power need not be feared,[58] for the publication of banns and the careful investigation and examination imposed on the pastor will naturally reduce such cases to a minimum. Besides, if the Ordinary is afraid of abuses creeping in, he may and should at times refuse to grant a dispensation, in order to procure the necessary respect for ecclesiastical laws.

56 Thus Feije, l. c., n. 642, p. 586.

57 Feije, l. c., p. 586.

58 This was the argument of Card. Gousset; apud Feije, l. c., n. 644, p. 594.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 rules that the faculty can also be applied in case of a marriage already contracted that needs to be revalidated, the two conditions required being the same: danger in delay and no time for recourse. Cardinal Gasparri refers to a decision of the Holy Office,[59] which reads thus: What should a pastor or priest do in case he is called to the sickbed of a Catholic who was married civilly to an infidel or heretic and is now almost unconscious? Answer: Let the bishop or pastor make use of the faculty granted to the Ordinaries on Feb. 20, 1888, and let the parties renew their consent and promise to comply with the conditions required [for mixed marriages]. Hence the Ordinary should simply grant a dispensation (by telephone, if necessary) and the priest should require renewal of the consent, after he has obtained an oral[60] promise of complying with the required conditions.

§ 3 applies what is laid down in §§ 1 and 2 to the pastor, priest, and confessor referred to in can. 1044, with the additional proviso that the case be occult and admit of no recourse to the Ordinary, or that such recourse would endanger the secrecy of confession. Here it is evident that telephone and telegraph are excluded, and hence only the mails or a messenger can be employed. The case must be occult. An occult case would be one involving a secret crime or the vow of chastity.[61] It may also happen that a party was regarded as Catholic and was not even baptized,[62] or that one was godfather or 59 July 6, 1898, ad 3 (Coll., n. 2007).

60 Can. 1061 prescribes written promises as "a rule," but this rule may, in such circumstances, be licitly dispensed with.

61 Affinity ex copula illicita, which formerly was counted among the occult impediments, no longer exists, either as an impediment or as a penalty in regard to the debitum petendi.

62 S. O., Aug. 22, 1906, ad 4 (Anal. Eccl., t. XV, p. 8).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

godmother to the party whom he or she wishes to marry. All these cases may be occult, i. e., they could not be proved in an ecclesiastical court, because there were no witnesses [63] or no record in the baptismal register. Hence if the pastor or priest or confessor alone knows of the impediment, he may dispense from it. But only in that case. If the impediment were occult at the moment of marriage but could be proved in court, because, as said under can. 1037, two witnesses knew of it or an authentic document existed, no dispensation could be granted by these clergymen. The ancient theories of simulation and cessation may henceforth be discarded, for it is not likely that the Code permits a pastor to apply these thories in casu perplexo, although we would not assert that the old view on cessation of human laws under urgent conditions is absolutely inapplicable in all circumstances.[64] But simulation [65] of marriage with a fictitious or conditional consent we hold to be unworthy of the marriage contract.

DISPENSATIONS TO BE REPORTED AND RECORDED

CAN. 1046

Parochus aut sacerdos de quo in can. 1044, de concessa dispensatione pro foro externo Ordinarium loci statim certiorem faciat; eaque adnotetur in libro matrimoniorum.

The S. C. of the Propaganda advised the priests of Ireland not only to keep copies of, but also to record, matrimonial dispensations.[66] Now the Code demands 63 Cfr. A. S. S., t. 12, p. 422; can. 1037.

64 Feije, l. c., n. 648, p. 601 f.

65 Cfr. prop. 29 damnata ab Innocentio XI (Denzinger, n. 1046).

66 S. C. P. F., July 21, 1791 (Coll., n. 605). The cause of not registering dispensations was probably not carelessness, but some diplomatic or political reason.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google that the pastor or priest — the confessor [67] is exempted — immediately inform the Ordinary of every dispensation granted in foro externo and also record the same in the matrimonial register. Of course, the validity of a dispensation does not depend on the fact of its being duly reported and recorded.

DISPENSATIONS FOR THE INTERNAL FORUM

CAN. 1047

Nisi aliud ferat S. Poenitentiariae rescriptum, dispensatio in foro interno non sacramentali concessa super impedimento occulto, adnotetur in libro diligenter in secreto Curiae archivo de quo in can. 379 asservando, nec alia dispensatio pro foro externo est necessaria, etsi postea occultum impedimentum publicum evaserit; sed est necessaria, si dispensatio concessa fuerat tantum in foro interno sacramentali.

The text distinguishes between a dispensation from an occult impediment granted for the court of conscience, but extra-sacramentally, and a dispensation granted in the act of sacramental confession. The former should be carefully recorded in a special book to be kept separately in the diocesan archives, as mentioned in can. 379. No new dispensation is necessary for the external forum if the occult impediment should afterwards become public. On the other hand, a dispensation granted in the act of sacramental confession does not hold in the external forum, and therefore a new dispensation is required if the impediment becomes public. The beginning of the canon should not be overlooked: "unless a rescript of the S. Poenitentiaria ordains otherwise."

[67] Why the confessor is exempt is evident from the fact of the impediment being occult, not to speak of the seal of confession.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Under can. 258 the S. P. is competent in matters concerning the internal forum. However, this must duly be distinguished, for the favors granted by that sacred tribunal may be applied outside of sacramental confession, e. g., dispensation from vows or from occult impediments, or they may be restricted to the act of sacramental confession, e. g., absolution. Besides, this same tribunal grants faculties to Ordinaries for a certain term of years, five or three. The procedure is governed by the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "In Apostolicae," of April 13, 1744, and by the special rules laid down in the "Sapienti consilio" of Pius X, which demands that the Cardinal Poenitentiarius should have written rules signed by himself.[68] A special feature of this tribunal is that it must keep everything secret and grant its favors entirely gratis. All its officials are bound by a solemn oath. Its present competency must, as stated above, be measured by the powers granted by the "Sapienti consilio," not by the "Pastor bonus," of Benedict XIV (April 13, 1744). In matrimonial matters the term occult impediment must be taken as defined in can. 1037: it is one which cannot be proved in the external forum. Therefore the faculty formerly enjoyed by the S. P. "for the second degree of consanguinity and affinity, if the impediment lasted at least ten years and the petitioners had contracted publicly and lived as married people," [69] no longer exists. All depends on the occult nature of the impediment and on the manner of expediting the favor. If the impediment was occult and the dispensation was applied outside the confessional, for instance, by the pastor, the dispensation holds good in foro externo in case the impediment becomes public.

The reason for demanding a new dispensation in place

[68] A. Ap. S., I, 101 f. [69] "Pastor bonus," § 40.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of one applied only in the sacramental act, if the impediment becomes public, lies in the seal of confession;[70] whence extra-sacramental and sacramental application are, as it were, two different departments, though both directly concern the court of conscience. The clause therefore: "nisi aliud ferat S. P. rescriptum," can refer only to registration, as the grammatical construction seems to confirm. The meaning is: should the rescript forbid recording, for instance, in the case of a crime or vow, notation must be omitted; otherwise it must be made in the special secret record which is to be kept.

We may add that the S. P. is no longer empowered to dispense from any public impediment, no matter whether the petitioners are poor (in forma pauperum)[71] or wealthy. This was the custom before the Constitution "Sapienti consilio" of Pius X and was based on the fact that this sacred tribunal granted all its favors gratis.

FACULTIES OF ORDINARIES

CAN. 1048

Si petitio dispensationis ad Sanctam Sedem missa sit, Ordinarii locorum suis facultatibus, si quas habeant, ne utantur, nisi ad normam can. 204, § 2.

If application for a dispensation has been made to the Holy See, local Ordinaries should not use the faculties they have, except in accordance with can. 204, § 2. This canon rules that an inferior shall not interfere in matters 70 Because from this no public document could issue, which would prove the marriage, always remembering that marriage in itself is not of a private, but of a public character.

71 Before the Constitution "Sapienti consilio" petitions of poor people, although concerning a public impediment, were directed, not to the Apostolic Datary, to which they belonged, but to the S. Poenit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google brought before a superior except for grave and urgent reasons, in which case he must immediately notify the superior.

This canon supposes that: (1) a petition was sent to Rome for a dispensation from a matrimonial impediment, and that (2) the Ordinary has power to grant same. If he had no faculties, interference would not only be ridiculous but presumptuous. Here we may briefly state the contents of a decree of the S. C. Consist., "Proxima sacra," of April 25, 1918, as compared with that of Aug. 2, 1918.

FACULTIES OF THE ORDINARIES OF THE U. S. AND GREAT BRITAIN

1. By Ordinaries[72] here are understood those who are under the jurisdiction of the S. C. Consistorialis; those under the S. C. Propaganda Fide continue to enjoy the same faculties as before.

In regard to matrimonial dispensations these Ordinaries are no longer entitled to use the faculties formerly granted in various formularies, but their faculties are now (since May 19, 1918) determined solely by the Code.[73]

2. The faculties granted by the S. Poenitentiaria remain intact. Therefore, as far as this sacred tribunal is able to grant faculties to our Ordinaries, these are only given for occult impediments, as described under can. 1037 and 1047.

72 By "Ordinaries" here are understood those mentioned in can. 198, but the "Abbas Nullius" of Belmont, North Carolina, as Vicar Apostolic belongs to the S. C. de Prop. Fide; thus also the Vicars-Apostolic of Alaska, of Athabaska and Mackenzie (Canada), of British Honduras, the Hawaii or Sandwich Islands, and Queensland, Australia.

73 The quinquennium dates from May 18, 1918.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The decree ratifies the ruling of canons 1043–1045 concerning danger of death and the casus perplexus explained above.

4. Both decrees grant the faculty of dispensing from minor impediments. The "Proxima," April 25, 1918, also permitted the Ordinaries to revalidate in the root marriages invalid on account of one of these impediments, provided can. 1133–1140 be observed, and allowed Ordinaries to dispense from those major impediments which are of merely ecclesiastical law, with the exception of affinity in the direct line and priesthood. But said decree did not clearly grant the faculty of sanatio in the case of these five impediments. Besides it contained the clause: "if the petition has been sent to the Holy See and urgent necessity has supervened, pending a recourse."

5. The decree of Aug. 2, 1918, has taken away this clause, but at the same time it has limited the faculty of dispensing from major impediments and mixed religion and revalidating such marriages, invalidly contracted on account of one of the major impediments, to the "duration of the present dire condition of war." This latter clause is set forth most conspicuously.[74]

6. Therefore the quinquennial faculties comprise the power of dispensing from the minor impediments, to wit: consanguinity in the second degree of the collateral line, affinity in the second degree of the collateral line, public honesty in the third degree, spiritual relationship, crime with adultery and promise of marriage. These same marriages may also be healed in the root, with due observance of can. 1133–1140. This faculty was granted

74 The clause "adiunctis, quae modo sunt, perdurantibus," as long as these conditions last, appears to be a hint that the Holy See is resolved to put the Code into practice after the war. But it may be permitted to say that disparity of worship and mixed religion would certainly demand some swifter expedient.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for five years, not only for the duration of the war.

7. The war-faculties comprise the power of dispensing from major impediments (two excepted) of ecclesiastical law, either public or occult, simple and multiple, and of revalidating marriages invalid from such impediments without recourse to the Holy See; also of dispensing from mixed religion without recourse.

8. The Holy See, according to decree of Aug. 2, 1918, expects the Ordinaries to render an annual account of all the dispensations granted during war-time and to refund the fees for such dispensations granted by the Ordinaries.

9. We learn, through Rt. Rev. Bishop V. Wehrle, O.S.B., that the Roman Court is willing to acknowledge the right of Ordinaries to make use of can. 81, also with regard to matrimonial dispensations.

10. Note, finally, that can. 204, § 2, referred to in can. 1048, demands a grave and urgent cause, without which an Ordinary, being inferior to the Sovereign Pontiff, can neither validly nor licitly dispense. A grave cause is one which touches the intrinsic nature of the case, or, in other words, one which the law has acknowledged as canonical. An urgent reason is one which, because of time or circumstances, brooks no delay. For the validity of a dispensation a grave cause is sufficient. What are considered canonical reasons will be explained under can. 1054.

CUMULATIVE FACULTIES

CAN. 1049

§ 1. In matrimoniis sive contractis sive contrahendis, qui gaudet indulto generali dispensandi super certo quodam impedimento, potest, nisi in ipso indulto aliud expresse praescribatur, super eo dispensare etiamsi idem impedimentum multiplex sit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Qui habet indultum generale dispensandi super pluribus diversae speciei impedimentis, sive dirimentibus sive impedientibus, potest dispensare super iisdem impedimentis, etiam publicis, in uno eodemque casu occurrentibus.

This canon betrays a greater liberality on the part of the lawgiver than was usual with canonists, who based their views on former decisions. Two different cases are distinguished: dispensation from multiplex impediments of the same species but of different degrees, and dispensation from several impediments of the same degree but of a different species. The grant of these faculties must be made by a general indult, not merely by a rescript in a particular case. Such a general indult no doubt is that granted by the "Proxima sacra," April 25, 1918, and by the decree of Aug. 2, 1918. The canon makes the restriction: "nisi in ipso indulto aliud expresse praescribatur," i. e., unless the indult explicitly declares otherwise. Therefore the wording of each indult must be carefully examined. The two decrees just mentioned contain no such clause, and therefore our bishops certainly enjoy the powers granted in virtue of this canon as long as the general indult shall last.

§ 1 grants to those who are endowed with a general indult the faculty of dispensing from an impediment, although it be multiple, no matter whether there is question of a marriage already contracted or to be contracted. For instance, one is related to his partner in the second degree by a double stipes arising from the same common progenitors, or is related in the third degree and also in the second degree on account of common progenitors (can. 1076). In that case the degree is multiple, but the species is the same. This practice is also followed by the S. Poenitentiaria,[75] and therefore is to be applied to occult impediments.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 extends the cumulative faculties to impediments of a diverse species. He who has a general indult to dispense from several impediments of a diverse species, be they diriment or impedient, can dispense from these same impediments if several of them occur in the same case. This would happen if, e. g., disparity of cult concurred with consanguinity. There was no doubt that, if a public impediment, e. g., public honesty, coincided with an occult impediment, e. g., crime, the faculties could be used cumulatively.[76] But there was doubt as to cumulation when two impediments of a different subspecies, as is the case in crime with its three diverse distinctions, concurred. Besides it was denied that the faculties could be "bulked" if two different kinds, as exemplified in consanguinity and disparity of cult, would concur. Our text, however, admits cumulation in both these cases, even though two or more impediments concur in the same case. Furthermore the text permits cumulation in cases of two different impediments, one being prohibitive only whilst the other is diriment.[77] For instance, if Gemma, who has made the vow of celibacy, wishes to marry James, who is her second cousin, the Ordinary, or any one who has the faculty, may grant a dispensation. From the vow of non-nubendi or celibacy the Ordinary may dispense because that vow is not reserved,[78] and from the impediment of consanguinity by virtue of the decree or 75 S. O., June 19, 1861; June 15, 1875; April 2, 1892 (Coll., nn. 1218, 1445, 1789); S. Poenit., April 20, 1883 (Coll. cit., n. 1595).

76 S. C. P. F., March 31, 1872 (Coll., n. 1382).

77 S. O., April 2, 1892; Aug. 18, 1897 (Coll., nn. 1445, 1979); but n. II of the last-named decision would exclude cumulation in case one impediment was a diriment and the other a prohibitive one, if the latter was either that of mixed religion or arose out of the vow of perpetual chastity.

78 Can. 1309.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google general indult granted April 25, 1918. From both together in one and the same case he may dispense in virtue of our canon 1049.

CONCURRENCE OF DISPENSABLE AND INDISPENSABLE IMPEDIMENTS

CAN. 1050

Si quando cum impedimento seu impedimentis publicis super quibus ex indulto dispensare quis potest, concurrat aliud impedimentum super quo dispensare nequeat, pro omnibus Sedes Apostolica adiri debet; si tamen impedimentum seu impedimenta super quibus dispensare potest, comperiantur post impetratam a Sancta Sede dispensationem, suis facultatibus uti poterit.

This text also supposes a general indult or general faculties, not merely a particular indult for an individual case. However, it is safe to say that at present this canon does not affect our American Ordinaries, for it supposes Ordinaries who have limited faculties with regard to certain impediments iuris ecclesiastici, but can not dispense from other impediments of the same class. The meaning is that if an impediment from which they cannot dispense, concurs with another public impediment, or with several public impediments, from which they can dispense, they must petition the Apostolic See for all impediments. If, however, the impediment or impediments from which they can dispense are discovered only after petitioning the Holy See for a dispensation, they may make use of their faculties.

A letter of the S. C. P. F. to the delegate of Syria at Beirut [79] will illustrate our canon. According to the [79] S. C. P. F., May 10, 1887 (Coll., n. 1674).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

common doctrine of theologians it is necessary to explain all the impediments and circumstances that prohibit a marriage, otherwise the dispensation is invalid. This exposé must be made in one and the same petition, because the whole matter in all its bearings must be made known to the one who dispenses, and a greater number of impediments renders the dispensation more difficult. Therefore if a diriment impediment which requires recourse to the Holy See (or a Patriarch, if he has the faculty) concurs with another diriment or impedient impediment from which the bishop can dispense, both must be explained to the Holy See. If this is not done, the bishop can not validly dispense from the impediments from which he could otherwise dispense. The Code annuls a decision of the S. Poenitentiaria [80] which denied the validity of the dispensation granted by the bishop in a matter subject to him. Therefore the second clause of our canon says that in case of the discovery, after a dispensation has been granted by the Holy See, of an impediment from which the Ordinary can dispense, he may apply his faculty.

LEGITIMATION OF CHILDREN

CAN. 1051

Per dispensationem super impedimento dirimente concessam sive ex potestate ordinaria, sive ex potestate delegata per indultum generale, non vero per rescriptum in casibus particularibus, conceditur quoque eo ipso legitimatio prolis, si qua ex iis cum quibus dispensatur iam nata vel concepta fuerit, excepta tamen adulterina et sacrilega.

80 Ibid. (Coll., n. cit.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code distinguishes between a dispensation from a diriment impediment granted either in virtue of ordinary power (such a one is contained in canons 1043–1045) or of power delegated by general indult (such as our Ordinaries enjoy by the decree of April 25 and Aug. 2, 1918) and a dispensation granted by a rescript in a particular case. The former implicitly legitimates the offspring, whether born or only conceived, of the dispensed parents, provided it be not adulterine or sacrilegious.[81]

By a special favor of the Sovereign Pontiff, of course, sacrilegious and adulterous offspring can be legitimized. But a rescript as such issued for a particular case has not the effect of legitimating children of any kind of illegitimacy, unless this effect is explicitly mentioned in the rescript. As to the different kinds of illegitimacy, see can. 1114 f. An individual case is hardly imaginable as long as the general indult of April 25 and Aug. 2, 1918, lasts. But when it shall cease, the Ordinaries will have to apply for single cases and then our canon takes full effect. The S. Cong. Sacrament. has special formularies for legitimation, which are not identical with those required for dispensations, and therefore the executor of such a rescript should carefully study its wording.

ERROR IN DISPENSATION

CAN. 1052

Dispensatio ab impedimento consanguinitatis vel affinitatis, concessa in aliquo impedimenti gradu, valet, [81] S. O., Dec. 12, 1748, ad 1; July 8, 1903 (Coll., nn. 368, 2171). The clergyman who applies the dispensation may, according to previous decisions, declare the act of legitimation in the following words: "Eadem auctoritate prolem sive susceptam sive suscipiendam legitimam decerno." Cfr. Leitner, l. c., p. 455.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

licet in petitione vel in concessione error circa gradum irrepserit, dummodo gradus revera exsistens sit inferior, aut licet reticitum fuerit aliud impedimentum eiusdem speciei in aequali vel inferiore gradu.

A dispensation from the impediment of consanguinity or affinity, granted for a certain degree, is valid even though a mistake was made concerning the degree in the petition or concession, provided that the real degree be inferior to the one which was mentioned. It is valid also though an impediment has been concealed in the petition, provided it be of the same species and of an equal or inferior degree.

Two cases may illustrate this canon. James and Gemma are actually related in the third degree (i. e., second cousins), but the petition for a dispensation was worded in such a way that the second degree could be read into it (i. e., that they were first cousins). A dispensation was granted from the impediment of consanguinity in the second degree of the collateral line, whilst actually it was needed only for the third degree. The dispensation is valid.[82]

The second clause of our text concerns an impediment that is concealed, but of the same species as the one for which a dispensation is asked. For instance, James is related to Gemma not only in the third degree, but also, on account of common progenitors, in the second degree; therefore there are two impediments. Now if the latter was duly stated, but the former concealed or forgotten, the dispensation is valid. But if a dispensation would be asked and granted from affinity instead 82 The Const. of St. Pius V, "Sanctissimus," of Aug. 20, 1566 (Coll. P. F., Vol. I, p. 212) admitted the validity of a rescript even if the more distant degree was expressed in the petition, provided the real degree was the first.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of consanguinity, it would be invalid, and the so-called Perinde valere rescript would have to be requested, to make the previous rescript valid.[83] Such a procedure would also become necessary if instead of the direct line of affinity, the collateral line had been stated in the petition.

Attention may here be drawn to can. 47, which renders good service when a mistake has been made in spelling or writing the name of the petitioner. If the names are misspelled, the rescript is nevertheless valid so long as the parties can be properly identified.

When a rescript is asked from the S. C. of Sacraments, or from the Holy Office (in matters of disparity of cult and mixed religion), the petitioners must state their baptismal and family names as well as the name of the diocese to which they belong, their age and religion.

In cases of mixed religion the petition is made in the name of the Catholic party only.

It is advisable to use the typewriter for names. If the petition is directed to the S. Poenitentiaria, fictitious names are used, but the impediments must be clearly described as to species, number, and degree.

IMPLIED DISPENSATION FROM THE IMPEDIMENT OF CRIME

CAN. 1053

Data a Sancta Sede dispensatio super matrimonio rato et non consummato vel facta permissio transitus 83 The decree perinde valere, properly so-called, is a declaration issued in case the first rescript has already been expedited, and decrees it to be valid, just as if everything had been properly expressed (valere, perinde ac si ab initio omnia fuissent recte expressa). This rescript revalidates the favor granted and exerts its force from the date when the favor was first granted, provided no new defect or impediment has occurred in the meanwhile. Cfr. Putzer, Comment., ed. 4, pp. 25, 95.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ad alias nuptias ob praesumptam coniugis mortem, secumfert semper dispensationem ab impedimento proveniente ex adulterio cum promissione vel attentatione matrimonii, si qua opus sit, minime vero dispensationem ab impedimento de quo in can. 1075, nn. 2, 3.

A dispensation granted by the Holy See from marriage ratified and not consummated, or permission given to marry again on account of the presumed death of the other spouse, always includes a dispensation from the impediment arising from adultery with promise of, or attempt at, marriage (by civil act), if there be need of such, but not from the other two impediments of crime (can. 1075, n. 2, 3).

The occasion for this enactment, as may be inferred from a decree of the S. C. of Sacraments,[84] was this: Two parties had received a dispensation from a ratified marriage, the papers attesting their free status on account of the presumed death of one party, and were married in church after having contracted a civil marriage with another party with whom they had intercourse during the first marriage. Take a case that may occur at any time. James is supposed to have been killed in war, and his wife Gemma, tired of waiting until the way is fully cleared, obtains a document certifying to her free status, but omits to state in the petition that she committed adultery with Brutus whilst her husband was still alive and that she contracted a civil marriage with Brutus before permission to remarry had been issued. Now after the permission has been granted, they wish to get married in church. In such a case, the canon says, the permission granted includes a dispensation from the impediment of crime of the first kind. But if Gemma had 84 June 3, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 403).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

killed her husband or caused him to be killed, and committed adultery with Brutus besides; or if Brutus and Gemma had plotted together against the life of James and the plot resulted in his death, the permission granted would not include a dispensation from that twofold crime.

Here is another similar case. James and Gemma had their marriage declared null by the Holy See because of alleged impotency or fear. The marriage had been valid, though it was never consummated. Gemma, still being the wife of James, had intercourse with Brutus and promised him to marry him after the dissolution of her union with James. Now in the petition for solution this impediment of crime was not mentioned. Therefore, because of the impediment of crime, the marriage of Gemma and Brutus was invalid, even though it had been solemnized in church. But the Code says that dispensation from a ratified marriage also includes dispensation from the impediment of crime of the first species, and therefore the union of Gemma and Brutus is legal and valid.

REASONS FOR DISPENSATIONS

CAN. 1054

Dispensatio a minore impedimento concessa, nullo sive obreptionis sive subreptionis vitio irritatur, etsi unica causa finalis in precibus exposita falsa fuerit.

A dispensation granted from a minor impediment is not vitiated by the fact that a falsehood has been expressed or the truth suppressed in the petition, even though the sole final cause alleged be false.

Note the term "minor impediment." Major impediments are excluded from the benefit of this canon. The

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

subreptitious or obreptitious petition and consequent grant may not be extended to other rescripts,[85] as this favor is attached only to marriage, on account of its public character and the welfare of souls involved.

In order to understand the text more thoroughly it must be remembered that the Sovereign Pontiff alone (to the exclusion of Ordinaries who have faculties) can dispense without cause in matters entirely subject to his legislative and judiciary power. But as dispensations are considered "a sore on the law," it is to be presumed that the Apostolic See does not grant favors without a cause. Therefore, as an instruction of the S. C. P. F. says,[86] dispensations should not be granted without legitimate and weighty reasons, and the graver the impediment, the weightier the reason required for a dispensation. The Normae Peculiares for the S. C. of Sacraments[87] declare that all dispensations from minor impediments are granted for reasonable motives approved by the Holy See.

A motive may be either the final one, which alone determines and moves the grantor to grant the favor; or it may be an impelling cause, i. e., one that helps to move the grantor. One final cause (causa motiva) is sufficient for obtaining a dispensation. But sometimes one impelling cause (causa impulsiva) is insufficient, whereas several of the same kind amount to a final cause. Hence it is that different reasons for granting dispensations have been "canonized" or formally approved by the Roman Court, and the above mentioned instruction of the S. C. P. F. exhorts petitioners to mention several reasons, if possible. With regard to minor impediments any reason, if accepted, is sufficient and the dispensation is valid, even though the final cause alleged in the pe-

85 Cfr. can. 42.
86 May 9, 1877 (Coll., n. 1470).
87 A. Ap. S., I, 92 (P. II, c. VII, art. 3, n. 21).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tition be false. For the S. C. of Sacraments grants these dispensations "ex motu proprio et ex certa scientia," which clause revalidates all subreptitiously or obreptitiously obtained rescripts.

The reasons given in the instruction of S. C. P. F. are the following:

(1) Angustia loci or smallness of the place or town (not parish).[88] This reason can be alleged by a girl living in a place with less than 1500 inhabitants, because in such a small place it is difficult for a girl — not a widow — to find a husband of equal social standing.

(2) Aetas feminae superadulta, or relatively advanced age of the girl, if she is more than twenty-four years old.

(3) Deficientia aut incompetentia dotis, if a woman has no dowry or property, and a relative would marry or endow her under certain conditions.

(4) Lites super successione bonorum iam exortae vel earundem grave aut imminens periculum, which would be the case if the quarrel could be settled by a marriage between relatives or if the husband in spe were the only man who could settle a lawsuit concerning property or inheritance.

(5) Paupertas viduae, poverty in the case of a widow, especially if she has many children.

(6) Bonum pacis, if it is possible by a marriage to settle family or feudal quarrels and remove long-standing enmities.

(7) Nimia suspecta periculosa familiaritas, too long

88 S. C. C., Dec. 16, 1876 (Coll. P. F., n. 1463): "angustiam loci non esse desumendam a numero focorum [the reading in the text: locorum is a manifest mistake] cuiusque parochiae, sed a numero focorum cuiusque loci vel etiam plurium locorum, si non distent ad invicem ultra milliare." A focus or foculare signifies a home or hearth or family; a small place is one not having more than three hundred families, and taking a family to consist of five members, we have the number 1500 given above.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google courtship and great intimacy, which might cause suspicion or scandal.

(8) Copula cum consanguinea, praegnantia ideoque legitimatio prolis, which requires marriage in order that the damage be repaired and disgrace averted.

(9) Infamia mulieris, ill fame of the woman, caused by the fact mentioned under n. 7, even though she be innocent.

(10) Revalidatio matrimonii, if a marriage has been contracted in the prescribed form and in good faith.

(11) Periculum matrimonii mixti vel coram acatholico ministro, danger of a mixed marriage, which is present especially in small congregations and in communities with a preponderantly non-Catholic population.

(12) Periculum incestuosi concubinatus, when near relatives live under the same roof and in imminent danger of concubinage.

(13) Periculum matrimonii civilis, danger of a civil marriage if a dispensation be denied.

(14) Remotio gravium scandalorum et cessatio publici concubinatus; serious scandal and cessation of public concubinage are generally connected, and here supposed to be existing.

(15) Excellentia meritorum, if one has deserved well of the Catholic faith by combating its enemies in word or writing, or by generosity, or conspicuous learning and virtue.

These are the usual grounds (though not all) upon which a dispensation is granted. And the aforesaid instruction admonishes those who grant dispensations by delegated power to proceed properly and in a becoming manner.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXECUTION OF DISPENSATIONS

CAN. 1055

Dispensationes super publicis impedimentis Ordinario oratorum commissas, exsequatur Ordinarius qui litteras testimoniales dedit vel preces transmisit ad Sedem Apostolicam, etiamsi sponsi, quo tempore executioni danda est dispensatio, relicto illius dioecesis domicilio aut quasi-domicilio, in aliam dioecesim discesserint non amplius reversuri, monito tamen Ordinario loci in quo matrimonium contrahere cupiunt.

The text refers only to public impediments, from which a dispensation was indeed granted by the Holy See, but by rescript forwarded to the Ordinary. For it is the latter who is generally — exceptions are not frequent, though possible — set up as executor. As such the Ordinary must, as stated elsewhere,[89] examine the rescript closely, to see whether it is genuine and whether he is an executor necessarius or voluntarius. But it is safe to say, in view of can. 1054, that he need not examine the existence of the reasons alleged, if dispensations from minor impediments are the object of the rescript. There is only one reason that might justify the executor in withholding execution, viz., unworthiness of the petitioner, and in that case the Holy See must be immediately informed.[90] If a dispensation from a major impediment was granted by the Holy See with clausulae like this: "Si preces veritate nitantur," or, "si constiterit," or "constito," then the Ordinary is an executor voluntarius or mixtus, who must verify the reasons before he "fulminates" the dispensation. If absolution from censures is 89 Cfr. Vol. I of this Commentary, p. 141.

90 Ibid., p. 143.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

required, he has to impart it, either personally, or through the pastor or confessor.[91]

Our text supposes that a valid and properly drawn up rescript has been forwarded to the Ordinary, who sent either a recommendation (litteras testimoniales) or a petition for it to the S. C. of Sacraments. A recommendation may be sent if the Ordinary doubts his own competency,[92] and therefore does not care to send a petition himself, but lets the petitioners do so. As a general rule, if the petitioners are his subjects by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile, the Ordinary forwards the petition and in that case is called Ordinarius oratorum and receives the dispensation. He may execute the dispensation even though the petitioners (sponsi) have given up their domicile or quasi-domicile in his diocese at the time the dispensation is to be used, and have gone to another diocese with the intention of not returning.

The Ordinary who executes the rescript should inform the Ordinary in whose diocese the wedding takes place.[93] Thus if James and Gemma, dwelling in the diocese of St. Joseph, were granted a dispensation by the Holy See, and the rescript was sent to the Ordinary of that diocese, supposing the parties have meanwhile removed to Springfield, Mo., in the diocese of Kansas City, the bishop of St. Joseph or his vicar-general may send the rescript to the Ordinary of Kansas City with the words: "As executor of the rescript enclosed we hereby execute the dispensation granted by the Holy See," followed by the 91 Cfr. Putzer, l. c., p. 106 f.

92 A doubt might arise from uncertainty whether or not the petitioners belong to the diocese; this doubt was removed by the S. O., July 6, 1896 (Coll., n. 1945) by abolishing the former condition: intra fines dioecesis.

93 The rescript is generally addressed to the Ordinarius, for instance, St. Josephi; if it is addressed to the Episcopus, the bishop and not the Vicar-general must attend to the matter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

name of the executor. The fee which is usually fixed and written on the back [94] of the rescript, belongs to the executor, in our case the Ordinary of St. Joseph.

CHARGES FOR DISPENSATIONS BY RESCRIPT

CAN. 1056

Excepta modica aliqua praestatione ex titulo expensarum cancellariae in dispensationibus pro non pauperibus, locorum Ordinarii eorumve officiales, reprobata quavis contraria consuetudine, nequeunt, occasione concessae dispensationis, emolumentum ullum exigere, nisi haec facultas a Sancta Sede expresse eis data fuerit; et si exegerint, tenentur ad restitutionem.

It is not necessary to defend the right of the Apostolic See to a fair remuneration for the work involved in issuing papal documents. Any one who has a little business capacity will see that a court like the Roman needs a large and expensive machinery. Many buildings and persons compose the Apostolic Chancery, and the expenses of conducting it run high, especially at the present time when the cost of living for the officials is steadily increasing. It is not true, as we sometimes hear, that there are "too many lazy employees." The S. C. of the Sacraments, the one we are dealing with here, is not only overburdened with work, but short of help. We will add that the taxes demanded do not involve simony, but their payment is merely an act of deference and gratitude to the Apostolic See in recognition of the favor granted, and an act of justice towards those who are occupied with 94 On the back there are generally three kinds of fees to be noticed in the following order:

Taxa, Libelli (in Italian lire; 1 lira = about 18 cents).
Executoria, Libelli (for the executor of the rescript).
Agenzia, Libelli (for the Agent in Rome).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the tedious labor necessary for the conduct of the chancery. Besides it must be remembered that dispensations are "a sore on the law," which must be repaired, and marriages with impediments must be prevented whenever possible.

Here it will not be amiss to state some rules which are in force at the Roman Court with regard to fees or taxes. The Normae Communes[95] published in connection with the Constitution "Sapienti consilio" of Pius X (1908), lay down the following rules:

(1) For matrimonial dispensations the rules prevailing in the Apostolic Dataria, the S. Poenitentiaria, and the S. C. Concilii are still in force. Their scale of taxation is approximately the following. Taking the annual surplus of income over necessary expense as a standard, those are really poor whose net annual profit after all expenses are counted off amounts to about $25. Those whose annual net surplus amounts to about $80, are quasi-poor. All others are not to be regarded as poor. The really poor pay no componenda[96] or tax, but only a moderate fee besides the postage. The quasi-poor pay $2 in addition to the fee imposed on the really poor. All others must pay a certain percentage, reckoned in proportion to the capital and their net yearly revenue. For instance, one who has an income of $10,000, of which $400 are reckoned as net annual profit, pays a certain per cent of that profit, according to the importance of

95 Cfr. A. Ap. S., I, 55 f.

96 Cfr. Gasparri, De Mat., n. 315; Leitner, l. c., p. 422 f. A componenda, also called compositio, is a fine to be paid for dispensations from consanguinity and affinity and is expended for works of charity (in pias causas). A taxa or tax, properly so called, is a fee for defraying the expenses of the Roman congregations and tribunals (cf. Feije, l. c., n. 691 f.). When I received my American passport, I had to pay $1 to the American Consul General at Zurich in Switzerland, and an additional $1 for the signature of each consul of the different countries through which I had to travel.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the impediment and the character of the reasons advanced. We mention this rule here to give a clue to Ordinaries who try to be conscientious in such matters.

(2) The Ordinary should secretly ask the pastor concerning the financial status of the petitioners in order to decide whether they deserve a reduction of the tax, i. e., whether they are really or quasi-poor. If any of the parties concerned, or the pastor, or the Ordinary grievously offend against this rule, they are obliged to make restitution.

(3) If the petitioners maliciously refuse to pay the tax or commit fraud, and the dispensation is necessary for removing scandal or sin, the Ordinaries must mention this circumstance in the petition, and when they communicate the dispensation, admonish the parties of their duty towards the Apostolic Chancery. However, neither fraud nor error concerning the financial condition of the parties concerned in any way affects the validity of the rescript.

We deemed it necessary to set forth these facts here, though they do not bear directly on can. 1056, which refers to the charges made by the diocesan chancery. With the exception of a moderate fee for the expenses of the chancery, it says, the local Ordinaries or their officials are not allowed to charge anything for dispensations, unless the Holy See has expressly granted them permission to make a charge. Every contrary custom is reprobated. If a charge is made without permission, the officials are bound to restitution.

The Council of Trent[97] and the Roman Congregations[98] had strictly forbidden Ordinaries to make any 97 Sess. 24, c. 5, De ref. mat.

98 Thus the S. O., Jan. 12, 1769 (n. 472, II, 3): "ut eaedem dispensationes gratis omnino et absque ulla prorsus mercede impertiantur"); S. C. C., July 3, 1634; S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1716 (Coll., n. 2188).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

charge, especially in the shape of a fine, for dispensations granted in virtue of faculties received from the Holy See. Even the bishops of Ireland, who received but a bare pittance from their clergy, were not permitted to exact any fees for dispensations.[99] Only the bishop of Quebec for special reasons obtained the privilege of demanding a moderate tax from rich as well as poor, according to their means, but the money had to be used for pious purposes.[1] Otherwise demanding a fee for dispensations granted in virtue of Apostolic faculties was strictly forbidden, even under pain of nullity of the dispensation.[2] However, this must not be understood literally. When a rescript bears on its back the remark: taxa — so much; executoria — so much; agenzia — so much, the resp. Ordinary is allowed to demand the sum-total of these fees from the parties concerned. Besides, the chancellor is entitled to demand a moderate fee for chancery expenses and postage.

A difficulty arises concerning the faculties granted to our Ordinaries by the decrees of April 25 and Aug. 2, 1918. The latter prescribes, as stated under can. 1048, that Ordinaries have to render an account of the dispensations granted and, on the same occasion, pay the amount due to the Holy See. Here Ordinaries are plainly allowed to collect the usual fee demanded by the Holy See, because they are commanded to forward the money to Rome; for if they were not permitted to collect the tax usually imposed by the Roman Court, they would have to pay the iura demanded by the Holy See out of their own pockets, which cannot be the intention of Rome.

99 S. C. C., l. c.; S. C. P. F., Feb. 12, 1821 (Coll., n. 755).

1 S. C. P. F., July 4, 1793 (Coll., n. 616).

2 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to restitution, note that the text says that it becomes obligatory only if the Ordinaries have exacted (exegerint [3]) money. A voluntary contribution does not oblige to restitution.

MENTION OF DELEGATION WHEN DISPENSING

CAN. 1057

Qui ex potestate a Sede Apostolica delegata dispensationem concedunt, in eadem expressam pontificii indulti mentionem faciant.

Those who grant dispensations in virtue of delegated power from the Apostolic See, shall mention the papal indult when using it.

This text cannot be construed as if the mention of delegation affected the validity of a dispensation. In matter of fact it affects only the licitness of the same;[4] otherwise the lawgiver would have appended an invalidating clause. But it must be expressed in the use of both a general and a particular indult, and all the clausulae must be observed as far as circumstances permit.[5]

3 Bened. XIV, "Ad tuas," Aug. 8, 1748, demanded the insertion of this clause in every rescript under penalty of nullity of the dispensation. This shows how carefully even the appearance of simony must be avoided.

4 The Holy Office (June 15, 1875; Coll., n. 1444) has limited the import of this clause to licitness.

5 Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

PROHIBITIVE IMPEDIMENTS

The Code mentions only three prohibitive impediments: vow, legal adoption, and mixed religion. However, it enumerates five different vows, and if these are taken as specifically distinct, there are seven prohibitive impediments, which we shall now proceed to explain.

THE IMPEDIMENT OF VOW

CAN. 1058

§ 1. Matrimonium impedit votum simplex virginitatis, castitatis perfectae, non nubendi, suscipiendi ordines sacros et amplectendi statum religiosum.

§ 2. Nullum votum simplex irritat matrimonium, nisi irritatio speciali Sedis Apostolicae praescripto pro aliquibus statuta fuerit.

§ 1. Marriage is rendered illicit by the simple vow not to marry, the vow of virginity and perfect chastity, the vow to receive sacred orders or to embrace the religious state.

§ 2. No simple vow invalidates a marriage unless the Apostolic See has made a special enactment to that effect.

The final clause is plainly intended to safeguard the constitutions of the Society of Jesus, for whom Gregory XIII, in his constitution "Ascendente Domino," May 25, 1584, declared that the simple vows taken by the scho-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

lastics after two years' novitiate have the same invalidating effect as if they were solemn.[1]

The Code distinguishes five different vows. But it would be difficult to establish a real distinction between the vow of virginity and the vow of perfect chastity. The object of the vow of virginity is the integrity of the body, and though it may be taken for the specific purpose of obtaining the aureole promised to virgins,[2] bodily integrity without perfect chastity is not easily conceivable. We are aware that internal acts are distinct from external acts and that while merely internal acts against chastity may not destroy the integrity of the body, perfect chastity includes both internal and external acts and therefore also the vow of virginity. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Decretals never expressly mention the vow of virginity, but only the simple vow of chastity or not marrying. We would not, however, deny that the vow of chastity may be taken after virginity has been lost. For instance, a person once married may make the vow of chastity; but whether it may really be called perfect chastity, if the marriage rights had been made use of, is another question. Canonists generally allege only four species to the exclusion of the vow of virginity. In our commentary we shall include the vow of virginity in that of perfect chastity or celibacy.[3]

1. The Simple Vow of Perfect Chastity, whether absolute or conditional, prohibits marriage, because marriage is opposed to the object of perfect chastity. On the other hand, a promise made to God to observe chastity requires

1 Simple religious vows had been unheard of up to that time, and in order to protect the Society of Jesus against attacks the Pope issued this Constitution.

2 Cfr. Apoc. 14, 4; Putzer, Comment., p. 161.

3 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 564, p. 427, justly observes that the distinction between the vow of celibacy and that of virginity has little practical value and the latter differs from the former only in regard to the first opus carnale.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that all danger and proximate occasion of breaking the vow be removed. Now marriage would enhance the danger and render either the vow or the marriage rights illusory. Therefore the vow of perfect chastity and marriage exclude each other. However, as the Church accepts this vow only as simple, not irrevocable, which would imply full surrender of one's self, it does not render marriage invalid.[4]

2. The Vow of Celibacy is diametrically, though only contradictorily, opposed to marriage and renders the latter illicit; for although this vow is opposed to marriage, it does not imply that the right to one's body has been completely given up; it has merely been suspended.

3. The Vow of Receiving Major Orders, by a positive law of the Church,[5] renders marriage illicit because by it one would take upon himself a state of life which, according to the same law, is incompatible with the state of higher orders, requiring celibacy.

4. The same must be said concerning the Vow of embracing the Religious State, although this state not only by positive but also by natural law is incompatible with marriage. By religious state must be understood, according to our Code, every religious institute with solemn or simple, temporary or perpetual vows, or, in other words, every organization whose members pronounce the three religious vows and live a common life.

The effect of these vows is, therefore, generally speaking, to render marriage grievously illicit. In particular these differences between the single vows may be noticed:

(1) The vow of perfect chastity, if not dispensed from, retains its force even in the married state, as far as compatible with the rights of the other party.[6] Hence

4 Sanchez, l. c., l. VIII, disp. 11, n. 4; Feije, l. c., n. 559, p. 436; Wernz, l. c. IV, Vol. II, n. 566.

5 Cc. 1, 3, X, IV, 6.

6 One who, knowing of the vow, would marry such a person, would

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a person bound by the vow of chastity is not allowed to demand the debitum coniugale, though he may render it at the demand of his partner. Yet no obligation attaches to the vow which would compel the person bound by it to enter a religious order, if possible, for an obligation cannot be stretched further than the intention of him who incurs it. And the intention of embracing the religious life is not included in the vow of chastity.[7] Besides, unless the vow of chastity is dispensed from, or was conditional, or made for a limited time only, it is not extinguished by an illicit marriage and consequently revives after the dissolution of the marriage tie.

(2) The vow of celibacy is broken by the act of contracting marriage, and therefore we cannot understand the opinion of some authors[8] who would prohibit one bound by this vow from contracting a second marriage, except as far as the moral obligation is concerned. As to the debitum coniugale, this may be not only rendered, but also demanded, because the object of the vow was marriage, and nothing else.

(3) The vow of receiving sacred orders as well as that of embracing the religious life prohibits the consummation of marriage, but after consummation the party bound by the vow is allowed both to render and to demand the debitum. As long as the marriage is not consummated the obligation remains, and it revives when the party is freed from the marriage obligation.[9] These effects show how anomalous is the state of marriage when no dispensation has been obtained from this vow.

commit a grievous sin. Sanchez, l. c., l. VII, disp. 11, n. 11.

7 Sanchez, l. c., l. IX, disp. 34, n. 3; Feije, l. c., n. 559.

8 Cfr. Feije, l. c., n. 562; Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 566.

9 Feije, l. c., n. 560 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

DISPENSATION FROM VOWS

First of all it should be noted that of these five vows only two are reserved to the Apostolic See, viz., the vow of perfect and perpetual chastity and the vow of embracing the religious life with solemn vows, provided these vows were made absolutely and after the 18th year of age had been completed.[10] A vow is absolute if it has attached to it no condition as to time or circumstances or the matter itself. When a condition is attached, the vow is conditional. Thus it would be a conditional vow were one to promise: "I will enter such and such an order, provided it has a monastery in my country, or if I am found fit for it, and none other." If he is subsequently received into that order, and dismissed from it, the conditional vow is fulfilled, and no dispensation is needed to enable him to marry. If a secular Tertiary of the Franciscan Order would imagine that his profession involved perfect and perpetual chastity, the vow would be incomplete and no dispensation would be required.[11] For the two vows reserved to the Holy See special faculties are needed. If they are private and secret, they fall under the jurisdiction of the S. Poenitentiaria; as the faculties granted for such cases are not revoked by the decree of April 25, 1918, Ordinaries may continue to use and subdelegate them to their clergy. The confessor in the act of sacramental confession, or the pastor outside the confessional but for the internal forum only, (we suppose the impediment to be occult, as it generally is) must impose other good works and monthly confession, for there is question here rather of a commutation than of a pure dispensation.[12] The works of penance enjoined should be adapted to the condition of the party as well as pro-

10 Can. 1309.
11 Cfr. Leitner, l. c., p. 344.
12 Putzer, l. c., p. 162 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

portionate to the reasons for which the dispensation is granted. These reasons may arise from the imperfect act, the vow itself (rashness, ignorance, mental depression), moral and physical weakness, and family circumstances.[13] Let it be added, however, that a dispensation for one marriage does not imply a dispensation for several marriages; a new dispensation is required for each. A dispensation from the vow of entering a religious order or congregation, if given for the sole purpose of enabling the subject to remain in the world, does not include permission to contract marriage.[14] The vows of celibacy and virginity and that of receiving holy orders are not reserved, and may therefore be dispensed from by the Ordinary in virtue of his ordinary power, which he may communicate to others. If a dispensation is granted, the obligation ceases entirely and forever, and hence it may be supposed to be given for more than one marriage.

LEGAL ADOPTION

CAN. 1059

In iis regionibus ubi lege civili legalis cognatio, ex adoptione orta, nuptias reddit illicitas, iure quoque canonico matrimonium illicitum est.

The Code twice mentions adoption as an impediment to marriage; once in this canon, and again in can. 1080, thus introducing a distinction between legal adoption simply as an impedient and as an invalidating impediment. Our can. 1059 states that in countries where relationship aris-

13 We hold with Sanchez (l. c., l. VII, disp. 11, n. 12) that if a penitent would ask his pastor or confessor whether a marriage contracted under such a vow is valid, the latter would be entitled and obliged to answer in the affirmative, for this is the teaching of the Church and requires no mental restriction.

14 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 570 f.; p. 432.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing from legal adoption is a prohibitive impediment by civil law, it is so also by Canon Law. This is an instance of what is called "canonization" of a civil law by the Church. For further explanation we refer the reader to can. 1080, which treats legal adoption as a diriment impediment.

MIXED MARRIAGES

The distinction between the impediments of disparity of worship and mixed religion was hardly known until Huguccio, in his gloss to the Decree of Gratian,[15] and especially St. Thomas,[16] commenced to distinguish between the two and assigned a prohibitive character to the latter. The so-called Reformation of the XVIth century led to a vast increase in the number of "mixed" marriages, though the Church always resisted such unions, as many papal constitutions and decisions of the Roman Court prove.[17]

MIXED RELIGION

CAN. 1060

Severissime Ecclesia ubique prohibet ne matrimonium ineatur inter duas personas baptizatas, quarum altera sit catholica, altera vero sectae haereticae seu schismaticae adscripta; quod si adsit perversionis periculum coniugis catholici et prolis, coniugium etiam lege divina vetatur.

The Church most severely forbids everywhere marriages between two baptized persons, one of whom is a Catholic and the other a member of a heretical or schis-

15 Ad c. 16, C. 28, q. 1, s. v. haereticis.

16 Lib. IV, Dist. 39, q. 1, art. 1, ad 5.

17 See the quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition of the Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

matic sect; if there is danger of perversion for the Catholic party or the offspring, such a union is forbidden also by divine law.

Here we have a concise statement of the reasons why the Church forbids mixed marriages.

(1) These reasons are found in a well-known instruction of Cardinal Antonelli, published in 1858, and in an instruction issued to the Oriental bishops by the Holy Office in 1888.[18] They are the following:

(a) The detestable communion in sacred matters (flagitiosa in divinis communio), which results in such cases from the sacramental character of marriage and which is strictly forbidden;

(b) The danger of perversion to the Catholic party arising from indifference in religious matters;

(c) The irreligious or at least careless education of children brought up in the atmosphere of religious indifference.

Since the Church claims to be the true Church of Christ, and since the Catholic faith is divine, any wilful and unwarranted exposure of it to the danger of loss is forbidden by divine and, we may add, also by the natural law. For the natural law commands us to strive for our last end by employing means proportionate to it. In the supernatural order this end can be attained only by divine faith. Hence a natural and a supernatural premise compel the conclusion that to endanger the bulwark of salvation needlessly is contrary to divine and to the natural law.[19] It is not necessary to prove the evil effects of indiscriminately contracted mixed marriages by statistics. The Code admits that they are real.

18 Sec. Status, Nov., 1858; S. O., Dec. 12, 1888 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1169, 1696); Leo XIII "Arcanum," Feb. 10, 1880.

19 Sec. Status, March 27, 1830 (Coll. P. F., Vol. I, p. 474).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(2) The impediment of mixed religion is merely prohibitive and was established by ecclesiastical law. But there is no contradiction between the general prohibition which arises from the natural and from divine law on the one hand, and the positive prohibition of the Church on the other. For the general obligation of avoiding all danger to the faith and to salvation is not neutralized by the positive sanction of the Church, but this sanction is merely a juridical formulation of the divine law. The Church in thus formulating that law did not mean to dispense from the precautions required by the natural and by divine law. Hence the positive law only is dispensed from, whilst the obligations attendant upon the natural and divine law remain.[20] We might therefore call the dispensation from this impediment a conditional one, i. e., dependent upon the fulfillment of the required conditions. But we must not be understood as saying that a dispensation becomes valid only when the conditions are fulfilled. No, the dispensation is valid from the date when it is granted, but the obligation of complying with the conditions always remains, and no human power can remove it. From this again it appears how seriously the Church regards mixed marriages.

(3) The extent of this impediment is determined by the difference of religion, which regards Christian denominations only. The foundation is Baptism, presumed to be valid. And herein lies the specific distinction between 20 Wernz (l. c., IV, Vol. II, n. 583, p. 441) appropriately says: "Quodsi prohibitio legis divinae in casu particulari non est sublata, a nullo potestate humana licita et valida dispensatio super impedimento mixtae religionis, quatenus nititur iure divino, concedi potest. At si prohibitio legis divinae in casibus particularibus cessavit, ii scriptores modum excesserunt, qui vel ipsi Romano pontifici a manente lege ecclesiastica contra mixta matrimonia absolute et universaliter lata potestatem dispensandi negarunt. Eo enim in casu manet sola lex ecclesiastica, super qua ex iusta causa certe licite et valide ab Ecclesia dispensari potest."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this impediment and that of disparity of worship. Baptism also furnishes the reason why these two impediments are classified differently, that of mixed religion belonging to the forbidding, whereas disparity of cult is numbered among the diriment impediments. Since by baptism one radically becomes a subject of the Church,[21] baptized non-Catholics are not outside her pale. Furthermore, as Christian denominations are now scattered broadcast everywhere, it would be a difficult matter to set up a diriment impediment, or as it were, an insurmountable barrier between Catholics and Protestants.[22] But a Catholic may not on that account licitly marry a member of a heretical or schismatic sect.

Who are heretics? A declaration of the Holy Office[23] with regard to mixed marriages in Holland may help us to understand the term better. It says that all those are called heretics who, though baptized by Catholics, were educated in heresy before they were seven years of age; also all those educated by heretics, although not thoroughly imbued with heretical doctrines; likewise those who have fallen into the hands of heretics and adhere to their tenets; those who have apostatized from the Catholic faith and joined a heretical sect; and those born of and baptized by heretics who have grown up without making formal profession of heresy or without any religion at all. However it must not be overlooked that our text says: "sectae haereticae adscripta," i. e., the non-Catholic party must be a member of a heretical sect, or at least must have adhered to a sect some time previously to the marriage. The Holy Office has expressly declared that those can not be regarded as heretics who have rejected the Catholic 21 Trid., sess. 7, can. 7, de bapt.

22 Bened. XIV, "Matrimonia." Nov. 4, 1741; S. O., Dec. 12, 1888 (Coll. P. F., n. 1696 ad 1).

23 S. O., April 6, 1859 (Coll., n. 1174).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google faith but have not joined a false religion or heretical sect,[24] and that Freemasons who belong to a condemned sect are not to be classified as heretics.

Schismatics are all those who have separated themselves from the unity of the Church and are certainly to be considered heretics.[25] Pure schism now-a-days is almost impossible. The extant decisions on that point have reference to Oriental schismatics, but they apply to all who have heretical tendencies, whoever they may be.[26]

What about doubtful Baptism? The Holy Office has declared more than once that a doubtful Baptism must be considered valid with regard to marriage. The rules to be followed in such cases are the following:

(a) If the ritual of the heretical sect prescribes Baptism, but without the required matter and form, each single case must be treated on its own merits.

(b) If the resp. sect baptizes validly, according to its ritual, the Baptism is to be considered valid. If there is room for doubt, even in the first mentioned case, the Baptism must be regarded as valid in reference to marriage.

(c) If it is evident from actual custom that Baptism in a sect is invalid, then marriage, too, is invalid if contracted between one thus invalidly baptized and a Catholic, because of the impediment of disparity of cult.[27]

24 S. O., Jan. 30, 1867 (Coll., n. 1300).

25 Cfr. can. 1325, § 2: One who refuses to be subject to the Roman Pontiff or to communicate with the members of the Church subject to him, is a schismatic. A stubborn refusal of obedience to the Roman Pontiff may practically coexist with the Catholic faith, but it is next to impossible to imagine a theoretical schismatic without a taint of heresy.

26 S. O., Jan. 3, 1871; Dec. 22, 1888; S. C. P. F., Feb. 18, 1783 (Coll., nn. 1362, 1696, 562).

27 S. O., Nov. 17, 1830; Sept. 9, 1868 (Coll., nn. 821, 1334): "generatim loquendo, ut christiani habendi sunt ii de quibus dubitatur an valide baptizati fuerint." S. O., Dec., 1872 (Coll., n. 1392): "Utrum baptismus dubius censendus sit validus in ordine ad matrimonium etiam in eo sensu, quod invalidum sit matrimonium inter haereticum dubie baptizatum et infidelem propter impedimentum dis-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Of special interest for our country is the answer of the Holy Office to the Bishop of Savannah.* The first point is nothing else but a reaffirmation of the principle stated above, namely, that the presumption is in favor of the validity of Baptism with regard to marriage. But the bishop wished to know further when the presumption of validity might be duly applied. The answer was: (α) If the parents belong to a sect which rejects Baptism, the latter is not to be presumed; (β) The same holds good if the sect rejects infant Baptism (as, e. g., the Baptists do). (γ) Also if the parents belong to no sect whatever, but are absolutely indifferent in religious matters. (δ) If, on the other hand, the parents belong to a sect that requires Baptism and generally administers it, and if these parents were zealous in their religion, Baptism may be presumed. (ε) If only one of the parents belongs to a sect that prescribes and administers Baptism, and this one, whether father or mother, was the chief educator of the party in question, Baptism is to be presumed, provided the other parent, who was less zealous in religious observance, did not positively object. (ζ) If no presumption is admissible, the case must be examined for itself and, if the doubt remains, reported to the Holy See.

After having stated the reasons for the Church's severe prohibition of mixed marriages and explained the nature and extent of the impediment, the Code lays down the conditions under which such marriages may be permitted.

paritatis cultus." S. C. respondit: "Affirmative." S. O., July 14, 1880 (Coll., n. 1536):

1. Matrimonium dubie baptizati cum non baptizata estne validum?

2. Matrimonium duorum dubie baptizatorum estne validum etiamsi sint consanguinei, affines, etc.

R. ad 1. Matrimonium esse habendum uti invalidum ob impedimentum cultus disparitatis.

Ad 2. Matrimonium habendum esse ut invalidum ob impedimentum consanguinitatis vel affinitatis.

* S. O., Aug. 1, 1883 (Coll., n. 1605).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH MIXED MARRIAGES MAY BE PERMITTED

CAN. 1061

§ 1. Ecclesia super impedimento mixtae religionis non dispensat, nisi:

1.° Urgeant iustae ac graves causae;

2.° Cautionem praestiterit coniux acatholicus de amovendo a coniuge catholico perversionis periculo, et uterque coniux de universa prole catholice tantum baptizanda et educanda;

3.° Moralis habeatur certitudo de cautionum implemento.

§ 2. Cautiones regulariter in scriptis exigantur.

§ 1. The Church does not dispense from the impediment of mixed religion, unless:

1.° There be just and weighty reasons;

2.° The non-Catholic party guarantees to remove the danger of perversion from the Catholic party, and both promise to baptize and educate all their children in the Catholic faith;

3.° There be a moral certainty that the promises will be kept.

§ 2. The promises must, as a rule, be demanded in writing.

Concerning the reasons we refer to can. 1054. Any of the reasons there stated will suffice for obtaining a dispensation. Besides, the following may be mentioned as admissible: if the projected marriage be the only means by which the Catholic education of children born of a former marriage can be safeguarded; danger of civil marriage or complete apostasy from the faith; if grievous scandal can only be repaired by a mixed marriage.[28]

[28] Leitner, l. c., p. 350.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to the guarantees, they have always been insisted upon and, as was said above, a dispensation from them is impossible, because it would violate the natural and divine law.[29]

It may surprise the reader that two promises are now considered as sufficient — removal of the danger of perversion, and the Catholic education of the children. This provision marks a stage in the advance of juridical precision. For these two guarantees almost entirely depend on human factors and may be effected by legal means, unless the civil law offers an obstacle, as is the case in some European countries where boys must follow the religion of the father, and girls that of the mother. This is a foolish and unjust law, which, we are glad to say, has no counterpart in America.[30] The two conditions mentioned are strictly juridico-canonical, whereas the others still mentioned in the litterae reversales[31] have been relegated to a special canon.

Concerning the manner of demanding these guarantees, the Code says that moral certainty must be obtained that they will be complied with, and hence they should, as a rule, be given in writing. Formerly the parties had to go before the officials of the diocesan court or before the pastor and swear and subscribe to the formula; the pastor then had to forward the papers to the chancery office.[32] Now moral certainty as to the fulfillment of the promises is considered sufficient, and this may be based upon the known character of the parties. But if advisable, the bishop or pastor may demand an oath of 29 S. O., June 3, 1871 ad 6; Dec. 10, 1902 (Coll., nn. 1362, 2155).

30 Switzerland had a law to this effect in 1863, of which the Holy Office (Jan. 21, 1863, Coll., n. 1263) complained; Prussia maintained the same attitude, and Baden also.

31 Hence these might be remodelled.

32 S. O., June 6, 1879 (Coll., n. 1521).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

them.[33] Broadly speaking, the promises must be made in the form of a contract or agreement which offers a moral guarantee that its stipulations will be fulfilled.[34] We may add that these promises must be demanded also when there is danger of death.[35]

CONVERSION OF THE NON-CATHOLIC PARTY

CAN. 1062

Coniux catholicus obligatione tenetur conversionem coniugis acatholici prudenter curandi.

The Catholic consort is bound prudently to procure the conversion of the non-Catholic party.

This obligation is based upon charity. It should be fulfilled prudently, says the Code; and hence not by force or threats. Faith is a free gift of God.

NON-CATHOLIC MINISTERS EXCLUDED

CAN. 1063

§ 1. Etsi ab Ecclesia obtenta sit dispensatio super impedimento mixtae religionis, coniuges nequeunt, vel ante vel post matrimonium coram Ecclesia initum, adire quoque, sive per se sive per procuratorem, ministrum acatholicum uti sacris addictum, ad matrimonialem consensum praestandum vel renovandum.

§ 2. Si parochus certe noverit sponsos hanc legem violaturos esse vel iam violasse, eorum matrimonio ne assistat, nisi ex gravissimis causis, remoto scandalo et consulto prius Ordinario.

§ 3. Non improbatur tamen quod, lege civili iubente,

[33] S. O., Feb. 17, 1875 (Coll., n. 1433).

[34] S. O., June 30, 1842 (Coll., n. 950).

[35] S. O., March 18, 1891 (Coll., n. 1750).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

coniuges se sistant etiam coram ministro acatholico, officialis civilis tantum munere fungente, idque ad actum civilem dumtaxat explendum, effectuum civilium gratia.

§ 1. Even when a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion has been given by the Church, the parties can not, either before or after their marriage before the Church, go, whether in person or by proxy, to a non-Catholic minister in the exercise of his office, for the purpose of giving or renewing the matrimonial consent.

§ 2. If the pastor knows for certain that the parties are about to violate this law, or have violated it, he shall not assist at their marriage, except for very weighty reasons, all danger of scandal being removed and the Ordinary having been consulted.

§ 3. It is not, however, forbidden for the parties to present themselves before a non-Catholic minister acting as a civil magistrate, when the civil law requires it, solely to comply with a civil formality and for the sake of civil effects.

The distinction [36] between § 1 and § 3 consists in the following: If the parties were to approach a non-Catholic minister, as such, and to ask and obtain from him the nuptial blessing, the Catholic party would acknowledge him as a lawful minister of Christ, and approve of and profess a heretical rite. This cannot be allowed because it would be an active participation in heretical functions, which is per se a grievous sin. But if the parties present themselves before a non-Catholic minister acting as a civil magistrate, and who does not mean to confer a blessing, the Catholic party is free from guilt, if the ceremony is gone through merely to observe the civil law and to avoid greater evils.[37]

[36] Cfr. Benedict XIV, "Redditae sunt," Sept. 17, 1746; De Syn. Dioec., VI, 7; S. O., Jan. 29, 1817 (Coll. 717).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Attention must be drawn to the expression, "ad matrimonialem consensum praestandum vel renovandum." This implies that the parties really have the intention of giving or renewing the matrimonial consent, or, in other words, desire to celebrate their marriage before a non-Catholic minister, as such, at least by the external act, although the internal consent may be absent in the Catholic party, or may be given inadvertently, or reluctantly, or out of mere courtesy. The reason of this strict prohibition is the inevitable participation in sacred things and the external approval of heretical rites to the scandal of Catholics.[38]

Note furthermore: "sive per se sive per procuratorem." The matrimonial consent may be given either personally or by proxy.[39] If given by proxy, rules 68 and 72 in 6° must be observed and hence the guilty party is the one that acts through the proctor, although the latter, too, commits a grievous sin if he is a Catholic and realizes his guilt.[40]

On the other hand, both guilt and prohibition are absent if § 3 is verified. For in that case a merely civil act is performed in order to obtain civil effects. Thus, for instance, if a preacher would act merely as justice of the peace, being acknowledged as such, no matter how unctuous an exhortation he might deliver on the occasion, the 37 Cfr. Instructio S. O. ad Ep. Osnabruck., Feb. 17, 1864 (Coll., n. 1247), from which sect. 3 of our canon is borrowed almost verbally.

38 S. O., ibid., Dec. 12, 1888 ad 7 (Coll., n. 1696).

39 Cfr. can. 1088.

40 The censure mentioned in can. 2319 would not be incurred by the proxy. The term non-Catholic minister includes any minister of any heretical or schismatic denomination, which as such is opposed to, or rejected by, the Catholic Church. This seems to be based upon Pius IX's Const., "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, I, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ceremony would be a purely civil one. If the minister is not the only man in town who may act as official, the parties, after having obtained a duly issued license, may certainly be suspected of approaching him as a minister in sacris. The same holds good in a higher degree if in a town or city there are several different denominations, and the non-Catholic party chooses the minister of his own creed. Neither does it matter whether he is dressed as a clergyman or where he receives them, in church or in his parlor.

§ 2 is taken from the instruction of the Holy Office to the Bishop of Osnabrück, which says: If the pastor is asked by the parties concerning their intention of going to a preacher, or if he knows for certain that they will go to him, he is not allowed to remain silent, but must warn them of the grievous sin they are about to commit. However, to avoid greater evils, if the pastor is not asked whether they may go to a non-Catholic minister and no explicit declaration is made of their purpose, although he foresees their going thither and is aware that an admonition would do more harm than good, he may be silent, provided the scandal is repaired and the required promises are duly made.[41] Our text says that in both cases, viz.: when the parties intend to go or have already gone to the non-Catholic minister, the pastor must seek to remove the scandal and then consult the Ordinary as to what is to be done.

How the scandal is to be removed is not indicated in the said instruction. Evidently it must be done in such a way that the Catholic people are satisfied. Thus a public apology made before the congregation, or printed in a Catholic newspaper, or a public denunciation, if the parties went to the preacher after the Catholic wedding, 41 S. O., Feb. 17, 1864 (Coll., n. 1247).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google would repair the scandal. If they went to the minister before the Catholic wedding, the most efficacious way of removing the scandal would be a flat refusal of assistance until public penance is accepted.

DUTIES OF PASTORS

CAN. 1064

Ordinarii aliique animarum pastores:

1.° Fideles a mixtis nuptiis, quantum possunt, absterreant;

2.° Si eas impedire non valeant, omni studio curent ne contra Dei et Ecclesiae leges contrahantur;

3.° Mixtis nuptiis celebratis sive in proprio sive in alieno territorio, sedulo invigilent ut coniuges promissiones factas fideliter impleant;

4.° Assistentes matrimonio servent praescriptum can. 1102.

Ordinaries and other pastors of souls shall:

1.° Deter the faithful from contracting mixed marriages as much as they can;

2.° If they cannot prevent them, they shall take the greatest possible care that such marriages are celebrated according to the laws of God and the Church;

3.° After such a marriage has been contracted, either in their own territory or outside of it, they shall watch over the faithful fulfillment of the promises made;

4.° In assisting at such marriages they shall follow the regulations of can. 1102.

Reference may here be made to the IInd and IIIrd Plenary Councils of Baltimore. The former (n. 336) admonishes pastors to instruct the faithful at least once a year on the evils arising from mixed marriages. The latter (n. 133) advises frequent instruction, uniform practice in proceeding in such cases, an accurate examination of the reasons alleged to obtain a dispensation, and finally careful watching over the fulfilment of the promises. The Councils might profitably have added a little reminder to Ordinaries that they should examine the reasons alleged as to their canonical weight and accompanying circumstances. We know from experience that where local circumstances are such as to permit a dispensation on account of the small number of Catholics, God gives special graces, whereas those who contract a mixed marriage frivolously have to go without such help.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MARRIAGES WITH INDIFFERENTISTS DISCOURAGED

CAN. 1065

§ 1. Absterreantur quoque fideles a matrimonio contrahendo cum iis qui notorie aut catholicam fidem abiecerunt, etsi ad sectam acatholicam non transierint, aut societatibus ab Ecclesia damnatis adscripti sunt.

§ 2. Parochus praedictis nuptiis ne assistat, nisi consulto Ordinario, qui inspectis omnibus rei adiunctis, ei permittere poterit ut matrimonio intersit, dummodo urgeat gravis causa et pro suo prudenti arbitrio Ordinarius iudicet satis cautum esse catholicae educationi universae prolis et remotioni periculi perversionis alterius coniugis.

Having laid down the rules for mixed marriages, the Code now turns to marriages with unbelievers and Freemasons and, in can. 1066, with public sinners and persons under ecclesiastical censure. The faithful, it says, should be deterred from marrying those who have notoriously renounced the Catholic faith, without, however, joining a non-Catholic sect, or with those who are notoriously affiliated with societies condemned by the Church. The pastor shall not assist at such marriages, except after consulting the Ordinary, who, after due consideration of all the circumstances of the case, may permit the pastor to assist, provided there be a weighty reason and sufficient provision be made for the Catholic education of all the children.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The reason for this precaution lies in the danger of perversion of the Catholic party and of the offspring of the marriage. Hence it may be truly said that such unions are forbidden by the natural and by divine law, even though the Church does not prohibit them under penalty of an impediment. But since this class of persons are a real menace to the Church and to society, and at the same time only too ready to attack the faithful, it is impossible to treat them more leniently than is compatible with her fundamental principles. Every pastor should endeavor, by public and private exhortations, by prudent severity in the confessional, and by appealing to the parents of the Catholic party, to prevent such unions, from which no happy results can be expected. If his endeavors prove vain, he must report to the Ordinary.[42]

The latter must first and above all ascertain whether the apostasy of the party is notorious, i. e., so well known that it cannot be concealed by any artifice.[43] If a man who no longer attends church is known to the whole community as an unbeliever who ridicules the Church, or if he has written publicly against the Catholic faith, he is a notorious apostate. The same rule must be applied to Freemasons, although in their case secrecy may cause some difficulty. But they have their meetings, balls, entertainments, badges and papers. Besides the identity of 42 S. O., Aug. 1, 1855; Aug. 21, 1861; Jan. 30, 1867; July 21, 1878 (Coll., nn. 1116, 1219, 1300, 1495).

43 Can. 2197, 3; the addition "nulloque iuris suffragio excusari possit," is implicitly verified in our case, for neither divine nor ecclesiastical law excuses an apostate.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

their leaders and that of active, influential members can scarcely remain hidden, even if there were no lists of members. But it is not sufficient that they be merely notorious, they must also belong to a condemned sect, i. e., a society which aims at the subversion of ecclesiastical or civil authority, no matter whether its members are bound by secrecy or not.[44] All such societies are strictly condemned. To this class belong, in our country, the lodges of the Oriental Rite. The "Independent Order of Good Templars,"[45] the "Odd Fellows," the "Sons of Temperance" and the "Knights of Pythias" are forbidden to Catholics but not explicitly declared to be under ecclesiastical censure,[46] and hence cannot be called condemned societies in the strict sense of the term.

When the Ordinary has informed himself as to the character of the non-Catholic party, he shall weigh the circumstances of the case, the influence of the apostate or Freemason, and of both parties and their families, and take into consideration the condition of the parish, the danger of probable scandal, and the consequences likely to follow. Before granting permission he must be morally certain that all the children will be baptized and brought up in the Catholic faith and that there is no danger that the Catholic party will be hindered in the practice of his or her religion. These guarantees must by all means be obtained, because they are demanded by divine law; but no writing or oath is required, a serious promise will suffice. Finally there must be grave reasons in order to permit assistance, and these may be either the canonical ones (can. 1054) or others that may claim the Ordinary's consent, for instance, danger of a purely civil

44 S. O., Aug. 5, 1846; S. C. P. F., Sept. 24, 1867 (Coll., n. 1320); S. O., May 10, 1884 ad 3 (Coll., n. 1615): "contra Ecclesiam vel legitimam potestatem machinantur."

45 S. O., Aug. 9, 1893 (Coll., n. 1845).

46 Putzer, Comment., p. 235.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage and subsequent concubinage, danger to the Church at large or in the particular territory in question, probable hope of conversion, etc.

After all these precautions have been taken, the Ordinary may permit the pastor to be present at the marriage (ut parochus matrimonio intersit).[47] How far the assistance may go depends on the circumstances of the case. A directive norm is found in can. 1102, unless the Ordinary should deem it necessary to restrict the "assistance" to what is absolutely necessary.[48]

PUBLIC SIN AND CENSURE

CAN. 1066

Si publicus peccator aut censura notorie innodatus prius ad sacramentalem confessionem accedere aut cum Ecclesia reconciliari recusaverit, parochus eius matrimonio ne assistat, nisi gravis urgeat causa, de qua, si fieri possit, consulat Ordinarium.

This canon may be regarded as supplementing the previous one and concerns a case less detrimental to the public interest of the Church. It treats of public sinners and persons notoriously under censure. If such persons wish to get married, and refuse to go to confession or to be reconciled to the Church before the marriage, the pastor is not allowed to assist thereat, except for grave and urgent reasons, about which he shall, if possible, consult the Ordinary.

Public sinners, as distinguished from the others men-

47 S. O., July 5, 1878 (Coll., n. 1495): "permittere poterit, ut parochus matrimonio passive intersit, idest absque benedictione, alioque ritu ecclesiastico, tanquam testis authorizabilis." Of course, receiving and demanding the consent is strictly required, and it appears that assistance at such marriages is the same as at mixed marriages.

48 S. O., Feb. 1, 1883 (Coll., n. 1591): "omnino excludatur celebratio sacrificii Missae."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tioned, are persons who, through their own fault, are ignorant of the most necessary Christian doctrines, or refuse to comply with their duties as Catholics, especially that of receiving the sacraments and assisting at divine service, even though they may retain the faith.[49]

Notoriously under censure are those who have been excommunicated by name or denounced by the ecclesiastical judge, or whose censures are known to the people.[50] Stress is laid upon publicity, because if the pastor would know of a person's guilt or censure only from confession, he could not refuse his assistance, since this is a public act. But if the sinful conduct or censure is notorious, then what? The pastor should endeavor to bring such public sinners to their senses in the confessional, or by reconciliation, if censures have been incurred. In the latter case, therefore, absolution is required, and if the necessary faculties are wanting, recourse to the Ordinary is inevitable. If the parties both refuse, the pastor may, time permitting, report to the bishop. But if the case is urgent, and reasons are given, he may assist. St. Alphonsus is more rigoristic, yet he permits assistance if there be danger of death, or great evils affecting the community, or if the pastor foresees that the parties would continue to lead a sinful life.[51]

The text does not state what kind of assistance is to be granted, but as the quotations given by Card. Gasparri refer to the Freemasons, what has been said under the preceding canon, may also be applied here.

Since a marriage contracted against the prohibition of the Church is only illicit, not invalid, cases may arise

49 De Smet, l. c., p. 139.

50 Can. 2197.

51 S. Poenit., Dec. 10, 1865 (Coll., n. 1205, which refers to St. Alphonsus, l. VI, tr. 1, cap. 2, n. 54); Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VIII, c. 14.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which require straightening. How is that to be done?

First be it noted that the case of a merely illicit marriage is comparatively rare. A marriage not contracted in the presence of the pastor (priest) and two witnesses is not merely illicit, but also invalid. If it is contracted properly, no unlawfulness attaches to it. However, it may happen, through ignorance on the part of the pastor, or by surprise, or in consequence of stubborn refusal of the two conditions or promises,[52] that a marriage is contracted in the prescribed form, yet without a dispensation, and therefore unlawfully. In that case the mode of procedure would be the following:

(1) If the parties were married in church, and not before a non-Catholic minister as such (qua sacris addictus), the pastor shall instruct them concerning the sin they have committed and the strict obligation of complying with the required conditions, especially that concerning the Catholic education of their offspring, and assure them that any contrary promises are not binding, because unjust. If they acknowledge the wrong they have done, and show signs of repentance, they may be admitted to the sacraments, with the imposition of a wholesome penance.[53] And this is all that may or should be done in such a case; for the marriage is valid, and the dispensation cannot affect its lawfulness after it has been contracted.

(2) If the parties have been married in church, but have presented themselves before a non-Catholic minister, as such (can. 1063), the Catholic party has incurred the excommunicatio latae sententiae, reserved by law (can. 2319, § 1, n. 1) to the Ordinary. This is the only cen-

52 The case is mentioned in a decree of the S. O., June 21, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 444), but not quoted by Card. Gasparri.

53 S. O., Jan. 3, 1871 (Coll., n. 1362). But the two promises must be imposed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sure, none other being mentioned in the Code. Hence what was formerly said about a reserved case [54] is now obsolete. But the way a pastor must proceed is not entirely changed. It is as follows:

(a) The pastor must seek to persuade the Catholic party to repent of his or her fault and deny him or her the sacraments until they do so.

(b) If there are signs of repentance, he must demand the two promises, as a rule in writing.

(c) If these promises are sincerely made, he shall apply the faculty of absolving from the episcopal censure, or procure the same if he does not yet enjoy it, and impose a wholesome penance. No renewal of consent is required.

If the penance is to be public, according to the diocesan statutes or a special injunction of the Ordinary,[55] in order to repair the scandal given, the pastor is not at liberty to remit it. Nothing else is to be done, because the marriage is supposed to be valid.

(3) If the marriage is invalid because of lack of the prescribed form — vitio clandestinitatis — the pastor must refuse the sacraments until the Catholic party repents and makes the two promises, and then obtain a dispensation. Should the parties have given their consent before a non-Catholic minister, the censure must also be removed. In that case the procedure would be as follows:

54 Putzer, l. c., p. 65; Leitner, l. c., p. 355 f., who would, of course, refer to "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, I, 3.

55 There is no doubt that the diocesan statutes or a special order of the bishop may lawfully impose public satisfaction. Besides, it must be noted that, if the censure is known publicly, the absolution should be imposed publicly. S. O., Feb. 17, 1864 (Coll., n. 1247); S. O., Aug. 23, 1877 (Coll., n. 1478). If the censure was occult, absolution in foro interno suffices. Furthermore, if the parties did not know of the censure, the latter is not incurred, provided theirs was not ignorantia crassa or affectata. Leitner, l. c., p. 358.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(a) The litterae reversales or the two promises must be agreed to, either in writing or orally.

(b) Absolution from censure must be given.

(c) A dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion must be obtained and applied.

(d) The matrimonial consent must be renewed in the presence of the pastor and two witnesses.[56]

A new difficulty arises if the non-Catholic party refuses to renew the consent. In that case it would be necessary to revalidate the marriage in radice,[57] as explained in canons 1138–1141. But since our bishops enjoy the faculties mentioned under can. 1048, according to the decree of April 25 and Aug. 2, 1918, recourse to the Holy See is not required. In case of danger of death can. 1143 f. must be followed.

[56] S. O., Aug. 23, 1877 (Coll., n. 1478).

[57] S. O., Nov. 22, 1889 (Coll., n. 1721).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

DIRIMENT IMPEDIMENTS

This chapter enumerates twelve[1] impediments which render a marriage not only illicit, but also invalid. The Code does not determine which of these belong to the order of the natural and divine law, and which to the order of ecclesiastical law. If the reader, therefore, desires a classification, he will have to accept the statement of authors, who agree more or less on the subject. The only controversy of any importance concerns the impediment of consanguinity.

AGE

CAN. 1067

§ 1. Vir ante decimum sextum aetatis annum completum, mulier ante decimum quartum item completum, matrimonium validum inire non possunt.

§ 2. Licet matrimonium post praedictam aetatem contractum validum sit, curent tamen animarum pastores ab eo avertere iuvenes ante aetatem, qua, secundum regionis receptos mores, matrimonium iniri solet.

A boy can not validly contract marriage before he has completed his sixteenth, and a girl before she has completed her fourteenth year. Although marriage contracted after the aforesaid age is valid, pastors of souls

1 We say twelve, because legal adoption is an impediment only in countries where it has been set up as such by civil law, but does not affect the Church at large.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google should deter from it young people who have not reached the age at which, according to the custom of the country, marriage is usually contracted.

In this formulation the impediment is of merely ecclesiastical law, which now demands a higher age than was formerly required. The Decretals [2] followed the Roman law in reckoning the age. There was a controversy between the Cassians and the Proculejans, until Justinian adopted the view of Proculejus, who maintained that the number of years, fourteen for boys and twelve for girls, should be decisive in admitting one to marriage. The Cassians, on the other hand, held that not only age but natural capacity for the marital act should be taken into consideration.[3] This double method of determining the impediment of age is noticeable not only in the early ecclesiastical legislation,[4] and in the Summae of Tancred [5] and Bernardus Papiensis,[6] but also in the Decretals quoted. In fact it remained in vogue until the present. For the commentators all distinguished between age properly so called, and mental and physical capacity. It was an axiom that "malitia supplet aetatem." Most canonists assumed that, as far as mental ability was concerned, the impediment rested on the natural law, whilst impotence was not absolute, because it might disappear. In southern or warmer climates maturity is attained at an earlier age than in the North. Yet, if we may believe missionaries, no human being is ripe for marriage before the eleventh year of age. There are pontifical constitutions which forbid marriage to be contracted at the age

2 Cfr. cc. 12, 13, X, IV, 2; c. 2, X, IV, 15; c. un. 6°, IV, 2.

3 Cfr. ll. 13, 29, dig. 19, 1; pr. Inst. I, 22; l. 3, Cod. V, 60.

4 Cfr. Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen, pp. 178, 217, 583.

5 Summa de Spons. et Mat., ed. Wunderlich, p. 22.

6 Summa de Mat., ed. Laspeyres: "Impossibilitas coeundi animo et corpore tam impedit matrimonium quam dirimit contractum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of six or seven, but they do not state a precise limit.[7]

Our Code lays down the age-limit without reference to either mental or bodily capacity. However, it stands to reason that if a real and substantial defect of mind could be proved, a marriage would be invalid even after the age designated in the Code. But in that case the subject belongs to the next chapter, which treats of consent. As to impotency, this must be judged according to the following canon.

In the United States there is no uniformity in the civil law of the different States with regard to the age limit for marriage. While in some the common-law age of consent, namely fourteen and twelve, prevails, in others it has been raised by statutes. The terms differ.[8] The Statute of Missouri (sect. 4321) reads in part: "No recorder shall issue a license authorizing the marriage of any male person under the age of twenty-one years, or female under eighteen, except with the consent of his or her father or mother." But the invalidity of a marriage under that age is nowhere explicitly asserted. The Church, however, wisely admonishes pastors to deter young people from marrying against the statutes of their respective country. For the custom of a country is the best interpreter of the natural law in matters of this kind.

IMPOTENCY

CAN. 1068

§ 1. Impotentia antecedens et perpetua, sive ex parte viri sive ex parte mulieris, sive alteri cognita sive non,

7 Bened. XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum," Sept. 12, 1744, and the Const. of Clement XII, quoted in the same Bull. (ed. Prati, Vol. I, 428 ff.).

8 Bishop, Marriage Laws, I, p. 249, § 582.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sive absoluta sive relativa, matrimonium ipso naturae iure dirimit.

§ 2. Si impedimentum impotentiae dubium sit, sive dubio iuris sive dubio facti, matrimonium non est impediendum.

§ 3. Sterilitas matrimonium nec dirimit nec impedit.

§ 1. Anterior and perpetual impotency, whether in man or woman, whether known to the other party or not, whether absolute or relative, renders marriage invalid by the very law of nature.

§ 2. If the impediment of impotency is doubtful, whether the doubt be one of fact or by reason of the law being doubtful, marriage should not be hindered.

§ 3. Sterility renders marriage neither invalid nor illicit.

This is the impediment of impotency, set up by natural law. As its nature is not determined in the text, there is room for controversy, which has not been wanting. The reader may rest assured that we shall not carry coal to Newcastle, but keep within the boundaries of Canon Law.

(1) What is impotency? In order to understand the attitude of the Church on this subject, a brief historical note seems necessary. The Roman law distinguished two classes of eunuchs or spadones;[9] those who could not beget children and yet were entitled to contract marriage with all its juridical effects; and those who could neither beget children nor contract marriage according to law. In case of natural incapacity for marital intercourse (impotentia coeundi) the law permitted dissolution of the union after an experiment of two or three years.[10]

The ecclesiastical conformed to the Roman law up

9 Spado from the Greek σπάω, to draw, pull, pluck, hence, to castrate.

10 Cfr. § 9, Inst., I, 11; fr. 39, dig. 23, 3; l. 10, Cod. V, 17; Nov. 22, c. 6; Nov. 117, c. 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to the eighth century.[11] A fluctuation is noticeable in the writings of Bernardus Papiensis and Tancred, who, however, following the French school, maintained the invalidity of a marriage contracted with natural impotency.[12] According to the belief of those ages there was an artificial impotency, due to satanic influence or witchcraft.[13] This artificial, as distinguished from natural impotency, or frigiditas, was not commonly regarded as sufficient to constitute a diriment impediment. Some uncertainty is perceptible in the Decretals, where the expedient of allowing the parties to cohabit as brother and sister is resorted to. Nor is the distinction between absolute and relative impotency uniformly maintained. All this goes to prove the wavering attitude of the School in this matter. But the triennial experiment is fully admitted,[14] and it is further evident from the Decretals that impotentia coeundi is the distinctive characteristic of the impediment; hence the terms: foeminae clausae, impotentes commisceri maribus, arctae, whilst the men are called frigidi, or simply impotentes coeundi, debitum reddere non potentes. At the same time, however, note the terms: volo esse mater, nunquam potuit fieri mater aut conjux, tanquam cui naturale deerat instrumentum. We note this purposely, in order to enable the reader to pass a fair judgment on the opinions of those times. What the theologians taught will be stated later.

The answer to the question, what is impotency? may be given thus: It is a natural incapacity both for marital intercourse and the procreation of offspring.[15] This 11 Cfr. Wasserschleben, l. c., p. 216; c. 18, C. 32, q. 7, which latter text is a decision of Greg. II, but seems rather a dissolution of a ratified marriage.

12 Summa cit., p. 177 f.; Tancred, Summa cit., p. 63.

13 Cfr. X, IV, 15, de frigidis et maleficiatis et impotentia coeundi.

14 C. 5, X, IV, 15.

15 Cfr. New International Encyc. 1904, s. v. "Impotency."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

definition would be given by any physiologist. But theologians and canonists adopt a more restricted definition of impotency. They say: It is incapacity for performing the marital act, which in itself would be apt for procreation.[16]

Incapacity in this sense exists where the necessary organs are entirely lacking. Men who have been completely castrated are incapable of exercising the copula.[17] In women complete or perfect vaginismus (arctitudo) causes incapacity for copulation. If this condition is incurable, the defect is called perpetual, and if it existed before marriage, it is called antecedent, in order to distinguish it from impotency contracted after marriage. Note well: we say contracted, not discovered. For it may happen that a person had the defect before marriage but was unaware of its existence, although it is difficult to understand that no physical disturbance should follow such a defect. But whether it becomes known after marriage only or is realized before marriage, whether or not the party suffering from it revealed the defect to the other party, is immaterial. If it existed in an incurable and therefore perpetual form, it affects the validity of the marriage.

A distinction may be drawn between absolute and relative impotency. This is illustrated by the following case: Gemma upon ocular inspection was declared to lack the natural instrument of copulation, and was therefore granted a separation from James. But she found another man with whom she could have marital intercourse.[18]

16 "Inhabilitas ad copulam, quae ex se (or per se) apta est ad generationem."

17 Sixtus V, "Cum frequenter," June 27, 1587: "Spadones utroque teste carentes" are declared incapable of contracting marriage.

18 C. 5, X, IV, 15: "Mulier invenit qui seras huiusmodi reseravit," which seems to allude to an anatomical rather than physiological defect.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This is relative impotency, which affects a marriage between two definite persons only. But suppose Gemma had been entirely devoid of natural organs, or so affected with complete vaginismus, that intercourse would have been impossible to her with any man; then there would have been absolute impotency. Similarly a complete eunuch could not contract marriage with any woman.

(2) The second part of our definition also calls for some explanation. "Per se apta ad generationem" means intercourse which is per se conducive to procreation. Here is the salient point of the controversy which was called forth by two decisions of the Holy Office, Feb. 3, 1887, and July 30, 1890.[19] These decisions read as follows:

That of 1887: "Num mulier, per utriusque ovarii excisi defectum sterilis effecta, ad matrimonium ineundum permitti valeat et liceat, necne? Resp. Re mature diuque perpensa, matrimonium mulieris, de qua in casu, non esse impediendum."

That of 1890 (Quebec.): "Se unna donna, cui per mano chirurgica siano asportate ambedue le ovarie e l'utero, possa validamente contrarre matrimonio." Resp. Matrimonium non esse impediendum." (Cfr. Coll. P. F., n. 1733.)

It follows that the lack of ovaries and uterus in a woman does not constitute the invalidating impediment of impotency. A distinction is here clearly supposed between the terminus a quo and the terminus ad quem of the copula. The former is the conjugal act, taken as fecund, at least in posse, provided no obstacle interferes.

19 Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. XXVIII, pp. 51 ff., where the pros and cons are discussed at some length; cfr. O'Malley and Walsh, Essays in Pastoral Medicine, 1911, p. 326 ff., whose medical judgment gives way to moralist assumptions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The terminus ad quem is the same act as related to the organs and elements required for fecundation, and therefore presupposes these organs, especially the ovaries and the uterus, to be in a condition fit to produce the natural result of the act, namely, procreation. The decisions quoted simply require the terminus a quo.

(3) What of impotency if it negatively at least frustrates the primary end of marriage? In other words, can the Church declare that a marriage is valid, although the primary end of marriage cannot be obtained? After having read all the authors on the subject, the conclusion was forced upon us in the shape of the question just formulated. It is a theological rather than a physiological problem. In order not to fatigue the reader, as we were fatigued by reading all those hundreds of pages,[20] we briefly resume the matter as follows:

(a) Ab esse ad posse valet illatio. The decisions of the Holy Office quoted reflect the power of the Church, but only over single or individual cases, as those mentioned really were. We may not generalize them, especially since the Holy Office never states the reasons for its decisions. But the decisions of that august Congregation are neither infallible, nor do they extend beyond the cases for which they are rendered, unless the wording has a general tenor.

(b) What justifies these decisions in casu is the fact that marriage has several ends or purposes for which it was instituted by the Author of nature. The primary end is the procreation of offspring, and this is not only intrinsic but also essential to marriage.[21] It is the officium naturae. When we assert that it is essential, we do not,

20 Cf. Eschbach, Disputationes Physiologico-Theologicae, 1901; Id. in Anal. Eccl., t. X, pp. 85 ff.; Antonelli, Medicina Pastoralis, 1905; Id., De Conceptu Impotentiae et Sterilitatis, 1901.

21 It is difficult to admit statements made by the Salmant. and St.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

however, mean to say that it is the sole end of marriage, because there are secondary ends, as stated in can. 1013: mutual help and relief of concupiscence. The right of declaring that, in a particular case, the secondary ends suffice, provided everything is done in a lawful manner, in order to contract a valid marriage, must be vindicated to the supreme authority in a matter subject to its power. For the welfare, not only of single individuals, but of Christian society at large, demands that there be such a power, and none other can be imagined than the one set up by God for ruling the society instituted by Christ. This is nothing else but an interpretation of the natural law.

(c) We do not believe that any further reason can be assigned to justify the aforesaid decisions. We are aware indeed of the argument that want of ovaries and uterus is similar to lack of the power of begetting children in an old woman, or, in other words, to sterility. However, the comparison is not perfect. For, in the first place, sterility is only partial and sometimes only temporary impotency, which may be removed either by natural or preternatural means.[22] No doubt the possibility of a miraculous interference had much to do with the attitude of the Church towards sterility.[23] Besides, as the late Fr.

Alphonsus (cfr. Anal. Eccl. 1902, t. X, p. 468; Amer. Eccl. Rev., Vol. XXVIII, p. 658) that the susceptio prolis est (nec unicus) nec immediatus finis matrimonii. What then is the finis primarius? The coitus? The sophism (Am. Eccl. Rev., 28, 651) does not consist in distinguishing the ecclesiastical from the medical sense of impotency, but in admitting a difference between natural and ecclesiastical impotency. The impotency caused by nature and intended by the Church must be one and the same. See Am. Eccl. Rev., April 1919, Vol. 60, 426 ff., where the doctrine of St. Thomas concerning consummation of marriage is clearly set forth.

22 We would like to hear an able physician's view as to whether a woman destitute of ovaries and uterus could by miraculous interference be made pregnant and bring forth a child.

23 Examples: Sarah, Anna, Elizabeth, the parents of SS. Nicholas

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Lehmkuhl, S. J., justly pointed out, there is a great dissimilarity between the two cases.[24] If the ovaries and the uterus are excised, we have a positive interference, either lawful or unlawful, with nature. If this interference takes place by mutual consent and agreement, it invalidates marriage because it is incompatible with a substantial end of marriage. Sterility, on the other hand, is merely a passive condition of either one or both parties, which does not in any shape or form suppose a mutual pact of avoiding the primary end of marriage. If marriages such as those referred to in the two decisions would be allowed generally, and not merely by way of exception, one stronghold against race suicide would be seriously shaken, and the primary end of marriage would be made coordinate with the other two, which are merely secondary.

§ 2 permits marriage as licit and valid if there is any doubt as to the existence of the impediment of impotency. The existing doubt may be one of fact or of law. There is a dubium facti if the natural impotency is not absolutely proven, for instance, in surgical operations, after which there sometimes remain traces of the generative power. A doubt of law existed in the case mentioned above, because it seems as yet uncertain how far the limits of impotency extend. Until a general interpretation is given [25] the Church wishes us to apply the principle: "In dubio libertati favendum est."

For the rest, the Holy Office has declared that in case of doubt recourse should be had to Rome.[26] of Tolentino and Juliana de' Falconieri.

24 Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 28, 317.

25 That the decision of S. O., July 23, 1890 (Coll. P. F. n. 1733) was only a particular one, is duly noted by the editors of the Collectanea P. F. (see the number quoted). This corroborates our view. The other causa referred to by Card. Gasparri is rather a dispensation from a ratified marriage; cfr. A. S. S., t. 14, p. 68.

26 S. O., July 31, 1895; Jan. 16,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3 mentions sterility. Now sterility exists when the copula per se apta ad generationem can be properly performed, but by a merely accidental and natural fact fecundation does not follow. This happens when marriage is contracted at an advanced age when the generative powers have ceased to function. Those authors who maintain that a woman without ovaries and uterus can contract a valid marriage, would consistently have to reduce that kind of impotency to mere sterility. What we said on the subject under § 1, (3, c.) may suffice. We will only add that if no sophistry is to be practiced, the ecclesiastical concept of the impediment of impotency cannot differ from that given by competent physiologists, since the impediment of impotency is not established by the Church, but by the law of nature.

We add a few practical hints to the confessor or pastor. The first question, of course, in such a case would be, whether a conscientious physician has been consulted and what was his opinion? If the physician diagnosed the case as one of perpetual and antecedent impotency, his judgment must be referred to the diocesan court, unless there is room for the solid presumption that the parties may be allowed to live together like brother and sister, and a separation would cause grave scandal. But the danger of incontinency must be remote.[27] If the parties prefer to get an ecclesiastical divorce, that would dissolve the matrimonial tie.

A triennial experiment is no longer admitted, but its place is taken by ocular inspection by physicians or nurses.

As to hermaphrodites, or such persons as have the sexual characteristics of both sexes, whether it be andro-

1895 (Coll., n. 1907, Vol. II, 324).

27 S. O., March 8, 1900 (Coll., n. 2078); Leitner, l. c., p. 151 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gynia or gynandria or hermaphroditismus neuter, the testimony of physicians is required. No hermaphroditus neuter can possibly be called capable of marrying because the sex is not sufficiently determined.[28] Finally it must be observed that artificial fecundation, i. e., extra copulam naturalem, is never allowed.[29]

The parties involved are alone competent to attack the marriage on the score of impotency, for they are the only ones interested. And if they do so, they must prove that the existing impotency is antecedent and perpetual and cannot be removed by natural and lawful means. If it is absolute, i. e., renders the conjugal act impossible, it also renders marriage with every other person invalid; if it is merely relative, it affects only the persons concerned.[30]

LIGAMEN OR BOND OF A PREVIOUS MARRIAGE

CAN. 1069

§ 1. Invalide matrimonium attentat qui vinculo tenetur prioris matrimonii, quanquam non consummati, salvo privilegio fidei.

§ 2. Quamvis prius matrimonium sit irritum aut solutum qualibet ex causa, non ideo licet aliud contrahere, antequam de prioris nullitate aut solutione legitime et certo constiterit.

§ 1. Those bound by the bonds of a former marriage, even though it was not consummated, attempt marriage invalidly, excepting the privilege of the faith.

§ 2. Although the previous marriage be invalid or dissolved for whatever reason, it is not lawful to contract

28 Antonelli, l. c., p. 105 f.; Eschbach, l. c., p. 53 f.

29 S. O., March 24, 1897 (Coll., n. 1904): "Ssmus adprobavit," the clause added to that decision, is not found in the other two.

30 Instructio S. C. P. F., 1883, n. 46 (Coll., n. 1587)

Digitized by Google. Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google another one before the nullity or dissolution of the first has been legally and certainly established.

The essential properties of marriage, unity and indissolubility, exclude a valid marriage with another party while the marital bond continues. Divorce, as understood by the civil law, was and is repudiated by the Church. A person who married a divorced man or woman in former times had to do penance publicly and break off the unlawful relation, otherwise he was denied the Sacraments, except at the point of death.[31] However, it cannot be denied that a matrimonium ratum tantum was judged more liable to solution than one both ratified and consummated, and diverse opinions, even of Roman Pontiffs, floated about in the canonical air [32] until a decision given by Pope Alexander III made the position of the Church more uniform. From the Penitential Books we know that the time of waiting for the certainty of death of the other party was not extended, five years being deemed sufficient if the party was taken captive,[33] nor rigorously insisted upon. This leniency is easily explained by the slow and difficult means of communication in times past.

§ 1 sets up the diriment impediment of the marriage bond, or ligamen, opposed alike to polygamy and divorce. That this impediment exist, it is required, (a) that the first marriage was valid and never dissolved, even though (b) the union is not yet consummated, but only ratified. This latter condition is quite intelligible, because the marriage bond is validly contracted by a valid consent, and needs no consummation to be perfect.

31 Syn. of Elvira (305), can. 9; c. 8, C. 32, q. 7.

32 Cfr. Bernard. Pap., l. c., p. 298; Rolandus Mag., Summa, ed. Thaner, pp. 114, 187, 200; Tancred, l. c., p. 49; c. 3, X, IV, 14, where Alex. III reviews different verdicts of his predecessors.

33 Cfr. Wasserschleben, l. c., p. 148.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The first condition supposes a valid union that has not been legitimately dissolved. Validity depends on the valid consent, on the observance of the prescribed form, and on the absence of diriment impediments. The consent would be affected by a condition opposed to the essential qualities of unity and indissolubility. For instance, a couple taught to contract marriage subject to divorce would contract invalidly, if this condition was stipulated by mutual consent.[34] The form would affect the validity if marriage were contracted against can. 1094 ff. A diriment impediment would invalidate the marriage if it objectively affected either one or both of the parties. Thus, for instance, James, a baptized person, pretending to be a Catholic, married Gemma, but afterwards declared that he was no Catholic at all. The marriage was declared valid on the ground that, as James was baptized, neither dissimulation nor apostasy could annul a marriage validly and lawfully contracted by him.[35] The privilege of the faith could not be invoked in this case.[36] As long as a former marriage exists, the second is invalid, and the parties must separate.[37] The clergy or hierarchy cannot connive at polygamy, even though there were danger that a whole country would be involved in heresy, as happened once upon a time in Transylvania (Hungary). All they can do is to abstain from inflicting penalties, if the danger of apostasy is general.[38]

A marriage which is only ratified, not consummated, may be solved by papal intervention, as shall be seen un-

34 S. O., Jan. 24, 1877 (Coll. P. F., n. 1465); cfr. can. 1092.

35 S. O., March 20, 1817 (Coll., n. 721).

36 S. O., March 20, 1675 (Coll., n. 208). A Christian became a Mohammedan after baptism and marriage; the bond remains; cfr. S. O., Dec. 11, 1850, ad 25–27 (Coll., n. 1054).

37 S. O., Aug. 19, 1857 (Coll., n. 1147).

38 S. O., June 23, 1671, ad 3 (Coll., n. 196).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

der can. 1119, and by religious profession, which is treated under can. 1073.

A legitimate though consummated marriage can be dissolved only by the application of the Pauline Privilege (see can. 1120 ff.).

§ 2 treats of what is technically called certus mortis nuntius, certainty regarding the death of the other party. The proof for the dissolution of the former marriage bond, says the text, must be legal and certain. If legal proof has been duly furnished, the ecclesiastical judge need require no more. Before explaining the method of procedure in such matters, some preliminary remarks seem pertinent.

(a) There is no definite time limit or determined number of years required for quasi-prescription; hence the ecclesiastical judge should never conform himself to the prescription of the civil law concerning the number of years.[39]

(b) The clergy can never declare that, if no notice of death is received, a marriage is dissolved after a certain lapse of time. To do so would be coöperating in polygamy and adultery.[40] Note here what has been said under can. 1031.

The method of legally proving the death of a person is as follows:[41]

1. If possible, an authentic document[42] must be obtained from the records of the parish or hospital or asylum or military department, or from civil authority.

2. If no such document can be obtained, two witnesses

39 S. O., Instr. 1868 (Coll., n. 1321). Our modern codes admit full divorce in case of prolonged absence; cfr., for instance, the Statutes of Missouri, sect. 2921, where one year's absence is declared sufficient.

40 S. O., June 23, 1671 ad 1 (Coll., n. 196).

41 Instructio S. O., 1868 (Coll., n. 1321); Instr. S. C. P. F., 1883 (Coll., n. 1587).

42 What an authentic document is may be seen under can. 1990.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may be admitted. These must be trustworthy persons and testify under oath. They must have known the person whose death they attest, and their testimony must agree as to the place, the cause and the essential circumstances of the death.

3. If two witnesses cannot be produced, one will suffice, provided he was acquainted with the party and the circumstances of death, and nothing unsuitable or unlikely is found in his deposition.

These witnesses may also testify from hearsay, provided their testimony agrees with circumstances known from other sources, and provided their information has come from direct witnesses.

4. If no witnesses are available, the judge may resort to circumstantial evidence, which is furnished by conjectures, presumptions, and circumstances that preceded, accompanied, and followed the supposed death. Examples are furnished by military companions, especially officers, or by the companions and circumstances of a voyage either on land or sea; whether the person in question travelled alone or in company, for what purpose, which was his route and destiny, whether a wreck took place, etc.

5. Rumor may be admitted if other proofs are wanting. A rumor must be established by two trustworthy witnesses who testify under oath to its reasonableness as also to the general opinion of the people and their own conviction.

6. Finally, a newspaper advertisement may effect the desired result, especially if the manager is furnished with the necessary information.

These are the rules which the ecclesiastical judge should follow. If he is morally certain of the death of the other party, he may pronounce sentence to the effect that the surviving party may contract another marriage. Nor are two uniform sentences required to permit a second marriage.[43] If the doubt can not be entirely removed, recourse must be had to Rome and all the documents forwarded thither.[44] Meanwhile the parties must be told to separate until a decision is rendered.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here it may be stated that neither the confessor nor the pastor are entitled to give judgment in such cases. When approached, they must direct the parties to the diocesan court, or, with the permission of the latter, themselves bring the case before that tribunal. If a second marriage was already concluded and a reasonable doubt as to the death of the former party exists, the parties must be told to suspend their marital relations (copula) until a decision is given.[45]

The Code says that until such a verdict is rendered, the parties concerned may not lawfully contract a new marriage. This means that the second marriage will be valid, provided the former marriage was dissolved by whatever cause. This case was brought before the S. C. C., which decided that the second marriage was valid, though illicit.[46] Consequently the party thus contracting a marriage without full certainty as to the former partner's death, though it had really occurred, would not be allowed to demand the debitum, but only to render it if asked.

A curious case was solved in 1865 by the Holy Office.[47] Titius was taken by rebels and no notice of his fate reached his wife Martha for two or three years. She married a man named Mark, a Christian like herself. Mark, being seriously rebuked by the local missionary, declared his 43 S. O., May 6, 1891 (A. S. S., t. 24, 747).

44 S. O., Aug. 19, 1857 ad 2 (Coll., n. 1147).

45 Cfr. Leitner, l. c., p. 170 f.

46 S. C. C., Sept. 9, 1752, Smyr. (Richter, Trid., p. 225, n. 92).

47 S. O., March 22, 1865 (Coll., n. 1272).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

readiness to leave Martha, but wished to marry another woman. The Holy Office decided that the parties were to be separated, but Mark could not marry another until he was morally certain that at the time of his marriage to Martha, the latter's husband was still alive. Although this solution at first blush seems strange, it is quite logical, for if Martha's first husband had been dead when she married Mark, the marriage would have been valid and Mark could not validly leave her and marry another. Therefore he had to wait until he could obtain certainty regarding Titius's death.

DISPARITY OF WORSHIP

CAN. 1070

§ 1. Nullum est matrimonium contractum a persona non baptizata cum persona baptizata in Ecclesia catholica vel ad eandem ex haeresi aut schismate conversa.

§ 2. Si pars tempore contracti matrimonii tanquam baptizata communiter habebatur aut eius baptismus erat dubius, standum est, ad normam can. 1014, pro valore matrimonii, donec certo probetur alteram partem baptizatam esse, alteram vero non baptizatam.

§ 1. A marriage is null when contracted by a non-baptized person with a person baptized in, or converted to, the Catholic Church from heresy or schism.

§ 2. If the party, at the time of the marriage contract, was commonly held to have been baptized, or if his or her baptism was doubtful, the marriage must be regarded as valid in accordance with can. 1014, until it is proved with certainty that one party was baptized and the other was not.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1071

Quae de mixtis nuptiis in canonibus 1060–1064 praescripta sunt, applicari quoque debent matrimoniis quibus obstat impedimentum disparitatis cultus.

The rules laid down in can. 1060–1064 for mixed marriages must be applied also to marriages to which there is an impediment of disparity of worship.

This impediment, like that of mixed religion, is based on the natural and on divine law. The natural law, as stated above, forbids endangering one's faith without necessity. The divine law has a positive foundation in Holy Writ, which reprobates unions between Jews and Gentiles.[48] Christianity in the beginning was more lenient in this respect, for reasons which were certainly justified.[49] The Christian Emperors declared marriages between Jews and Christians illegitimate.[50] This civil legislation was adopted by a number of councils (Elvira, 305, Toledo VI and X, Orleans and Clermont).[51] In the eleventh and twelfth centuries canonists regarded heresy as a diriment impediment. Gradually, however, since the beginning of the thirteenth century, by custom rather than by positive law, a distinction was made between infidelity and heresy with regard to marriage.[52]

1. The foundation of this impediment is the essential difference of religion brought about by Baptism. Hence a pagan, whether Buddhist, Brahman, Mussulman, or a Jew, even though enrolled among the catechumens, 48 Exod. 34, 16; Deut. 7, 3 f.

49 Cfr. Tertull., De Corona, c. 13; De Monogamia, c. 11; Ad Uxorem, II, 3. He rebukes marriages with pagans, but never says they are invalid.

50 L. 2, Cod. Theod., III, 7; l. 2, ib. XVI, 8; l. 6, Cod. I, 9.

51 Cfr. Freisen, l. c., p. 635 f.

52 Bened. XIV, "Singulari Nobis," Feb. 9, 1747, § 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google cannot validly contract a marriage with a baptized Catholic.

2. Note the difference between marriages contracted before May 19, 1918, and after that date. The Code, while it legislates only for Catholics, appears to imply that after the date mentioned Catholics only are bound by this impediment. Such, at least, seems to be the prevalent opinion.[53] But the question arises, What about the impediment if contracted before May 19, 1918? Take an example. James, a Jew, married Gemma, a baptized Anglican, in 1913. Was the marriage valid? No, because before the promulgation of the Code the impediment of disparity of worship bound baptized Protestants. Has the marriage become valid since the promulgation of the Code? No, because marriages contracted invalidly by reason of ecclesiastical impediments abrogated by the New Code do not become valid by its promulgation. Hence if either James or Gemma should become a Catholic, they would need a dispensation or, possibly, a sanatio in radice. This is the answer given by the Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code.[54] There is only one difficulty connected with this answer: The number (1) which contains the answer speaks exclusively of promulgation, whilst the following number, which treats of spiritual relationship, takes May 19, 1918, as the date on which the impediment, as formerly understood, ceased. However, since the same Commission speaks in n. 6 of the ius vigens (the law as now in force), we believe that promulgation in our case, which has no date, must be taken as May 19, 1918, or the date on which the Code commenced to be law.

53 Cfr. Am. Eccl. Rev., 1918, Vol. LVIII, p. 484. The quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition seem to prove the contrary.

54 June 2–3, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 346).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. The Catholic who cannot validly marry a non-baptized person is one who was either baptized in the Catholic Church, or converted thereto from heresy or schism.

(a) He is baptized in the Catholic Church who has become a member of that body through valid Baptism. If a Catholic minister performed the ceremony, there can be no reasonable doubt as to its validity. But since private baptism may also be employed, and parents have the right of baptizing their children at least when there is danger of death,[55] Baptism must also in this case be presumed as given in the Catholic Church. The same must be said if Catholic grandparents, or guardians, have baptized a child in a case permitted by law.[56]

(b) Converts are persons who have been heretics or schismatics, but embraced the Catholic faith either by receiving (conditional) Baptism or by abjuring their former creed. Heretics are those who, after having received Baptism, retain the name of Christian, but pertinaciously deny or doubt some truth which must be believed by divine or Catholic faith. A schismatic is one who refuses to subject himself to the Sovereign Pontiff or to be in union with the members of the Church subject to him.[57] A heretical tendency is usually connected with schism. Heretics, then, and schismatics, if converted to the Catholic faith, cannot validly contract marriage with a non-baptized person. The question here arises: does can. 1099, § 1, n. 2, apply to the following case? James had been a convert to the Catholic faith for a number of years. Now he is engaged to a rich young lady, Gemma, who, though taken to be a Protestant, was never baptized. She is opposed to a Catholic marriage

55 Cfr. can. 742, § 3.
56 Cfr. can. 750, § 2, and what is said under can. 1099, § 1.
57 Cfr. can. 1325, § 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and mode of life, and spurns any insinuation as to promises. James finally gives way and leaves the Catholic faith, declaring himself a Protestant. After a few months the two are married before a squire. No doubt can. 1099, § 1, n. 2, renders that marriage invalid; for the form prescribed was not observed. But does can. 1070, § 1, also render it invalid? It might justly be urged that this canon supposes the party, actually there and then, at the moment of the marriage, to belong to the Catholic religion. Yet the rule of interpretation from parallel texts would seem to demand that the law of clandestinity be here applied to the case of disparity of cult. For the wording is almost the same. Therefore we believe that the marriage in casu is invalid on account of the existing impediment of disparity of cult as well as by reason of lack of the required form.[58]

§ 2 speaks of a common opinion to the effect that a person was baptized. Here is a case in point. Gemma was held by all to be a Catholic and married James, a Catholic, in church. But afterwards she told the priest that she had never been baptized. The priest baptized her secretly and probably thought this revalidated the marriage; but it did not, because the impediment was objectively and subjectively in the way of validity. Therefore, simple revalidation being impossible, there was no other remedy left but sanatio in radice.[59] Ignorance of the law enacting the impediment does not excuse. For impediments are not established for private but for the public good.[60] In the case just mentioned the proof that [58] Can. 1099, § 1, n. 1, causes some difficulty, because even a fallen-away convert is bound to observe the form prescribed by the Church.

[59] S. O., Aug. 22, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., 1907, t. XV, p. 8 f.); April 29, 1842 (Coll., n. 948).

[60] S. O., Sept. 19, 1671 (Coll., n. 202) says: "Et lex huiusmodi impedimentum inducens non fuit invincibiliter ignorata"; but this

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Gemma never was baptized was given in the confessional, and this was deemed sufficient.

More difficult would be the case where Baptism was doubtful. Most sects now-a-days care little for this sacrament; not a few openly spurn it. The rules given above for mixed marriages suffice to enable us to understand the Roman practice. For the rest, conditional Baptism may remove the difficulties. But the general rule stated above (under mixed marriages) that each Baptism must be examined separately, especially as to matter, form, and the intention of the minister, also holds good in the case of this diriment impediment.[61] See the answer given by the Holy Office to the bishop of Seattle (then Nesqually), that a general presumption against the validity of Baptism is not admissible. The bishop had asked concerning the baptism conferred by Methodist preachers, who were (and are) inclined to deny the necessity and efficacy of this sacrament and employ a doubtful form, especially in regard to the Holy Ghost. The Holy Office[62] answered that an erroneous intention on the part of the minister concerning the efficacy of Baptism does not affect its validity, and as to the mode of administering the sacrament, the ritual used by these ministers should be examined to ascertain whether the rite contains anything affecting the validity of Baptism. Inquiry should also be made into the conduct of the minister,— whether he observed the ritual of his denomination, etc. From all this it will be seen that no general rule can be established with regard to the validity of clause refers to admission to the sacraments; elsewhere the Holy Office declared that ignorance, even if invincible, does not remove the impediment; S. O., July 4, 1855; March 11, 1868 (Coll., nn. 1114, 1326).

61 S. O., Nov. 17, 1830; July 5, 1853; Jan. 24, 1877 (Coll., nn. 821, 1096, 1465).

62 S. O., Jan. 24, 1877 (Coll., n. 1465).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Baptism administered by American Methodists. That Anglicans baptize validly is taken for granted in the same document, whereas the Baptism of Quakers is rejected as invalid.

But in all cases certain proof, and not a mere presumption, is required to establish the validity or invalidity of a Baptism. Where no proof is adduced, the presumption is in favor of validity. The question how proof is to be furnished may cause trouble and a good deal of writing. If no baptismal record can be obtained, and no witnesses (sponsors) or parents are available to testify to the fact of Baptism, the party himself must be asked under oath whether he knows anything of Baptism being administered to him, what sect he or his parents belonged to, etc. Then the rules given above for mixed marriages may be applied. Until this is done, however, the party must be presumed to have been validly baptized, unless he and his parents were unbelievers, in which case there would be a strong presumption that Baptism had never been administered.[63] (See Appendix III, infra.)

Can. 1071 mentions the promises and reasons stated under the same heading in can. 1060–1064 concerning mixed marriages. The two promises must be made in the same way as in mixed marriages, and the reasons must be just as strong as, if not stronger than, those required for a mixed marriage. The Roman Court has always insisted upon very grave reasons.[64] However, the canonical reasons mentioned under can. 1054 will suffice. Yet if there were great danger of scandal, especially in an entirely Christian country, the Holy See might not dispense.[65]

63 Yet even in that case the possibility of Baptism is not entirely excluded, for it may be that the child was baptized in a hospital or by a nurse, etc.

64 S. O., Sept. 5, 1736 (Coll., n. 319). A long-standing marriage and offspring would be a solid reason.

65 The case of Popper-Castrone

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to the faculties of our Ordinaries, see under can. 1048. A few remarks may complete what is said there. There is a decision of the Holy Office which says that a dispensation granted without demanding the guarantees, or after the contracting parties have refused to give them, is null. The Ordinary may, without recurring to the Holy See for a final sentence, declare such a marriage when contracted without the promises to be void.[66]

The faculty of dispensing from the impediment of mixed religion is specifically different from that of dispensing from disparity of worship, and therefore the one does not supply the other.[67] But the cumulative faculty is thereby not curtailed.[68] If a dispensation from disparity of cult is granted to a couple already married, renewal of the consent is required, unless a sanatio in radice has to be applied.[69]

If the pastor, when asking for a dispensation, is in doubt whether a dispensation from disparity of worship or from mixed religion is required, let him ask for both and explain the reason for his request.[70] It may happen that in the meantime new proofs either for or against the validity of Baptism are brought to his attention. If the doubt against the fact or the validity of Baptism is so strong that it almost amounts to a certainty, the dispensation from disparity of cult should be applied. But if the doubt disappears in favor of the validity of Baptism, the dispensation from mixed religion must be used.

(Popper was a Jewish baron of Hungary) is proof of this, for a dispensation was denied (Arch. f. K.-R., Vol. LV, 161, 361; Leitner, l. c., p. 275), although an enormous sum had been offered.

66 S. O., June 21, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 443).

67 S. O., April 29, 1842; March 18, 1891 (Coll., nn. 948, 1750).

68 Cfr. can. 1049.

69 S. O., June 12, 1850 (Coll., n. 1044).

70 Cfr. S. O., April 29, 1842 (Coll., n. 948; Putzer, l. c., p. 394). Lehmkuhl's assertion (Theol. Moral., II, 752, 3) that the dispensation from mixed religion hypothetically and tacitly contains that from disparity of cult, cannot easily

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SACRED ORDERS

CAN. 1072

Invalide matrimonium attentant clerici in sacris ordinibus constituti.

A marriage is invalid when attempted by clerics in major orders.

This brief canon has a lively history and must be compared with can. 132, in connection with which we have given a sketch of clerical celibacy in the Latin and Oriental Churches. The Oriental practice,[71] which permits clerics to marry before they are ordained subdeacons, is not admitted in the United States, and no priests of the Oriental Rites are allowed to exercise the sacred ministry here unless they obey the law of celibacy.[72]

Celibacy was established as a diriment impediment for the Latin Church by the IInd Lateran Council, A. D. 1139, which made it obligatory also on subdeacons and thus raised this latter order to the rank of a higher or sacred order. Although attempts were made to abolish celibacy at the councils of Constance and Bâsle, the Church has always upheld this prerogative of her clergy.

The impediment arises from a sacred or higher order validly and willingly received. We say validly, for the impediment cannot exist, unless it has a foundation, and there is no foundation if the ordination was invalid.[73] But ordination may be valid but received unwillingly.

be admitted. For the negative answer of the Holy Office to the question: "Utrum intendat S. Sedes dispensare etiam super impedimento disparitatis cultus quando dispensat partem catholicam ad contrahendum cum parte acatholica" would seem to preclude such an assumption.

71 Bened. XIV, "Etsi pastoralis," May 26, 1742; "Eo quamvis," May 4, 1745; "Anno vertente," June 19, 1750; Milasch-Pessic, K.-R. d. abendländ. Kirche, 1905, p. 598.

72 S. C. P. F., Oct. 1, 1890; June 13, 1891; May 10, 1892.

73 Reiffenstuel in Reg. Juris 52 in 6°; Engel, III, 3, n. 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 214 declares a validly ordained clergyman free from the obligation of celibacy if ordination was administered under compulsion or grave fear.[74]

The effect of this impediment is that it invalidates a marriage to be contracted, but does not dissolve a marriage already validly contracted. Therefore the wife of a cleric who has received higher orders with Apostolic dispensation [75] cannot contract a new marriage.[76]

The source of the impediment is not the vow attached to celibacy,[77] but the ecclesiastical law which forbids sacred ministers, for reasons of the public good, to contract marriage. The vow is only an accessory, and, we may say, a safeguard of the law which imposes the obligation of continency. Therefore this impediment is specifically distinct from that of solemn profession.

Although this impediment is iuris ecclesiastici, and binds only the clergy of the Latin Church,[78] yet dispensations from it, especially when the diaconate is involved, are exceedingly rare.* This may be seen from can. 1043, which excepts from the power of dispensation the case of priests. If such a case comes before a pastor or confessor (danger of death), nothing can be done but to impart absolution, provided the penitent is properly disposed and agrees to separate from the woman and repair the scandal he has given.

74 Cfr. S. C. C., Yprens., Dec. 16, 1719 (Richter, Trid., p. 201 f., n. 1).

75 Can. 132, § 3.

76 Sanchez, l. c., l. VII, disp. 40, nn. 2, 6.

77 A vow was maintained by Sanchez, l. c., VII, disp. 27, n. 9; but the majority of authors defend the view stated in the text; cfr. Wernz, IV, p. 534 (ed. 1); Scherer II, 367.

78 Whether a marriage attempted by a cleric of the Oriental Rite in the U. S. before subdeaconship would be invalid, has never been decided. Practically the question is useless, because such a priest could not exercise the ministry.

* See Richter, Trid., p. 202, n. 2.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION

CAN. 1073

Item invalide matrimonium attentant religiosi qui vota sollemnia professi sint, aut vota simplicia, quibus ex speciali Sedis Apostolicae praescripto vis addita sit nuptias irritandi.

Marriage is null also if attempted by religious who have taken solemn vows, or simple vows that have the force of invalidating marriage by special disposition of the Holy See.

After the religious state had spread and experienced a certain relaxation, especially in Spain, there were not a few cases of attempted marriage, with which the Church was prompt to deal. The marriages of religious were declared "unlawful and sacrilegious unions," "incestuous and adulterous," and condemned by civil and ecclesiastical laws.[79] The severe denunciations by Popes Siricius (384–399) and Innocent I (401–417) seem to indicate that they regarded solemn vows as an annulling impediment. They were formally declared to be such by the IInd Lateran Council, 1139.[80] Boniface VIII, in his much-discussed Decretal,[81] added nothing new to the intrinsic force of the prohibition, but merely declared that the distinction between solemn and private vows was introduced with the sanction of the Church (constitutione ecclesiae). It was the view of the School,[82] as well as the Roman practice up to the time of the foundation of the Society of Jesus, that vows taken either explicitly or implicitly in an approved religious order were solemn and 79 Cfr. Coustant, Epp. Rom. Pont., pp. 629, 688, 755.

80 C. 40, C. 27, q. 1.

81 C. un. 6°, III, 15; cfr. c. 9, X, III, 32.

82 Cfr. Bern. Pap., Summa, ed. Laspeyres, p. 149; Tancred, Summa, ed. Wunderlich, p. 20.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

constituted a diriment impediment to marriage. When the Jesuits drew a distinction between solemn and simple vows among their members, it became necessary to have a declaration by the Apostolic See that the members of the Society with simple vows were true religious. The consequence was that Gregory XIII attached to these simple vows the same effects, as concerns the vow of chastity, which flow from solemn vows.[83] Hence the clause in our Code: "by special disposition of the Holy See."

1. The foundation of this impediment is solemn profession, which, like the impediment itself, originates in the sanction of the Church and is therefore iuris ecclesiastici. If simple vows have the power of invalidating marriage, this is not by the common law of the Church, but by a special ruling of the Apostolic See. By common law only those religious orders in which solemn vows are taken, and in these orders only those members who have pronounced solemn vows, are affected by this impediment.

2. For solemn profession to induce this impediment, it must be made validly, according to the conditions established in our Code.[84] If the solemn vow was dispensed from, there is no effect invalidating marriage.

3. There is a specific difference between the impediment arising from sacred orders and that attached to solemn profession, owing to the fact that they have a different foundation, inasmuch as sacred orders constitute a marriage impediment not by reason of the concomitant vow of chastity, but merely by ecclesiastical law; whereas solemn profession is an impediment by reason of the vow

83 Greg. XIII, "Quanto fructuosius," Feb. 1, 1583; "Ascendente Domino," May 25, 1584.

84 Cfr. can. 572 and our Commentary, Vol. III, p. 254 ff.; S. C. C., March 26, April 9, 1718 (Richter, Trid., p. 255, n. 93).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

itself, and indirectly in virtue of the ecclesiastical law that sets up the distinction between solemn and simple vows. The consequence is that one who is in sacred orders, and at the same time solemnly professed, is bound by two impediments, and the Ordinary who may enjoy the faculties of dispensing from impediments iuris ecclesiastici would have to "cumulate" the faculties.[85] Note that although the Holy See may dispense from this impediment, yet it does so only in very rare cases and always restricts the dispensation to the one marriage for which dispensation is granted.[86]

4. The decretals[87] as well as our Code[88] attach a further effect to solemn profession, viz., the dissolution of a marriage which is ratified but not yet consummated. For that purpose a space of two months was generally granted, during which both parties were free to consummate the marriage or not. After the lapse of this period the party who refused to render the debitum coniugale could be compelled by the ecclesiastical judge either to render it, or to embrace the religious state and make solemn vows.[89] In order, however, that the other party who is unwilling to enter religion need not wait four years (one year's novitiate and three years of temporary profession), recourse to the S. C. Rel. may be had to permit acceleration of solemn profession. Now-a-days no one bound by the marriage bond can be validly received into any religious order without an Apostolic indult.[90] Therefore after the very first moment of a valid union, the case must be brought before the Apostolic See,

85 S. O., July 1, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1758): "Monialis aegrotans in concubinatu vivens cum diacono," in which case can. 1043 may be applied.

86 De Smet, l. c., p. 348.

87 C. 10, X, III, 32.

88 Can. 1119.

89 S. C. C., Feb. 3, 1725; Leitner, l. c., p. 191.

90 Can. 542,; cfr. S. C. super Statu Reg., Jan. 24, 1861.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google which will demand proof of non-consummation. After this has been duly furnished, the party that enters a religious institute will be told to make solemn profession as soon as the Holy See commands. After the solemn profession the marriage is dissolved, because no dispensation is needed for that purpose.

In the case of a consummated marriage the bond cannot be severed by solemn profession and neither party can be received into a religious institute without the other's consent. Supposing the marriage was consummated and the wife enters a religious institute with papal permission and the consent of her husband, who remains in the world and takes the simple vow of chastity; may he marry again after the death of his wife? The vow of chastity seems to be against him; but this vow must be regarded as conditional,— conditioned, namely, by the state of marriage and the religious state of the wife. Both conditions being removed, the husband is free to marry again without a dispensation, unless, indeed, his vow was an absolute one of perfect chastity.[91]

ABDUCTION (RAPTUS)

CAN. 1074

§ 1. Inter virum raptorem et mulierem, intuitu matrimonii raptam, quandiu ipsa in potestate raptoris manserit, nullum potest consistere matrimonium.

§ 2. Quod si rapta, a raptore separata et in loco tuto ac libero constituta, illum in virum habere consenserit, impedimentum cessat.

91 Cfr. Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIV, 12, 16; Wernz, l. c., IV, p. 564, (1 ed.); can. 1058; can. 1309. Concerning the penalties incurred by clergymen and religious attempting marriage, see can. 2388: "Excommunicatio latae sententiae Sedi Apost. simpliciter reservata."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Quod ad matrimonii nullitatem attinet, raptui par habetur violenta retentio mulieris, cum nempe vir mulierem in loco ubi ea commoratur vel ad quem libere accessit, violenter intuitu matrimonii detinet.

§ 1. Between the abductor and the woman abducted with a view to marriage there can be no (valid) marriage as long as she remains in the power of the abductor.

§ 2. If the abducted woman, having been separated from the abductor and restored to a place of safety, consents to have him for a husband, the impediment ceases.

§ 3. As far as the nullity of marriage is concerned the violent detention of a woman is equivalent to abduction, when, namely, a man violently detains her with a view to marriage, in the place where she dwells or to which she has repaired of her own accord.

It is not necessary to cite the rather confused Roman law [92] on the subject, or ancient ecclesiastical discipline, which has not been uniform.[93] As an impediment of ecclesiastical law abduction was formulated by the Council of Trent.[94] Of course, it is founded upon natural law, inasmuch as it affects the freedom of consent. But the formal side of the impediment is strictly ecclesiastical or human.

The Code mentions two kinds of abduction: abduction proper and detention (§ 3). But both amount to the same and have the same effect. The requisites are the following:

1. The object of abduction is a woman, not a man, although boys, too, may be "kidnapped." It is immaterial whether the woman be good or bad, young or old,

92 Cfr. Cod. IX, 13; Nov. 143; Nov. 150.

93 Freisen, l. c., p. 590; the plainest canon is that of a synod of Meaux, VIIIth century (Mansi, Coll. Conc., XIV, 834 can. 60); cfr. c. 7, X, V, 17; Bernard. Pap., Summa, ed. cit., p. 231.

94 Sess. 24, c. 6, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rich or poor, marriageable or not, whether betrothed to the abductor or not. All these qualities are purely accidental.[95]

2. The abduction as well as the detention must be violent. Now abduction means removal from one place to another even though it be in the same town or house, assuming that the latter has several apartments.[96] Detention may take place in the same room, but it must be violent, i. e., effected by physical compulsion, fraud or allurement. It does not matter whether it is perpetrated by the abductor himself or by his accomplices and friends, even if they be the parents of the woman.[97] But violence naturally supposes that the woman does not consent to or connive at the abduction,— hence nolentem mulierem, an unwilling woman. If the woman consented to the abduction, but afterwards repented, there would be no violence,[98] though there may be violent detention. But the unwillingness to consent must be in the woman herself, in other words, though the parents may be opposed to the abduction and to the marriage, if the woman is satisfied, there is no impediment.[99]

3. The end or purpose of the abduction or detention must be marriage with the abductor or detainer. If the motive were other, for instance, merely vesanus amor,[1] or satisfaction, or material gain, the impediment would not arise; therefore the Code says: intuitu matrimonii. This is so true that even if the original intention were afterwards changed into that of contracting marriage, 95 Boekhn, IV, 6, n. 54; Gasparri, l. c., n. 621; Wernz, l. c., IV, p. 419 (1 ed.); v. Scherer, II, 380.

96 Santi-Leitner, IV, 1, n. 159.

97 S. C. C., June 25, Aug. 27, 1864 (A. S. S., I, 15 ff.); Reg. Iuris, 72 in 6°.

98 Sanchez, l. c., l. VII, disp. 12, n. 7 f.

99 S. C. C., March 5, 1714 (Richter, Trid., p. 252, n. 90); A. S. S., I, 63; Sanchez, l. c., n. 9.

1 S. C. S., ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

there would be abduction in the canonical sense. This also holds true if one abducts his own fiancée, provided the abduction is perpetrated for the purpose of marriage.[2]

4. Violent abduction — not detention, because of the contradictio in adiecto that would follow — ceases as soon as the woman is in a safe place and freely consents to the marriage. Freedom of consent is all that is required, and the impediment is removed as soon as this freedom is restored.[3]

CRIME

CAN. 1075

Valide contrahere nequeunt matrimonium:

1.° Qui, perdurante eodem legitimo matrimonio, adulterium inter se consummarunt et fidem sibi mutuo dederunt de matrimonio ineundo vel ipsum matrimonium, etiam per civilem tantum actum, attentarunt;

2.° Qui, perdurante pariter eodem legitimo matrimonio, adulterium inter se consummarunt eorumque alter coniugicidium patravit;

3.° Qui mutua opera physica vel morali, etiam sine adulterio, mortem coniugi intulerunt.

There can be no valid marriage between:

1.° Those who, during the same legitimate marriage, have committed adultery with and promised marriage to each other or attempted it, even by a merely civil act (promissio cum adulterio).

2.° Those who during the same legitimate marriage have committed adultery together and one of them conjugicide (uno machinante et adulterio).

2 All the decisions quoted in A. S. S., I, 57 f.; IX, 519 f.; XXI, 593; XXIII, 451 ff. are not to the point, because the girl in the case connived at or consented to the abduction.

3 Concerning the penalty, see can. 2353.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° Those who, even without adultery, caused the death of a partner by mutual coöperation, either physical or moral (utroque machinante absque adulterio).

This so-called impediment of crime was acknowledged by the synod of Tribur, A. D. 896, whose 40th canon was received into the Decree of Gratian.[4] The Decretals[5] also mention it, and the canonists have explained it more elaborately. The reason for making crime an impediment, Sanchez says,[6] is to preclude the hope of a future marriage to adulterous conjugicides. It is founded on natural law,[7] though as a formal impediment it is ecclesiastical.[8] As it contains a threefold distinct species, this must be plainly indicated in the petition for dispensation, as explained under can. 1053.

The first species is adultery with a promise of marriage. This impediment is incurred only if:

1. The act of adultery is complete and formal, that is if perfect carnal intercourse (copula per se apta ad generationem) has taken place, with or without subsequent pregnancy, and one of the parties at least must be aware of the married state of the other. James, an unmarried man, has carnal intercourse with Gemma, who is lawfully married to Brutus. If James knows nothing of Gemma's being married, there is no formal, but merely material, adultery. It does not matter whether Gemma is separated or civilly divorced from her husband, or whether the latter had consummated his legal marriage with Gemma, as long as a valid marriage tie exists between the two. However, it might happen that a civilly divorced woman, in our case Gemma, would not regard

4 C. 4, C. 31, q. 1.
5 Cfr. X, IV, 17; V. 16.
6 L. c., l. VII, disp. 79, n. 1.
7 The Mosaic Law in Lev. 20, 10; Deut. 22, 20. The Roman Law in l. 6, Dig. 48, 5; l. 4, Cod. IX, 9; Nov. 134, c. 12.
8 Benedict XIV, "Aestas," Apr. 11, 1757, n. XV.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it as adultery, but merely as fornication, to have intercourse with an unmarried man. In that case there would be no formal adultery.

2. The second condition for the impediment is a mutual promise of, or an attempt at, marriage. This promise must be a serious, free and mutual promise, the object of which is marriage, not "free love," or something else. Neither would a conditional promise, as long as the condition is not verified, be sufficient to induce the promise or impediment. Of course, such a promise is neither licit nor valid. Thus in our case James (unmarried) may have committed adultery with Gemma (married) and promised to marry her after the death of her husband. The latter dies a natural death.[9] In that case there would be the impediment of crime if adultery was committed and a promise of marriage made. However, if the promise was conditional, for instance, "provided Brutus dies a natural death," or "provided he leaves an insurance policy of $5000," some authors [10] say that a conditional promise not verified before the death of the innocent party must be looked upon as annulling the promise, and that there would be no impediment. It is difficult to understand this reasoning; for certainly a conditional consent is possible and admissible, and on the other hand the conditions mentioned above are possible and admissible and may certainly be combined with a serious,[11] externally manifested and mutual promise of future marriage. Equal to a promise of marriage (which, of course, need not be made in the form of an engagement), is an attempted marriage. To attempt

9 S. C. C., March 26, 1746 (Richter, Trid., p. 268, n. 109).

10 Gasparri, l. c., n. 648; Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 404, n. 524.

11 Cfr. Sanchez, l. c., VII, disp. 79, n. 11 f. Wernz admits a condition, but one to be verified before death; — why? c. 7, X, IV, 17, does not militate against our view.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage here means not merely to plan or prepare for marriage, but to contract marriage invalidly by words expressing consent or by some other sign involving a promise of consent. Therefore, even if a civil divorce was granted, and polygamy could not be charged, and the marriage was performed before the civil magistrate, the Church would look upon this second (civil) marriage as a mere attempt. But this attempt would amount to a promise of marriage according to ecclesiastical usage, and would suffice to constitute the impediment of crime, provided adultery had been committed.

3. There is a third condition to be considered; the adultery and the promise of marriage must occur during the same lawful marriage, perdurante eodem legitimo matrimonio.[12] To illustrate: James is lawfully married to Gemma, but commits adultery with Anna, without promising to marry her. After Gemma's death he legally marries Olga, and during this marriage promises to marry Anna, but does not commit adultery with the latter. There is no impediment of crime between James and Anna because adultery and promise must be related to one and the same marriage. On the other hand, it is immaterial whether adultery precedes or follows the promise, provided only the promise has not been revoked before the adultery was committed.[13]

The second species of the impediment is adultery with conjugicide perpetrated by one of the accomplices.

1. The adultery, as described above, must precede the death of the innocent party, but it is not necessary that it precede the plotting — machinatio mortis.

2. The death of the innocent party must be the actual result of an act performed by one of the accomplices.

12 Cfr. cc. 6, 8, X, IV, 7.
13 Sanchez, l. c., l. VII, disp. 79, nn. 7, 34.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This act may be physical or moral, as, for instance, counselling, commanding, hiring an assassin, in a word any co-operation the result of which is death.[14] Neither is it required that, e. g., Gemma (married), who has committed adultery with James (unmarried) should know about the act James intends to perpetrate.[15] But the object of the murder must be marriage with the adulterous party, or with the party that is made free by the death thus caused. Hence if Brutus would kill Gemma simply because she had committed adultery with James, and for the sole purpose of revenge, no impediment would exist.[16]

3. The adultery and the killing must occur during the same legitimate marriage. Therefore, in the case posited, James must kill Brutus after having committed adultery with Gemma, whilst the latter was lawfully married to Brutus.

The lawgiver constantly uses the term "perdurante eodem legitimo matrimonio." A legitimate marriage may exist also between unbaptized persons, and hence this impediment would seem to affect non-baptized persons indirectly, if they wish to contract marriage with a Christian, or rather, a Catholic. But if the crime is committed before Baptism, and both parties are afterwards baptized, the impediment no longer exists, because the Sacrament wipes out all crimes.[17]

The third species is conjugicide alone when the death results from the effective co-operation of the two parties.

1. Adultery is not required in this case.

2. But there must be a conspiracy of two accomplices against the life of one living in valid marriage. This 14 Mere ratification or approval would not be sufficient.

15 C. 1, 3, 7, X, IV, 7.

16 S. C. C., Sept. 28, 1726 (Richter, Trid., p. 268, n. 108).

17 S. C. P. F., Aug. 23, 1852, ad 5 et 6 (Coll., n. 1079).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conspiracy must be mutual and actual, not a mere ratification or approval.[18]

3. Death must actually follow this physical or moral conspiracy.

4. Finally, the intention of killing the husband or wife must be directed to marriage with the party freed by the other's death. Though this is an implied condition only, and is not expressed in the law, it is reasonably presumed, at least in foro externo.[19] For the rest, the intention can often be shown to have existed from suspicious familiarity, love letters, presents, etc.

Since this impediment contains a threefold species, it may be multiplied according to its combination with one or more of said species.

If both parties are married, this aggravates the circumstance, although it does not multiply the species.

Since this impediment was set up to preserve the sacredness of marriage and for the public welfare, it follows that ignorance of the impediment is no excuse from incurring it. This view is not only extrinsically but also intrinsically the more probable.[20]

The civil codes of the United States and of England do not treat crime as an impediment proper, but merely as a reason for divorce.[21]

CONSANGUINITY

It is not necessary to restate here the Hebrew law[22] concerning the various degrees of consanguinity. The Roman Law may be alleged only in so far as there 18 Panormit. ad c. 3, X, IV, 7, n. 4.

19 Schmalzgrueber, IV, 7, 2, 55; Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 408, n. 528.

20 Boekhn, IV, 7, n. 17; De Angelis, IV, 7, p. 188; De Smet, l. c., p. 401, says that this is the only view to be followed in foro externo. Dispensation from the 2nd and 3rd species are granted but rarely. Benedict XIV, "Aestas," n. XV.

21 Bishop, l. c., I, § 53, 65.

22 Lev. 20, 21 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is a distinction between the manner in which it reckons the degrees in the collateral line and the ecclesiastical computus. The latter says that brother and sister are related in the first degree of the collateral line, whereas the Roman lawyers [23] maintained that they are related in the second degree. It was the Germanic law that chiefly influenced the ecclesiastical style of computing the degrees in the collateral line. The Germanic tribes, taking the human body as representing the distance of the clans, counted from the head downward to the last knuckle of the fingers, thus finding seven degrees within which the prosapia (Sippe) was confined, and marriage within which was prohibited.[24] Pseudo-Isidor strenuously defended these six or seven degrees and gained his point, until the IVth Lateran Council established the fourth degree in the collateral line as the last for the diriment impediment.[25] Thus the matter stood until now. Our Code takes off one more degree.

EXTENT OF CONSANGUINITY

CAN. 1076

§ 1. In linea recta consanguinitatis matrimonium irritum est inter omnes ascendentes et descendentes tum legitimos tum naturales.

§ 2. In linea collaterali irritum est usque ad tertium gradum inclusive, ita tamen ut matrimonii impedimentum toties tantum multiplicetur quoties communis stipes multiplicatur.

§ 3. Nunquam matrimonium permittatur, si quod subsit dubium num partes sint consanguineae in aliquo

23 Fr. 1, 3, Dig. 38, 10.

24 There is still a dispute concerning the expression usque ad 7 gradum, whether it includes only six degrees; cfr. Freisen, l. c., 411 ff.; v. Scherer II, 299.

25 C. 8, X, IV, 14.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gradu lineae rectae aut in primo gradu lineae collateralis.

§ 1 determines the diriment impediment in the direct line: "In the direct line consanguinity invalidates marriage between all ascendants and descendants, whether legitimate or natural."

Johannes Andreae says in his "Lectura Arboris," [26] that consanguinity is a bond between persons descending from the same stock, contracted by carnal propagation. In other words, it is relationship that exists between persons who have the same blood in their veins. This relationship is confined within certain limits. There is no processus in infinitum, else we might say that all men are related to one another, as all are descended from Adam and Eve.[27] Yet in the direct line there is a certain indefinite relationship, which the Roman law wisely restricted to the seventh degree, adding that beyond that limit human nature does not permit man to exist.[28] Our Code does not state any degree, no doubt because it was deemed superfluous to make an observation as to further degrees.

We now return to can. 96, which says that consanguinity is reckoned by lines and degrees. The line is nothing else but the series of persons descended from the same stock. The degree is determined by the number of generations or persons forming the line. The line has been likened to a ladder,— the original image of ancestry, — which contains two sides and a more or less well defined number of degrees. The line may be direct or indirect, i. e., collateral. The former subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other,

26 Cf. Friedberg, Decretum Magistri Gratiani, p. 1125.

27 Cfr. Smith, Marriage Process, 1892, p. 115.

28 Fr. 4, Dig. 38, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google either upwards in the direct ascending line, or downwards in the direct descending line. Add now the degree or measure of distance in the relationship of one person to the other, and recall can. 96, § 1: "In the direct line there are as many degrees as there are generations, or as there are persons, not counting the common stock," and you will have the following scale:

James

Descending Line	Ascending Line
1	1
Son (Filius)	Father (pater)
2	2
Grandson (Nepos)	Grandfather (Avus)
3	3
Great grandson (Pronepos)	Great grandfather (Proavus)
4	4
Great great grandson (Abnepos)	Great great grandfather (Abavus)

James is therefore related to the son in the first degree of the descending line, and to the father in the same degree in the ascending line. To the great great grandfather James is related in the fourth degree, because there are four generations: great grandfather, grandfather, father, son, or if you prefer, there are five persons, not counting the common stock, or the great great grandfather.

The Code extends this relationship to any indefinite degree, and to natural as well as legitimate descendants and ascendants. The term "natural" here means persons born out of legitimate wedlock, no matter whether of a fornicarious (strictly natural) or adulterous or sacrilegious intercourse.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 establishes the extent of the impediment arising in the collateral line as follows: "In the collateral line matrimony is invalid to the third degree inclusively, in such a way, however, that the impediment is multiplied only as often as the common stock is multiplied."

Returning to lines and degrees, the reckoning is almost the same. The line is called collateral because, although the collateral relations descend from the same stock or ancestor, yet they differ in this that they do not descend one from the other, but branch out from the common stock. Again we must return to can. 96, § 3, which determines the degrees: "In the oblique (or collateral) line, if both sides of the line are equal, there are as many degrees as there are generations on one side; if they are unequal, there are as many degrees as there are generations on the longer side." Here then we have an equal and uneven collateral line, i. e. one consisting of uneven steps. For the unequal line, linea collateralis inaequalis, is one in which the relationship to the common ancestor is more distant on the one side than on the other, and in the latter case the more remote degree determines the degree of relationship. But it must be added that the line and degrees are reckoned in the ascending as well as the descending line. Unfortunately, in English, there are no names to designate the further degrees. Here are the line and degrees:

I. Collateral Ascending Line

1. Paternal Line

1st degree: Uncle, patruus (father's brother)
Aunt, amita (father's sister)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2nd degree: Granduncle, patruus magnus
Grandaunt, amita magna
3rd degree: Great granduncle, propatruus
Great grandaunt, proamita

2. Maternal Line

The same names in English, with the addition of paternal or maternal uncle or aunt. In Latin:
1st degree: avunculus, matertera;
2nd degree: avunculus magnus, matertera magna;
3rd degree: proavunculus, promatertera.

II. Collateral Descending Line

1. Paternal Line

1st degree: brother, frater sister, soror
2nd degree: first cousins, nephew, patrueles, whose fathers are brothers, first cousins, niece, amitini, whose father and mother are brother and sister 3rd degree: second cousins, patrueles magni amitini magni

2. Maternal Line

The same terms in English; in Latin, first cousins are called consobrini if their mothers are sisters, and the 3rd degree or second cousins are called consobrini magni.

III. Collateral Unequal Line

John (common stock)

1st degree: brother
2nd degree: nephew (first cousin)
3rd degree: grand nephew (James)

1st degree: sister
2nd degree: niece (Gemma)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Therefore James would be second cousin to Gemma, or, in Latin, in tertio gradu tangente secundum lineae collateralis inaequalis. For there are three persons descending in the longer line from John, and two persons descending from the same John in the nearer line; but according to can. 96, § 3, the reckoning is made according to the longer series.

IV. Multiplication of Relationships

Suppose James and John Murphy, brothers, marry Gemma and Olga, who are first cousins. The children of these two couples will be related to each other in the second degree on the father's side, and in the third degree on the mother's. For as brothers James and John are related through the common father, Murphy, in the first degree, and consequently their children in the second degree. Gemma and Olga have the same grandparents and are therefore related among themselves in the second degree. Add now the one degree accruing to their children, as stated above. Hannah, the daughter of James and Gemma, and Francis, the son of John and Olga, are related in the second and third degree, or the impediment is multiplied because of the multiple common stock.

Now this multiple impediment, arising from a double common stock, must be expressed in the petition for a dispensation. For instance, two persons are related in the second degree (first cousins) and their grandparents were also related in the second degree. Hence they are related in the second and fourth degree of the collateral equal line. If two brothers marry two sisters, their offspring are related to one another in the double second degree of the collateral line.[29]

§ 3 states that "Matrimony is never to be permitted

29 S. O., March 11, 1896; Feb. 22, 1899 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1920, 2040).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

when there is a doubt whether the parties are related in some degree of the direct line or in the first degree of the collateral line."

This is the practical answer to the query whether the impediment of consanguinity arising from the direct line, either ascending or descending, or from the first degree of the collateral line, is of natural, or of merely positive, i. e., ecclesiastical, law. The question has been disputed. While the first degree of the direct line has been considered by all as forbidden by natural law, regarding the remote degree of the direct line, and the first degree of the collateral line (brother and sister), opinions were divided. However, it is a physiological fact that the intermarrying of near relatives often produces bad results. Besides, reverence and piety should prevent near kinsmen from commingling their blood. And, finally, the social order requires the spread of social bonds beyond the narrow limits of clans and tribes. New and fresh branches invigorate the blood and harmonize the diverse elements of society. Hence Innocent III, although exempting the Gentiles from the observance of the law of consanguinity in the more remote degrees of the collateral line, would include them in the first degree.[30]

The intention of the Church is plainly stated in § 3 of can. 1076. She is not wont to dispense in the whole direct line, nor in the first degree of the collateral line.[31] And this holds good also in case the bride or groom is the natural sister or brother of the other party.[32] A case was proposed to the S. C. Concilii concerning a girl

30 C. 8, X, IV, 19; Trid., sess. 24, c. 5, de ref.; Wernz, l. c., IV, n. 413 f.

31 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874 (Coll., n. 1427, Vol. 2, p. 87).

32 S. C. C., Dec. 14, 1793 (Richter, Trid., 6. 261, n. 98), in which decision we read that Rome never granted dispensations from the first degree; example: the Duke of Richmond and Mary, daughter of Henry VIII.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

supposed to be spurious or natural, who was sought in marriage by a young man. Rumor had it that she was his sister, born out of lawful wedlock by a domestic servant of his father. Several witnesses testified to the fact that the girl was the offspring of the father whose legitimate son asked her for his wife. Therefore the petition was answered negatively.[33] Infidels married in the direct line or in the first degree of the collateral line to converts, would have to separate, unless they were and are in good faith and greater evils would result from a separation.[34]

AFFINITY

CAN. 1077

§ 1. Affinitas in linea recta dirimit matrimonium in quolibet gradu; in linea collaterali usque ad secundum gradum inclusive.

§ 2. Affinitatis impedimentum multiplicatur:

1.° Quoties multiplicatur impedimentum consanguinitatis a quo procedit;

2.° Iterato successive matrimonio cum consanguineo coniugis defuncti.

This impediment, as described in the Code, is newly formulated. Its foundation is valid marriage, whether it be only ratified, or both ratified and consummated, as stated in canon 97. The impediment can no longer arise from carnal intercourse outside of marriage.

§ 1 says: "Affinity in the direct line annuls marriage in any degree; in the collateral line it annuls it to the second degree inclusively."

Can. 97 determines the extent of affinity as follows:

33 S. C. C., Nov. 23, 1805 (Richter, l. c., n. 99).

34 Leitner, l. c., p. 206.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It exists only between the man and the blood relations of the woman, and likewise between the woman and the blood relations of the man. It is reckoned in this wise, that the blood relations of the man are related to the woman by affinity in the same line and the same degree, and vice versa. Suppose James is married to Gemma, and after the latter's death wishes to marry again. He cannot validly marry: in the direct line Gemma's mother, mother-in-law (socrus), or grandmother (prosocrus), nor Gemma's daughter-in-law (privigna), nor the latter's daughter, etc. In the collateral line James can marry neither Gemma's sister, nor aunt (amita), nor niece, nor first cousin. Conversely, Gemma cannot marry any blood relation of James in the direct line usque in indefinitum, and in the collateral line she cannot marry James's brother, uncle, nephew, or first cousin.

The common English and Latin names for the various degrees of affinity may be mentioned here:

father-in-law, socer	mother-in-law, socrus
son-in-law, gener	daughter-in-law, nurus
brother-in-law, sororius	sister-in-law, glos, fratria
stepfather, vitricus	stepmother, noverca
stepson, privignus, filiaster	stepdaughter, privigna, filiastra

The law texts which refer to our subject mention the following relations between whom no valid marriage can be contracted: a man cannot marry his brother's wife,[35] nor his mother-in-law, nor the first cousin of his wife, nor his uncle's daughter or stepdaughter, nor any relative whom he has defiled by carnal intercourse or married.[36]

35 C. 11, C. 27, q. 2. Innocent III permitted, for a time, the newly converted Livonians to marry the brother's wife, according to the Mosaic Law (Levir-marriage), but in future they should abstain from the practice (c. 9, X, IV, 19).

36 C. 8, C. 35, q. 2 et 3, c. 20, C. 35, q. 7, savors rather of illicit affinity.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here the old theory of the foundation of affinity is transparent, yet the addition "aut uxorem duxerit" may be construed as fitting the impediment of the Code. Besides, the text does not go beyond the second degree, but, like the Code, limits affinity in the collateral line to the second degree, though it admits of no restriction in the direct line, ascending as well as descending.

§ 2 says that the impediment of affinity is multiplied:

1.° As often as the impediment of consanguinity, from which it originates, is multiplied;

2.° By successively repeated marriages with blood relations of the deceased consort.

The first reason for multiplication is therefore to be gauged by can. 1076, § 2, which says that the impediment is multiplied only as often as the common stock is multiplied. This is evident, because affinity supposes consanguinity of either husband or wife, and therefore blood-relationship naturally reflects on affinity. However, affinity does not beget affinity, so that the relatives of the man do not become relatives of the woman's relatives, or vice versa.[37]

The second reason for a multiplied affinity arises from repeated marriage with a kinsman of the deceased consort. Therefore if James, after his wife's (Gemma's) death, would marry her sister (Anna) or her niece (Olga) or her first cousin, affinity would not be multiplied, because by the first marriage James became a relative only of Gemma's sister, niece, or cousin; and in this consists the simple impediment of affinity. But if James, after the demise of Anna, whom he married after Gemma's death, [37] Cfr. O'Hara, The Laws of Marriage simply explained according to the New Code, Philadelphia, 1918, p. 59.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would marry Olga, a niece of Gemma and Anna, the impediment would be multiplied. This appears to be certain. The Code says successive, which simply precludes polygamy.

Affinity in its whole latitude, whether in the direct or collateral line, is an impediment of merely ecclesiastical law, as Benedict XIV says.[38] However, observes the same Pontiff, so far it has never happened that the Pope dispensed from the first degree of the direct line. Since it is a merely ecclesiastical impediment, those not baptized are not subject to it. However, according to a declaration of the Holy Office, after Baptism this affinity, though contracted in infidelity, becomes a marriage impediment, in virtue of which infidels become subject to the Church and her laws.[39] And since in some missionary countries it frequently happens that a brother marries the wife of his deceased brother, the faculty of dispensing from the first degree in the collateral line was and is generally granted to missionaries.[40]

The civil laws of different countries vary as to consanguinity and affinity. The Revised Statutes of Missouri (Sec. 4312) ordain as follows: "All marriages between parents and children, including grandparents and grandchildren of every degree, between brothers and sisters of the half as well as of the whole blood, and between uncles and nieces, aunts and nephews, first cousins, white persons and negroes, are prohibited and declared absolutely void; and this prohibition shall apply to illegitimate as well as legitimate children and relatives."

38 "Aestas," Oct. 11, 1757; De Syn. Dioec., IX, 13. 4.

39 Aug. 26, 1891 (Coll. P. F., n. 1766).

40 S. O., Sept. 20, 1854 (Coll. cit., n. 1104); an interesting case of the former impediment is reported in S. O., Sept. 16, 1824, n. 2 (Coll., n. 784).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLIC PROPRIETY

CAN. 1078

Impedimentum publicae honestatis oritur ex matrimonio invalido, sive consummato sive non, et ex publico vel notorio concubinatu; et nuptias dirimit in primo et secundo gradu lineae rectae inter virum et consanguineas mulieris, ac vice versa.

As worded in the text, this impediment is entirely new,[41] since affinity has taken the place of the former impediment of honesty. The text reads: "The impediment of public propriety (or decency) arises from invalid marriage, whether consummated or not, and from public or notorious concubinage; and it annuls marriage in the first and second degree of the direct line between the man and the blood relations of the woman, and vice versa."

Two foundations are assigned for this impediment: invalid marriage and concubinage.

1. A marriage is invalid if there is a diriment impediment. Such an impediment may also be established by the civil power, as long as it does not manifestly clash with ecclesiastical legislation. Therefore if the State establishes adoption (see can. 1080), or consanguinity, or affinity, as an impediment, this impediment annuls marriage, and to obey it becomes a matter of public decency or decorum. The text simply says: "from invalid marriage," which certainly affects public honesty. On the other hand a merely civil marriage would be invalid if an ecclesiastical impediment, especially clandestinity, would be in the way.

The text says that it makes no difference whether the 41 This is also evident from the lack of any quotations in Card. Gasparri's edition.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

invalid marriage has been consummated or not. Hence it is immaterial whether there was carnal intercourse between the parties. However, we believe that, from this viewpoint only, leaving aside concubinage, the marriage would have to present the species of a marriage, figuram seu speciem matrimonii; otherwise it would be difficult to see the difference between an invalid marriage and concubinage. But the text, by simply saying, invalid marriage, supposes that it may be invalid from any impediment, or defect of form, or defect of consent. Not making a distinction, the lawgiver clearly intends to include the whole range of invalid marriages.

2. The impediment, we are told, may arise also from "public or notorious concubinage." The Code offers no definition of concubinage, but evidently adopts the view of canonists. According to these, concubinage is the retention, either in one's own or in a strange house,[42] of a woman [43] for the purpose of continued illicit cohabitation. Hence the essential point is that the unlawful relation is maintained habitually with the same person, whether married or unmarried. If married, the scandal and therefore the violation of public decorum would be greater than if she were single. But the concubinage must be either public or notorious. It is public when the fact is known to the people, or if the circumstances are such that one may and must prudently judge that it will be made known. It is notorious after the final sentence of a competent judge — ecclesiastical or civil — given according to the law,[44] or after a judicial confession of 42 The Roman Law (Dig. 26, 7; Cod. V, 27), insisted upon the fact that the concubine must be kept in one's own house, but canonists (cfr. Engel, V, 16, n. 21; Reiffenstuel, V, 16, n. 61) only demand repeated or continuous illicit relations with the same person; cfr. also Cath. Encycl., s. v. "Concubinage."

43 Some add: cum soluta, but others speak of either soluta or maritata; thus Engel, l. c.

44 There might be a difficulty between civil and ecclesiastical law on

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

guilt. This would be notoriety of law. By fact a concubinage would be notorious if it were publicly known and carried on under such circumstances that it could not be concealed by any artifice or excused by the aid of the law.[45] This is as far as we can explain the nature of the impediment, which must occasion many doubts.[46]

3. In extent the impediment of public propriety is limited to the first and second degree of the direct line. Hence James, having been married to Gemma, or living with her in public or notorious concubinage, cannot validly marry her mother or grand-mother, nor the latter's daughter or grand-daughter.

SPIRITUAL RELATIONSHIP

As the name indicates, this impediment is based on a sort of spiritual adoption, which, as Nicholas I says, is stronger than legal adoption.[47] The same view was held by the Emperor Justinian and is expressed in a law of A. D. 530.[48] Canonical writers seem to have taken special delight in enlarging this impediment. The Decretals [49] mention various customs, but adopt a milder practice if no contrary custom exists. It must be remembered that, in the Latin Church, Confirmation was not administered immediately after Baptism, but separately at a maturer age, and therefore the impediment of spiritual relationship was extended to Confirmation.[50] But the Italo-Greeks of Calabria and Sicily were bound by the impedi-account of the matrimony of conscience, and in that case the sentence of the civil judge could not be followed.

45 Cfr. can. 2197.

46 Am. Eccl. Rev., 1918, Vol. 58, p. 486.

47 C. 1, C. 39, q. 3.

48 L. 26, § 2, Cod. V, 4.

49 C. 1, X, IV, 11; the terms compatres and commatres, which often occur, signify father and mother of the baptized with regard to the godparents, wherefore no valid marriage can exist between the godfather and the mother of the child; c. 1, 6, IV°, 3.

50 Trid., sess. 24, c. 2, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ment arising from both Baptism and Confirmation.[51] The Code has considerably reduced the extent of this impediment, which now arises from baptism only.

CAN. 1079

Ea tantum spiritualis cognatio matrimonium irritat, de qua in can. 768.

The only spiritual relationship that annuls marriage is that mentioned in can. 768.

It arises only from Baptism and exists between the baptizing minister and the baptized person and the baptized person and the sponsor.

Therefore no valid marriage can be contracted:

1.° Between the baptizing minister and the baptized person;

2.° Between the sponsor and the baptized person.

But the parents do not enter into spiritual relationship. Neither the father nor the mother nor the consort of the baptized person contract any spiritual relationship with him, because they cannot be sponsors at all.[52]

The conditions required for the impediment are the following:

1. The Baptism must be valid, because otherwise there would be no foundation for a spiritual relationship.

2. If Baptism is conferred conditionally, the sponsor contracts spiritual relationship only in case he was sponsor also at the former Baptism; but if he is sponsor only at the conditional Baptism, he does not incur the impediment.[53]

It matters not whether Baptism is administered solemnly or privately, if the sponsor or minister perform 51 Benedict XIV, "Etsi pastoralis, May 26, 1742, § VIII, n. VI.

52 Can. 765, 3°.

53 Can. 763, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

their parts properly. However, if Baptism was conferred privately without sponsors, and a sponsor was employed only when the solemnities were supplied, the sponsor does not by his assistance at the latter contract the impediment.[54]

3. The sponsors must be designated or appointed as such either by the one to be baptized, or by his or her parents or guardians, or if these fail, by the minister.[55]

Therefore the formal consent of the sponsors is required; but if they do not formally and manifestly refuse when appointed, their consent may be lawfully presumed. The reason is that the sponsors must take upon themselves certain duties, such as to procure the Christian education of the child in case the parents should die or neglect their obligation.[56]

4. The sponsor must, at Baptism, hold or touch or receive the baptized person from the baptismal font or the hands of the minister.[57] In other words, he must perform the physical act which is generally and by custom considered as the conventional sign of sponsorship.[58]

5. If the sponsor acts by proxy, which is permissible, his representative must act like the sponsor, but spiritual relationship is contracted not by the proctor, but by the one whom he represents.[59] Whether the proctor needs to be endowed with the same qualities as the sponsor himself, is not stated in the Code. But we hardly believe that non-Catholics would be admissible as proctors.[60]

54 Can. 762, § 2; S. C. C., May 16, 1711 (Richter, Trid., p. 266, n. 106): The pastor accidentally forgot to write down that the godfather assisted only at the subsequent solemnity, but the sponsor could prove the fact, and therefore the S. C. declared that no impediment existed.

55 Can. 765, 4°.

56 S. O., Sept. 15, 1869 (Coll., n. 1347); Pignatelli, Consult., t. VII, cons. 98, n. 7 f.

57 Can. 765, 5°.

58 S. C. EE. et RR. Regesta, 1592–93, P. 1, p. 39b.

59 Can. 765, 5°; S. C. C., March 15, 1631; Sept. 13, 1721 (Richter, Trid., p. 266).

60 Cfr. can. 1657, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6. The sponsor must not belong to any heretical or schismatical sect, or be excommunicated by either a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, or suffer from infamy of law, or be excluded from legal actions, or be a deposed or degraded cleric.[61] The Holy Office decided that Baptism should be conferred without sponsors rather than with heretical or schismatical ones.[62] If of two sponsors one would be a non-Catholic, he would assist merely as a witness, not as sponsor.[63] From this the conclusion may be easily drawn that non-Catholics, although baptized and apparently acting as godparents, do not contract the impediment, as it is of merely ecclesiastical law.

7. Finally it must be noticed that this impediment can not be multiplied. Therefore, even if one should be sponsor to several children of the same family, or even of a whole town, the spiritual relationship cannot be multiplied.[64]

The Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code decided, June 2–3, 1918, that the spiritual relationship contracted before Pentecost 1918 ceases to be an impediment further than stated in can. 768 and can. 1076 of the Code.[65] Therefore there is no longer a relationship between the parents and the baptizing minister, nor between the sponsors and the parents of the baptized person, nor any one arising from confirmation, nor any double relation.

LEGAL ADOPTION

The Church accepted adoption as expounded in the Roman Law and made it an ecclesiastical impediment for all countries in which it contained at least the essential

61 Can. 765, 2°.

62 May 3, 1893 (Coll. P. F., n. 1831 and passim).

63 S. O., Jan., 1763 (Coll., n. 447).

64 Formerly it was multiplied, if the same sponsor stood for the same child at baptism and confirmation.

65 A. Ap. S., Vol. X, 346.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

elements of adoption proper.[66] Hence the codes of different countries had to be inspected as to their agreement with the substance of this juridical institution. The Decree of Gratian [67] as well as the Decretals [68] presuppose the Roman notion of adoption.

Adoption was said to imitate nature,[69] because it is a legal act by which persons are assumed as sons and daughters, nephews or nieces, who are not such by nature.[70] It was natural to bestow on such adopted children all the rights of parentela. The Romans distinguished perfect or complete from incomplete adoption, calling the former adrogatio, and the latter simply adoptio. By adrogatio one entered into perfect and complete dependance upon, or came under the paternal power of, the adopter. This was the case if a Roman youth who was of age or sui iuris, was asked (rogatus) whether he was willing to pass into the power of another. Adoption in the strict sense comprised only such children as were not fully emancipated from the power of their natural parents, and hence was not followed by all the consequences attached to adrogatio. Both processes required certain conditions, which had to be complied with in order to obtain the civil effects. Chief among these conditions was (a) that either the supreme authority for adrogatio or the magistrate for adoptio sanctioned the act of adoption; (b) that the adopting person was capable of exercising the paternal power, i. e., no eunuch, and at least eighteen years older than the adopted; and (c) that the adoption was made without conditions and personally, i. e., not by proxy.[71]

66 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioece., IX, 10, 5.

67 C. 1, C. 30, q. 3 (Nicholas I, Ad Consulta Bulgarorum).

68 C. nn. X, IV, 12.

69 See § 4, Inst., I, 11.

70 Voet, Comment. in Pand., I, 7, 1, t. 1, p. 52.

71 See §§ 4, 9, Inst., I, 11; l. 5, Cod. VIII, 47; ll. 25, 34, Dig. 1, 7.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

How far the degrees prohibiting marriage were extended is uncertain. But the legistae of the middle ages as well as the canonists [72] distinguished legal paternity, legal fraternity, and legal affinity. The first, they held, annulled marriage between the adopting parents and the person adopted and the latter's children to the fourth degree. Legal fraternity annulled marriage between the adopted person on the one hand, and the children of the adopter on the other, because these were considered by law brothers and sisters of the adopted. Legal affinity extended to the adopter and the wife of the adopted and to the adopted and the wife of the adopter.

This was the status of legal adoption, so far as we can see, under the Roman law. In countries which embodied these notions in their respective codes, the Church held adoption as binding in the ecclesiastical court, no matter whether the civil law had or had not directly enacted it as a diriment impediment. Let us now hear what the Code says.

CAN. 1080

Qui lege civili inhabiles ad nuptias inter se ineundas habentur ob cognationem legalem ex adoptione ortam, nequeunt vi iuris canonici matrimonium inter se valide contrahere.

Those who are by the civil law considered as incapable of contracting marriage with each other on account of the legal relationship arising from adoption, are, by canon law, incapable of contracting marriage validly.

Two points are brought out very distinctly in this canon: (1) The Church accepts the civil laws concerning adoption in each country; (2) the extent of these [72] Bernard. Pap., Summa, ed. cit., pp. 161, 298; Tancred, ed. cit., p. 38 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google laws and their invalidating character does not depend on their conformity with the Roman law, but solely upon the wording and intention of the law as it exists.

Therefore, where the law sets up adoption as a merely prohibitive (impedient) impediment (can. 1059), the Church also regards it as such; whereas in countries which treat adoption as a diriment impediment, the Church binds the faithful to the same extent as the civil law. Whether a country admits all three: legal paternity, legal fraternity, and legal affinity, or one or the other only, depends on the wording of the civil law, and it is wrong to assert that the impediment exists only between the adopter and the adopted.[73] Note, however, that the civil law must not only describe and lay down the rules for adoption, as is done, for instance, in New Jersey,[74] but must explicitly state that the adoption, as described, constitutes a diriment impediment, otherwise, since impediments are restrictive of human liberty, adoption must be regarded either as prohibitive or a merely penal law.

With the exception of New Jersey, our United States care little about this impediment. However, as immigrants may come here from countries where adoption is established as a diriment impediment, we will mention some relevant enactments.

Belgium does not explicitly set up adoption as an impediment, though it acknowledges it as conformable to the Roman law (Cod. Civ., art. 343).

The same is true concerning Austria (Cod., art. 179–186).

Germany (Bürgerl. Gesetzbuch, art. 459) regards legal paternity as an impediment.

73 Thus O'Hara, l. c., p. 60.
74 Smith, Marriage Process, p. 127.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Italy (Codice Civile, art. 60,202) treats legal adoption as an explicit impediment.

Spain (Codigo Civil, art. 173–180–184) establishes legal paternity and legal affinity as impediments.

Switzerland (Zivilgesetzbuch, art. 100, 264, 268) treats legal paternity and legal affinity as impediments.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER V

MATRIMONIAL CONSENT

After setting forth the divine and positive laws which negatively determine the capability of persons for the married state, the Code proceeds to consider the personal coöperation of the contracting parties. This is given in the matrimonial consent. Under the same heading certain obstacles to valid consent are pointed out which were formerly treated as impediments. They are: error, servile condition, violence or fear.

The consent may be given by proxy or through an interpreter, who are therefore also mentioned in this chapter.

THE CONSENT ITSELF

CAN. 1081

§ 1. Matrimonium facit partium consensus inter personas iure habiles legitime manifestatus; qui nulla humana potestate suppleri valet.

§ 2. Consensus matrimonialis est actus voluntatis quo utraque pars tradit et acceptat ius in corpus, perpetuum et exclusivum, in ordine ad actus per se aptos ad prolis generationem.

This canon merely restates the Roman law, which says: "Consensus facit nuptias." The theory maintaining that the copula was required to render the marriage complete has no foundation in law. Hence our text says that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage is effected by the legitimate manifestation of the consent of parties who are qualified thereto by law; and this consent cannot be supplied by any human power. The matrimonial consent is an act of the will by which the parties deliver and accept the exclusive and perpetual right to each other's body for the purpose of performing acts apt for the procreation of children.[1]

CAN. 1082

§ 1. Ut matrimonialis consensus haberi possit, necesse est ut contrahentes saltem non ignorent matrimonium esse societatem permanentem inter virum et mulierem ad filios procreandos.

§ 2. Haec ignorantia post pubertatem non praesumitur.

In order that matrimonial consent be possible, it is necessary that the contracting parties at least be not ignorant that marriage is a permanent union between man and woman for the purpose of begetting children. Such ignorance is not presumed in those who have reached puberty.

These two canons establish the absolute necessity of the matrimonial consent, its physiological and physical object (can. 1081), and its bearing on the mental condition of the contracting parties (can. 1082).

1. Necessity of the Matrimonial Consent. The matrimonial consent is said to effect the marriage, because it is the will which, proceeding from reason, produces the contract between two persons endowed with reason and will. Hence carnal intercourse is a concomitant adjunct, but not the cause of the marriage; otherwise fornication might be called lawful. Or, as St. Ambrose ex-

1 L. 30, Dig. 50, 17; l. 11, Dig. 23, 1; l. 15, Dig. 35, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

presses it: "non enim defloratio virginitatis facit coniugium, sed pactio coniugalis." [2]

This consent — duorum in idem placitum consensus [3] — must be given by two persons who are qualified by law to contract marriage. The divine, the natural, and the positive law of the Church have set up certain impediments which have been sufficiently explained in the preceding chapter. Persons who are either relatively or absolutely bound by any of the diriment impediments cannot give an absolutely valid consent, although they may consent conditionally,— provided the impediment be removed.

The term iure habiles has a wider scope. It implies the natural capacity of externally manifesting the consent. To speak more precisely — the consent must proceed from a deliberate act of the will and be manifested externally, because, unless so manifested, it cannot be apprehended by men, who are bound to, and led by, the senses. Therefore, the Code says, "legitime manifestatus," which properly means, manifested according to the requirements of the law, or, in other words, in the prescribed form. As the form is more closely described in the next chapter, we may here take "legitimately manifested" in the sense of any appropriate manifestation, which according to common custom would be considered a marital consent.

The conditions of the consent may be explained as follows:

a) Since the consent must proceed from a deliberate act of the will, and the latter supposes the intellect to be in a sound or normal condition, it is evident that the parties must be able to perform a human act, that is to say, they must be in actual possession first and above all of the fac-

[2] C. 5, C. 27, q. 2; cfr. cc. 1–6 ib; De Smet, l. c., p. 72 f.

[3] Cfr. the dictum Gratiani in C. 29, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ulties of the mind. One not compos sui, or in a hypnotic state, or under the influence of narcotics cannot possibly perform a human act. An interesting case is that solved by the S. C. Concilii in a Strasbourg case, 1907. The bride had been in an insane asylum two years before the marriage, but had been discharged as apparently cured. On her wedding day she commenced to act queerly, and on the second day after the marriage she had to be sent back to the asylum. The marriage was declared invalid.[4] Here it may be well to note that the so-called incubation period preceding the outbreak of a disease has also to be considered. What are styled lucida intervalla, i. e., moments of apparently normal consciousness, must be taken with a good grain of salt and not easily admitted.

b) The consent is given by the will, and must be sincere, i. e., given without dissimulation, and serious. Concerning the latter quality, it may be safely said that the matrimonial consent is never presumed to be given jocosely, because no one in his senses can be supposed to joke in such an important matter. But it may happen that there is simulation. The following case was proposed to the Roman Court in 1883 and 1885.[5] James contracted marriage with Gemma before the civil and the ecclesiastical court of Paris. But he did not love Gemma, but Olga, with whom he maintained illicit intercourse before and after the marriage. The reason why he married Gemma was to obtain a dowry of $50,000. He went through the formalities of the wedding, but planned to get rid of Gemma. He administered poison to her in a summer resort, but Gemma, though suffering from the effects for more than six months, recovered and instituted

4 S. C. C., Nov. 23, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., t. XV, 478 ff); July 7, 1883 (A. S. S., t. 16, 262 ff).

5 Cfr. A. S. S., t. 18, 14 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proceedings in the ecclesiastical court. Her lawyer succeeded in having the marriage declared null on the plea that James had had no intention of contracting an indissoluble marriage, and therefore rejected the bonum sacramenti. Yet, since a feigned consent may not be presumed, but must be proved, the lawyer had to furnish proofs that James really intended no marriage with Gemma. Sanchez [6] offered the solution. This author, after having proved [7] that the matrimonial consent must implicitly be directed to, or at least not against, the indissolubility, says that only moral, not metaphysical, certitude is required to prove the fact of feigned consent. This certainty, not being defined by law, must be such as would satisfy a prudent man. Thus probable conjectures may produce moral certainty. The lawyer in our case proved from preceding, accompanying, and subsequent circumstances that James never intended to marry Gemma, but merely wanted her dowry. His love letters to and relations with Olga confirmed his intention to get rid of Gemma. Hence the feigned consent. The S. C. Concilii confirmed the sentence of the ecclesiastical court declaring the marriage to be invalid.

c) The consent of both parties must be morally simultaneous. It is not required that it be physically one. In any contract moral connection is sufficient, and the marital consent does not differ in this regard from other contracts, otherwise it would be impossible to employ a proctor. But a simultaneous act is required so that it becomes evident that the consent of one party endures and is not revoked at the time the consent of the other is given.

How much time may intervene between the consent

[6] De Mat., l. II, disp. 45, § 4. [7] Ibid., l. II, disp. 29, n. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the one and that of the other party cannot be precisely stated.[8] A proximate measure may be derived from the repetition of the banns after six months.[9]

The marital consent, unlike that required for certain civil contracts, cannot be supplied by any human power, — parents, or guardians, or magistrates, or by the Pope.[10] This follows from the very nature of marriage. For no one can claim power over a thing that depends on the free will of another, but by marriage the parties obtain power over each other's bodies, and this must be given by free and personal consent.[11]

2. This leads us to § 2, which determines the physiological and physical object of the matrimonial consent. The physical object is the body, or rather the right to the bodies of the contracting parties. This right is determined by the perpetual and exclusive union between both parties and by the primary end of marriage, which is the procreation of offspring. Note that the two properties and the end of marriage are mentioned together. Hence if both parties intended and expressed the intention in some way or other to enter upon a mere concubinage, there would be no marriage. But such an intention must be proved in the external forum. A proof would be if a custom existed, such as that in Victoria Nyanza, where men buy women like chattels, for the mere sake of concubinage, either for a definite or for an indefinite time.[12] In Turkish Armenia some men went to the Turkish magistrate apparently to contract a marriage, but in reality to have a concubinage sanctioned. It was decided that if both parties went to the officer with the 8 Sanchez, l. c., l. II, disp. 32, admits a seven or two years' interval; see, however, our text.

9 Can. 1030, § 2.

10 Pius VI, July 11, 1789.

11 S. Thomas, Suppl., III, q. 45, art. 1.

12 S. O., April 3, 1889, ad 2; Aug. 19, 1857, ad 5 (Coll., nn. 1700, 1147).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

same intention, namely to cover their concubinage, although they professed to contract marriage, no marriage resulted; but if only one party had that intention and lured the other into making such a contract by fraud or deceit, the marriage was valid in foro externo, and the guilty party must renew the consent, so as to supply his previous faulty intention.[13]

The question may arise, what sort of knowledge concerning the qualities and the end of marriage is required to make the contract valid? Obviously, the positive wish (animus et voluntas) to contract a dissoluble marriage amounts to a denial of the essential quality of permanency, and therefore, where such a wish and intention exist, no real marriage is contracted. But if only a vague notion of divorce existed in the mind, or the parties, though admitting polygamy or divorce, would intend to contract marriage without a positive and efficacious assertion of the right — as they claim — of divorce, the marriage would be valid.[14] Note that the question solely concerns the intellectual conviction of the contracting parties. How a condition properly so-called would affect the matrimonial consent, will be explained under can. 1086.

3. Can. 1082 is intimately related to § 2 of the preceding canon. It determines the mental condition of the contracting parties by saying that they must at least be not ignorant of the permanent union between man and woman for the primary purpose of marriage. This is cautious language, made necessary by the different views of individuals and the varying customs of countries. The indissolubility of the marriage bond does not flow from the primary natural law, which is the same in all and unchangeable,[15] but from the secondary natural law, which is 13 S. O., Aug. 19, 1857 (l. c.).

14 Ibid.
15 S. Thomas, I–II, q. 94, art 4 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a series of conclusions drawn from the primary law. Hence it is that the pristine ideal of marriage may be obscured in the minds of men, especially in half-civilized countries and in civilized countries which admit divorce. Education and social surroundings influence the judgment of men regarding marriage. The wording of the text is negative and merely excludes complete ignorance; hence it is not required that the contracting parties should realize the full extent of indissolubility or that they should be aware of all the details of conjugal life.

§ 2 of can. 1082 says that ignorance may not be presumed after the age of fourteen in boys, or twelve in girls. But though nature usually teaches them what marriage is after that age, yet if one of the parties would be found incapable of giving a real matrimonial consent because of a defective mind or lack of ordinary discretion, the marriage could not be judged valid; because in such matters truth, not presumption, is always obeyed.[16] A girl of twelve years and nine months was married to a man in the diocese of Ventimiglia. But though she had reached the age of puberty, she did not know what marriage meant and required, and hence the parish priest objected to the union. The Vicar-General, however, when informed of the facts, allowed the wedding and the pastor assisted. After eight months the man left for a protracted absence, and the girl married before the civil court. The case was brought to Rome and the S. C. Concilii decided against the validity of the marriage because, as it appears, the girl lacked the necessary discretion.[17]

But even after puberty is reached there may be an er-

16 Gonzalez, lib. IV decret., tit. 2, ad c. 2, n. 5.

17 S. C. C., June 13, 1885; May 19, 1888; Aug. 18, 1888 (A. S. S., t. 21, 162 ff).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

roneous opinion concerning the primary end of marriage, viz., the bringing forth of children. We mean strictly an erroneous opinion, not a condition formally agreed upon to avoid the purpose of marriage. Gemma married James, but refused to consummate the marriage, saying she would never have married, had she known of the copula. When the case was brought before the Roman Congregation, no direct answer was given, but a dispensation was granted super matrimonio rato.[18] This action is quite intelligible, for the girl was of age, normally developed in mind and body, and had not made any positive contrary agreement or act of the will before or at the marriage.

Finally we may add a word concerning the civil ceremony which in some countries is prescribed by law. How are Catholics to regard it? In itself the ceremony is not forbidden. But the Church can not accept the declaration made before a civil magistrate as the matrimonial consent which effects the marriage tie. Therefore a distinction must necessarily be made. If the matrimonial consent was lawfully given before the civil ceremony took place, the marriage is complete and the contracting parties are entitled to exercise the matrimonial rights. When they go before the civil magistrate to declare their consent, this declaration is merely a civil ceremony and adds nothing to the validity of the marriage already contracted.[19] But if the civil ceremony precedes the matrimonial consent to be lawfully given, Catholics are not allowed to have the intention of contracting marriage by the civil ceremony, nor can they validly give consent, no matter what the form prescribed. Consequently they 18 S. C. C., Dec. 18, 1869 (A. S. S., t. 5, 652 ff).

19 Benedict XIV, "Inter omnigenas," Feb. 2, 1744, § 10; S. O., Oct. 1, 1785 (Coll., n. 580).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are not married nor entitled to the exercise of conjugal rights until they are married before the Church.[20]

ERROR — SERVITUDE

CAN. 1083

§ 1. Error circa personam invalidum reddit matrimonium.

§ 2. Error circa qualitatem personae, etsi det causam contractui, matrimonium irritat tantum:

1.° Si error qualitatis redundet in errorem personae;

2.° Si persona libera matrimonium contrahat cum persona quam liberam putat, cum contra sit serva, servitute proprie dicta.

§ 1. Error concerning the person renders a marriage invalid.

§ 2. Error concerning the quality of the person, even if it is the cause of the contract, renders the marriage invalid only:

1.° When the error about the quality amounts to an error about the person;

2.° If a free person marries one whom he supposes to be free, but who in fact is a slave in the true sense of the word.

This canon contains what were formerly called the two impediments of error and servile condition. Error is here considered as exclusively concerning the contracting parties, not the sacrament of matrimony as such. The latter was dealt with partly in the preceding canon, and shall partly be dealt with under can. 1084.

1. Error is a state of mind in which one mistakes one thing or person for another,[21] as, for instance, when we 20 Benedict XIV, "Redditae Nobis," Sept. 17, 1746 (Bull., Prati, 1, III, 462 f.).

21 C. 6, C. 22, q. 2; C. 29, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

think A is B or a crowbar is a poker. In the first-mentioned case we have what is called an error about the person. Now since marriage is effected by the consent of the contracting parties, and the will can desire nothing except what is proposed to it by the intellect, it is evident that such a mistake affects the very substance of the matrimonial consent.[22] Gratian sets forth the example of Lia and Rachel, but his solution is rather quaint.[23] He could have simply answered that an error about the substance of the contract nullifies the consent.[24] It would be an error about the person if James married Olga, when he intended to marry her sister Gemma. Such errors are rare, because it is seldom that two sisters resemble each other so closely that they can hardly be distinguished.[25] An error about the person may more easily happen where marriage is celebrated by proxy. Such a case happened in China, in 1906, and was solved by the S. Romana Rota in 1913. Wang, a widower, wished to marry again. His son Paul proposed to him a widow, Lu Cecilia, of good character and fair looks. But she had no desire to remarry. Whereupon Paul asked Sang Anastasia, an old and ugly wench, to marry his father. She was ready to comply. All this was done by a mediator, John Yu, who informed Paul of the substitution. But Paul never mentioned it to his father, and the marriage took place in church. When, after the wedding, Wang saw his wife for the first time, he was greatly disgusted. The S. R. Rota naturally decided against the validity of the marriage.[26]

22 C. 14, X, IV, 1; l. 8, Cod. I, 18: "cum errantis voluntas nulla sit," fr. 57, Dig. 44, 7.

23 Gen. 29; C. 29, q. 1.

24 Boekhn, l. c., IV, 1, n. 33.

25 Such an incident happened some years ago in Missouri; the bridegroom himself was puzzled.

26 S. R. R., April 16, 1913 (A. Ap. S., V, 372 ff.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Error about the qualities of the other party is of more frequent occurrence. However, here a distinction must be made. It may be that the quality concerning which one is in error affects the person merely in an accidental way. For instance, Joseph Buro, a citizen of Bruxelles, who went by the name of Buro de Chancartier, married a baroness of Leyden, by name of Theresa Kraus, a rich widow. She protested at the trial that she would never have married Buro had she known that he was not of the nobility. This was a purely accidental quality, and no error that reflected directly or indirectly on the person, and therefore the marriage was declared valid.[27] From this it may be seen that a mistake about an accidental quality (wealth, intelligence, domestic habits, peaceful disposition, health, even concealed pregnancy caused by another man, etc.) does not alter the substance of the marriage-object, which is the person itself.

But a quality may be substantially equivalent to the person, and form the sole and exclusive reason determining the other party to marriage. Bernardus Papiensis puts a case in the following terms. There comes a farmer's daughter, whom James does not know at all. She tells him: "I am Mathilda, the daughter of the king of Apulia; wilt thou take me for thy wife?" James smilingly answers: "I will," because he had heard of Mathilda, and is willing to marry her, but not the farmer's daughter. The marriage is invalid, because though James personally knew neither, the quality of royal rank moved him to marry the person who pretended to be Mathilda.[28] Another case: Peter marries Antonia, whom he believes to be the first-born daughter of Count N.

27 S. C. C., Aug. 7, 28, 1745 (Richter, Trid., p. 244, n. 83). A similar case was decided similarly, because the quality was wealth; S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1817; May 27, 1820 (Richter, l. c., n. 84).

28 Summa, ed. Laspeyres, p. 293.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

He intends to marry the first-born daughter of Count N., believing that Antonia, here and now present, is that daughter. In the first case the marriage is valid, in the second case it is invalid, because the consent of Peter is directly and exclusively directed to the first-born daughter of the count.[29] This case can, practically speaking, occur only when marriage is contracted by proxy.[30] The error must be strictly proved, otherwise, on account of the favor iuris (can. 1014), the marriage would be reasonably held to be valid.

3. Error as to the servile condition of the other party. If a person who is free, contracts a marriage with one who is a slave, not knowing that he or she is a slave, this error or misapprehension annuls the marriage. If the servile condition of the one party was known to the other, there was no error or mistake, and the marriage was valid.[31]

But the Code says: servitute proprie dicta, slavery properly so-called. This, according to Roman law,[32] exists when one person is subjected, against nature, to the ownership of another, either by fact or birth. The slaves were called mancipia when regarded as a piece of property; venales when regarded as a saleable commodity; famuli when regarded as domestics; servi when regarded as bound to obey the commands of the master. These words in ordinary language were interchangeable and employed without distinction. From this strict notion must be distinguished another, that of adscriptii, who belonged to a certain property or estate and could be sold only with the land.[33] The Church, as is well known, mitigated 29 Clericatus, Decisiones de Mat., ed. Venet., 1725, decis. 19, n. 30.

30 Cfr. Wernz, IV, Vol. 2, p. 14, n. 223.

31 Cfr. c. 4, C. 29, q. 2; cc. 2, 4, X, IV, 9; Smith, Marriage Process, p. 70.

32 Cfr. Ramsay-Lanciani, Manual of Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 124; § 2, Inst., I, 3.

33 Maschat, Praecursus Juris Canonici, 1760, p. 15.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the condition of slaves and admitted them to a true and legitimate marriage, but retained the impediment of servile condition in the form stated above. Though it has vanished in civilized countries, slavery still exists in Africa.[34] Since servile condition is not an impediment except when it is the subject of an error, no dispensation from it can be granted, but the error must be removed and the matrimonial consent renewed, unless the circumstances of the case call for a sanatio in radice.

ERROR AS TO THE NATURE OF MARRIAGE

CAN. 1084

Simplex error circa matrimonii unitatem vel indissolubilitatem aut sacramentalem dignitatem, etsi det causam contractui, non vitiat consensum matrimonialem.

A simple error as to the unity, indissolubility, or sacramental character of marriage, even if it be the cause of the contract, does not vitiate the matrimonial consent.

A simple error is one that proceeds merely from intellectual apprehension, and has no formal condition or stipulation attached to it, nor a formal act of the will excluding a substantial feature of marriage (can. 1086, § 2). The Code emphasizes this by adding: "etsi det causam contractui." This signifies that the parties had the intention of contracting a union not in conformity with the notion of Christian marriage. However, in that case, especially if the parties had the intention of entering upon a concubinage, a distinction is necessary. If both parties had this intention and expressed it to each other, even though there were no mutual agreement, [34] Cfr. S. O., June 20, 1886 (Coll., n. 1293, Vol. I, p. 721 f.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the marriage would be invalid, for their intention was directed towards a mere concubinage. On the other hand, if the intention is occult and entertained only by one party, though the marriage may be judged invalid in foro interno, yet in foro externo the judgment would favor validity.[35] Such an intention depends largely upon the customs and views of the people or race to which the couple belongs. Therefore the decisions of the Holy Office take into consideration a twofold class of contracting parties: infidels and Christians. Concerning the marriages of infidels, missionaries are seriously exhorted not to draw the conclusion: "In dubio standum esse pro invaliditate matrimonii," because this would be contrary to the general principle that marriage enjoys the favor of the law. Each single case must be examined and judged on its own merits. Hence the first question is, whether a marriage was actually contracted, and the second, whether this marriage possesses the essentials of a marriage. Thus, if a woman would in good faith think herself to be the wife of a certain husband, and the husband would say nothing against that assumption, and the neighbors would not take scandal at their cohabitation, these would be signs of a real marriage by name and possession, and in such a case, though a doubt might still exist, the parties should be left in good faith, and if they wish to receive the sacraments, especially Baptism, they should not be repelled.[36] Missionaries should never fail to examine past marriages, nor are they allowed to keep silence about them, for although good faith may excuse the parties from sin, yet it can never make an invalid marriage valid. Still the mere opinion that marriage was dissoluble, even if combined with the intention to obtain a divorce in case [35] S. C. P. F., Oct. 1, 1785 (Coll., n. 580).

[36] S. O., Dec. 18, 1872 (Coll., n. 1392).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of adultery or for other reasons, would not render a marriage thus contracted invalid.[37] If a marriage is found invalid, as, for instance, among the Gallas, where slaves contract a contubernium or legalized concubinage, the parties must be separated until they are lawfully married. Neither are they, after Baptism, to be left in good faith concerning the dissolubility of marriage. On the contrary, they may not even be baptized until they have been instructed on the nature of Christian marriage.[38]

As to the marriages of validly baptized persons or those whose Baptism is dubious, the following rule must be observed. In case of error concerning the properties of marriage, if it is simple and without implicit or explicit conditions, the marriage is always presumed to be valid, because the general will of contracting marriage according to the law of Christ prevails over the individual or particular will, which is, therefore, as it were absorbed by the general will.[39]

But how may the matrimonial consent co-exist with a serious error concerning the substance of marriage, especially indissolubility, or the bonum sacramenti? The parties wish to contract a true marriage, as instituted by God, and do not, by a positive act of the will, exclude the essential quality of marriage, although they would exclude it if they thought of it.[40] Therefore Anna, who marries Paul under the impression that she can obtain a divorce from him in case the marriage proves unhappy, contracts validly. The thought of a possible divorce only made her more ready to give her consent, but the consent itself did not depend on this reason or expedient, 37 S. O., March 11, 1868; Feb. 4, 1891 (Coll., nn. 1327, 1746).

38 S. O., June 20, 1866, ad 25 (Coll., n. 1293, Vol. I, p. 722).

39 S. O., Jan. 24, 1877 (Coll., n. 1465); Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 22, 7.

40 C. 7, X, IV, 19; Gasparri, l. c., n. 903 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

although it may have greatly influenced the same.[41]

The object of the simple error mentioned in our canon is either the unity, or the indissolubility, or the sacramental character of marriage. The former two may more readily exist in unbelievers, but they also exist in countries which admit divorce. The Greek schismatics and most Protestant sects, especially the Calvinists, have little scruple in permitting divorce. The sacramental dignity of marriage was denied by Luther and his followers, who looked upon marriage as a "purely worldly thing." Now no matter which of these three objects the error may concern, as long as it is a merely speculative or even practical error which causes one to give the matrimonial consent, it does not annul the marriage.

CAN. 1085

Scientia aut opinio nullitatis matrimonii consensum matrimonialem necessario non excludit.

The knowledge or belief that the marriage will be void does not necessarily exclude matrimonial consent.

The source quoted in favor of this text is an instruction of the S. C. of the Propaganda, dated Oct. 1, 1785.[42] Some Armenians, as it appears of the Uniat Church, presented themselves before the Turkish magistrates with the firm purpose of taking a wife, not a concubine. However they thought that they could not contract a valid marriage, although if they knew of the sufficiency of the 41 This is the well known case of Paul Boni de Castellane and Anna Gould, which was three times proposed to the S. Rom. Rota, in 1911, 1913, and 1915 (A. Ap. S., IV, 146 ff., V, 312 ff., Vol. 292 ff.). The first and third decisions were in favor of validity, the second was in favor of nullity, which we could not understand, because the so-called new proofs merely affected insignificant details.— Cfr. Irish Eccl. Record, 1918, Vol. XII, pp. 279 ff.

42 Coll., n. 580.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

civil act for contracting marriage, they would doubtless intend to contract marriage. But their error does not render the marriage invalid, because their presenting themselves before the civil officer is a mere formality and does not offset or annul the act of the will previously made. For when the error is concomitant only, and has no influence upon the substance of the act, but affects only an accidental quality, the contract remains valid. Thus also if a party thinks or implicitly believes that he is concluding a dissoluble union, without having a clear notion of the indissoluble character, the marriage is valid.[48] This appears to refer to the so-called intentio interpretativa. For the party would rather be inclined to contract a dissoluble marriage, yet, because the mind is not sufficiently formed or informed, it must be supposed that the natural property of marriage is to prevail over a certain velleitas or obscurely conceived notion. In other words, the presumption of the law interprets the intention in favor of validity.

INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL CONSENT

CAN. 1086

§ 1. Internus animi consensus semper praesumitur conformis verbis vel signis in celebrando matrimonio adhibitis.

§ 2. At si alterutra vel utraque pars positivo voluntatis actu excludat matrimonium ipsum, aut omne ius ad coniugalem actum, vel essentialem aliquam matrimonii proprietatem, invalide contrahit.

§ 1. The internal consent of the will is always presumed to correspond to the words or signs used in the celebration of marriage. Why? Because no one is supposed to joke or to simulate consent in such a serious and important matter. Hence though one of the parties may deceive the other by directing his or her intention to something else than marriage, yet if he or she expresses his or her consent in the customary and formally valid mode, the marriage is presumed to be valid in foro externo, although it may be invalid in the court of conscience.[44] This is true even if one had postulated a condition in his mind. For instance, James says to himself: "I will marry her if she is pregnant, because I want to repair the wrong I have done her." If James makes no condition when expressing his matrimonial consent before the qualified witnesses and has not made any formal stipulation with her before marriage, the latter is valid.[45] For the words express precisely what they intend to convey, namely, the matrimonial consent. The same must be said concerning equivalent signs, for instance, nodding.[46]

[48] S. C. P. F., Aug. 23, 1852 (Coll., n. 1079).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 states that if one or both parties, by a positive act of the will, would exclude marriage itself or the right to the conjugal act, or an essential property of marriage, the contract would be null.

Here there is no mere error or opinion, but a positive act of the will. What is meant by the term "positivo voluntatis actu"? A positive act of the will is not a mere error, either about marriage itself or about the person of the other party; nor is it the so-called conditio apposita, an express condition. Hence a positive act of the will must lie somewhere between these two. Note that the external

44 S. C. P. F., Oct. 1, 1785 (Coll., n. 580).

45 S. C. C., June 23, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., t. 15, 239 ff.).

46 S. O., Aug. 22, 1860 (Coll., n. 1201): "Matrimonium firmum ac validum consistere quoties nutus, vel caeremoniae coram testibus praestitae, iuxta communem regionis existimationem, mutuum sponsorum de praesenti consensum sufficienter exprimunt"; cfr. S. C. P. F., Feb. 4, 1664; April 17, 1820 (Coll., nn. 156, 2262).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

consent, if given in the usual way, is presumed to correspond to the internal state of mind. This enables us to understand the term. A positive act of the will is an express declaration that one wishes to contract marriage in a manner which contradicts its very essence, object, or essential properties. Hence, like a positive law, this act of the will must be formulated and externalized or made known by means of a certain formula.[47] That no merely internal act can be intended, appears clearly from a consideration of § 1 of this canon. Besides, a merely internal act could never render a marriage invalid in foro externo. Direct proof that an external act is intended may be gathered from an instruction of the Holy Office.[48] After having stated that the individual will is absorbed by the general will of Christ, who raised Matrimony to a higher sphere and restored its original idea, the S. Congregation says: "But this absorption cannot take place if a formula is employed which contains an explicit or implicit condition against the perpetuity of marriage." It then sets forth certain Calvinistic tricks which were calculated to convince the contracting parties, at the very wedding, that they were entering upon a union which did not correspond to the command of Christ. Thus they abused Matt. 19, 9; 5, 32 and Heb. 13, 4 to insinuate the dissolubility of marriage.

Of course it is not required that this positive act of the will be declared to the other party; but it must somehow be manifested outwardly. A case solved by Innocent III plainly indicates that one party may deceive the other for the purpose of the copula. But this case also proves 47 S. O., July 22, 1840, ed. 2 (Coll., n. 903): "Matrimonium mixtum esse nullum, sc. parte acatholica expresse declarante se contrahere matrimonium de praesenti iuxta formulam perpetuitati matrimonii contrariam."

48 S. O., April 6, 1843 (Coll., n. 965).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that although theoretically speaking there may be no doubt as to the invalidity of a marriage contracted with the positive will not to contract marriage, yet practically speaking, or as a matter of fact, it would be hard to prove, unless circumstantial evidence could be offered to that effect.[49] A corroboration of this view is found in the answer given to the bishop of Sioux Falls concerning the marriages of Indians. He had asked whether they might be trusted if they declared under oath that they never intended to contract an indissoluble union. Yes, said the Holy Office, if each case has been duly examined as to the credibility and truthfulness of the parties concerned.[50]

The positive act of the will may exclude marriage itself. If one would contract a union merely for the sake of carnal gratification, it would be no marriage. Or if two persons would marry purely for friendship or for literary co-operation,[51] there would be no marriage.

Or the positive act of the will may exclude all right to the conjugal act, i. e., ius ad copulam, and thus deny radically the primary end of marriage. Different from the right is the exercise thereof. This is not essentially required for the validity of the marital contract and may therefore be omitted.[52] Hence the purpose of "avoiding offspring" would not per se exclude marriage.

49 C. 26, X, IV, 1, where the pope distinguishes between the fact and quid iuris sit, the latter being evident if no consent was given.

50 S. O., May 19, 1892; May 25, 1898 (Coll., n. 1796; Vol. II, p. 367): "Ut Indianus probet legitime se habuisse in contrahendo explicitam voluntatem repudii in causa adulterii, exterius manifestatam."

51 S. C. C., Aug. 6, 1881.

52 Cfr. cc. 26, 31, X, IV, 1; c. 5, X, IV, 4; A. S. S., V, p. 553 f. If we say that the exercise of the marital act is not essential to the marriage contract it should not be construed as if we would contradict our own statements concerning impotency and vows (cfr. can. 1092). For where there is not even a radical foundation for that right existing and admitted, as in the case of impotency and vow, no right can be foregone, inasmuch as every right supposes the possession or holding of something to which a claim may be made.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Lastly the positive act of the will may exclude the indissolubility and unity of marriage. Indissolubility excludes the positive will to contract marriage with the right to divorce.[53] Unity excludes polygamy. Opposed to this essential property of marriage would be the positive will to deliver the wife, or (if the woman would make the resolution) to deliver herself, to prostitution or adultery for lucre's sake.[54]

VIOLENCE AND FEAR (VIS ET METUS)

CAN. 1087

§ 1. Invalidum quoque est matrimonium initum ob vim vel metum gravem ab extrinseco et iniuste incussum, a quo ut quis se liberet, eligere cogatur matrimonium.

§ 2. Nullus alius metus, etiamsi det causam contractui, matrimonii nullitatem secumfert.

§ 1. Marriage is invalid also when it is entered into because of violence or grave fear, caused by an external agent, unjustly, to free himself from which one is compelled to choose marriage.

§ 2. No other fear, even though it would give cause to the contract, entails the nullity of marriage.

This is the so-called impediment of violence or fear, which was and still is, and must by its very nature be, of a rather fluctuating character. The Roman law, which permitted divorce,[55] looked upon marriage contracted under compulsion or fear as a contestable matter only. The Penitential books connect it with rape.[56] Gratian's De-

53 S. O., May 18, 1898 (Coll., n. 1999).
54 C. 7, X, IV, 5.
55 Fr. 22, Dig. 23, 2.
56 Wasserschleben, l. c., pp. 150, 170, 216, 410, 510, 641.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cree [57] and the Decretals [58] mention it in a rather cursory way in connection with the paternal power and the espousals of impuberes. Freedom is strongly insisted upon in the authentic collections. But it would be difficult to find a positive text to prove that vis et metus were introduced either by custom or by written law as an impediment, or that the Roman tribunals ever cited such a positive law when they declared a marriage invalid.[59] Therefore it is safe to say, with the Holy Office,[60] that the impediment of violence and fear is based on the natural law, and that consequently a dispensation proper cannot and is not granted by the Church in such cases. This view is corroborated by the Code, which places violence and fear not among the impediments proper, but among the natural obstacles besetting the matrimonial consent.

1. Violence is the onset of an outward superior force too great to be repelled ("vis est majoris rei impetus qui repelli non potest").[61] It may also be defined as physical coercion or constraint, which compels one to do something against one's will. In the matter of marriage compulsion signifies a violent act by which one is forced into giving one's consent, for instance, by the use of arms, or haling the other party before the minister or officer. However, it is evident, as S. Thomas says,[62] that violence cannot be done to the will as far as the proper act of that faculty is concerned, because this act proceeds from an interior principle, whilst violence comes from without. But it is also true, as the same holy Doctor says, that violence is directly opposed to the voluntarium, is against the very nature of free-will, and therefore causes the ac-

57 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, 4, C. 31, q. 2.
58 Cfr. X, IV, 1; c. 9, X, IV, 2; X, I, 40.
59 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 52 f., n. 266.
60 S. O., Feb. 15, 1891 (Coll., n. 2101).
61 L. 1, § ult., Dig. 4, 2.
62 Summa Theol., I-II, q. 6, art. 4 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tion of the will to be involuntary. Hence, marital consent given under such constraint would be of no account.

2. Violence causes fear, and is therefore related to fear as cause to effect. Fear is "a perturbation of the mind on account of an impending evil." [63] There must be a connecting link between the object of fear, or the evil threatened, and fear itself, otherwise fear could not influence the will to do one thing rather than another. In other words, fear must determine the will to perform a certain act exactly and precisely on account of the evil impending. And here it must be noted that fear does not render the act elicited or commanded or performed under its influence purely involuntary, but only under a certain aspect, viz., with regard to the evil threatened.[64] However, observe that right reason would rather consider the repugnance of the will as affected by fear in a matter of such weight and with such enduring consequences as are attached to marriage. The Roman law, admitting divorce, had smooth sailing; but the Church, which rejects the dissolution of the marital tie, naturally attached more influence to fear than the Roman State. In course of time she became the sole champion of perfect liberty in matrimonial matters. The psychological element prevailed over the metaphysical of fear.

3. Fear may differ as to cause, mode and degree.

a) The cause of fear may come from within or from without. It comes from within when it is occasioned by a natural event, the existence of which is not dependent on a free or human agent, for instance, an earthquake,[65] a shipwreck, a fire. From without (ab extrinseco) fear 63 Dig., l. c.; Tancred., l. c., p. 46.

64 Cfr. Summa cit., art. 6.

65 We still remember the earthquake of Jan. 13, 1915, which caused a panic in the "Holy City" of Rome for several days.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google may be caused by a free agent, i. e., man, who has it in his power to inflict it.

b) Hence the mode or manner of fear may be just or unjust. Fear is unjust when it is inflicted by one who has no authority or right to threaten the evil involved, or when it is threatened for no adequate reason, or for a reason not connected with the evil threatened. Fear is just if caused by lawful authority or by one who is entitled to make the threat, or when there is solid reason for it.

c) In degree fear is either grave or slight.[66] Grave fear may be absolutely or relatively grave. Absolutely grave fear is such as would frighten or intimidate any firm and prudent man or woman (cadens in virum constantem). Relatively grave fear is one which may affect or move to action some men or women, whilst it will not affect others. As the natural, physical and mental conditions of individuals differ, it is difficult to establish a general rule. Slight fear arises either from a light evil threatened, or from a grave evil which may be easily averted. Finally mention may be made of what is called reverential fear, which causes one to be afraid to offend his parents or superiors. This again is liable to various degrees according to education, psychological impressions, and other circumstances.

d) The Code most reasonably refers this kind of fear to marriage. Hence there must be a choice between marriage and the threatened evil that causes fear.[67] This is quite evident, for if marriage is not the evil threatened under the influence of fear, how could fear affect mar-

66 Cfr. Tancred., l. c., p. 47.

67 Hence the so-called opinio probabilior of Schmalzgrueber (IV, 1, n. 398) referred to by Smith (Marriage Process, p. 84), that no connection between marriage and the evil is required, is now destitute of probability, as it was in fact a priori.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

riage, or how could it influence the will to choose that expedient?

The following propositions, taken from authentic sources, will illustrate the text of the Code.

1. Proposition: Physical compulsion brought to bear upon a party in order to extort the matrimonial consent, simply annuls the marriage, because no free consent is possible where there is physical constraint.[68]

2. Proposition: Absolutely or relatively grave fear, threatened from without for the purpose of eliciting the matrimonial consent, annuls a marriage if the mode or manner in which it was inflicted was unjust, or if there was no adequate reason for threatening the marriage. Thus if one is threatened with the galleys or marriage, he would be influenced by grave fear, but though the mode was just, because inflicted by the judge, it was unjust, because the stuprum imputed was only proved by rumor.[69] The detention of a woman in a fortress by force would annul a marriage.[70] If one is threatened with imprisonment or marriage, and chooses the latter, the marriage is invalid. The instigators of that imprisonment were the parents of the girl, who declared that N. had done her violence, but after the forced marriage with N. she confessed that another one had committed the crime.[71] A case of fear threatened from without, but with a mixture of intrinsic fear, was solved in favor of nullity.[72] In other cases the S. Congregation has decided in favor of validity, if the fear was caused merely by empty threats

68 C. 14, X, IV, 1; Bernard. Pap., l. c., pp. 303, 347.

69 S. C. C., March 26, 1707 (Richter, Trid., p. 238, n. 71).

70 S. C. C., Aug. 19, 1724; June 9, 1725 (Richter, l. c., n. 74).

71 S. C. C., March 18, 1731; May 4, 1746 (Richter, l. c., nn. 76, 79).

72 S. C. C., July 13, Sept. 22, 1725 (Richter, l. c., 82). A grave fear may be inflicted by the refusal of the Sacraments; cfr. S. R. R., May 10, 1918 (A. Ap. S., XI, 89 ff.); but the case is allied to rape.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and admonitions, and was threatened not precisely with regard to marriage, but only to repair the honor and good name of the girl.[73] Thus it may happen, as we know from a case brought to our knowledge, that a man is forced by the brother of a girl with pistol in hand to marry her. Whether this happens on the same day or on the day before the marriage is immaterial, provided there be danger of life. But if the party thus threatened can escape by leaving the country or his home, the fear would cease, though, of course, the revengeful brother might follow him, and therefore the only real escape would be the marriage, which in that case we would not hesitate to declare invalid. Some authors[74] extend the case thus: Even if the evil threatened in connection with the marriage would affect near relatives, the fear would be sufficient to annul the marriage. Assuming, for instance, that the brother or first cousin of James is threatened,—if James would volunteer to marry the girl in order to save his brother or first cousin, he would be acting under grave fear, which would affect the validity of the marriage. The Code is not opposed to this view.[75]

3. Proposition: Fear threatened solely from within cannot annul a marriage because a necessary or blind cause cannot influence the will ad hoc, i. e., with regard to marriage.[76]

4. Proposition: Slight fear (metus levis) does not annul marriage because it cannot efficaciously move the will and diminish the voluntariness of an act. Besides, if 73 S. C. C., Sept. 1, 1725; June 18, 1735; April 24, 1700; April 23, 1701 (Richter, l. c., nn. 75, 77).

74 Schulte, Eherecht, p. 128, would include only relatives of the first and second degree, whilst v. Scherer, II, 176, extended it to more remote ones.

75 For it does not limit that fear to the person himself, and on the other hand it is perfectly true that a man with natural affection considers evil or good befalling his dear ones as affecting himself.

76 Sanchez, l. c., l. IV, disp. 12, n. 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

slight fear would induce nullity, the appeals for annulment would become innumerable and the indissolubility of marriage a farce.[77]

5. Proposition: Reverential fear (metus reverentialis), as long as it remains such and is not accompanied by serious threats, for instance, of disinheriting, or by blows, spoliation of ornaments (earrings, jewelry) cannot annul marriage. But if means such as those just enumerated are used to enhance the fear, it might suffice to annul marriage, especially in the case of children of a naturally timid and affectionate disposition.[78]

The right to attack a marriage on the ground of violence and fear is restricted to the parties who suffered violence or fear; outsiders are excluded from the duty and the right of making an accusation on this score.[79]

Lastly it should be noted that a marriage contracted under the influence of grave fear cannot be revalidated by mere cohabitation or by the copula etiam cum affectu maritali habita,[80] but the party who suffered fear must renew the consent according to can. 1136.

MODE OF EXPRESSING THE CONSENT

CAN. 1088

§ 1. Ad matrimonium valide contrahendum necesse est ut contrahentes sint praesentes sive per se ipsi sive per procuratorem.

§ 2. Sponsi matrimonialem consensum exprimant

77 Sanchez, l. c., IV, disp. 17, and Gasparri, n. 945, maintain that the ecclesiastical law rejects metus levis, but Wernz (IV, Vol. 2, p. 47, n. 263) justly observes that these authors could not allege a single text for their opinion, and therefore the natura ipsius metus levis is sufficient.

78 S. C. C., June 8, 1720; July 17, 1745 (Richter, l. c., nn. 72, 78); S. Rom. Rota, July 7, 1911; June 2, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 661; IV, 108).

79 Instructio S. C. P. F., 1883, n. 36 (Coll., 1587).

80 S. C. C., June 20, 1609; Dec. 2, 1634 (Richter, l. c., n. 82).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verbis; nec aequipollentia signa adhibere ipsis licet, si loqui possint.

To contract a valid marriage the parties must be present either personally or by proxy; they must express the matrimonial consent by words, and are not allowed to use equivalent signs when they are able to speak.

Christian marriage being a sacrament administered by the contracting parties, it follows that the latter must manifest their consent in the presence of each other in such a way and at such a distance that the act can be perceived by the senses. § 2 expressly requires the use of words, because these are the usual means of human communication. Equivalent signs, for instance, nodding of the head,[81] or putting the ring on the finger are allowed only when one or both of the contracting parties are incapable of speech. However, the use of words does not affect the validity of the consent.[82]

MARRIAGE BY PROXY

CAN. 1089

§ 1. Firmis dioecesanis statutis desuper additis, ut matrimonium per procuratorem valide ineatur, requiritur mandatum speciale ad contrahendum cum certa persona, subscriptum a mandante et vel a parocho aut Ordinario loci in quo mandatum fit, vel a sacerdote ab alterutro delegato, vel a duobus saltem testibus.

§ 2. Si mandans scribere nesciat, id in ipso mandato adnotetur et alius testis addatur qui scripturam ipse quoque subsignet; secus mandatum irritum est.

81 Cfr. S. O., Aug. 22, 1860 (Coll., n. 1201).

82 Cfr. cc. 23, 25, 31, X, IV, 1; Rituale Rom., tit: VII, c. 2 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 213 f.); S. O., Aug. 22, 1860; S. C. P. F., Feb. 4, 1664; April 17, 1820 (Coll., nn. 1201, 156, 2262).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Si, antequam procurator nomine mandantis contraxerit, hic mandatum revocaverit aut in amentiam inciderit, invalidum est matrimonium, licet sive procurator sive alia pars contrahens haec ignoraverint.

§ 4. Ut matrimonium validum sit, procurator debet munere suo per se ipse fungi.

The preceding canon simply stated that marriage may be contracted by proxy. Therefore, since the Council of Trent,[83] and now after the promulgation of the Code, marriage by proxy is lawful and valid.[84] This canon prescribes the modus facti, or what is required in order that a marriage by proxy be valid. After having referred to the diocesan statutes, which may require further conditions, the Code says:

1) A special mandate is needed to contract marriage by proxy with a specified person. This mandate must be in writing, must be signed by the principal and either by the pastor or the Ordinary of the place in which the mandate is given, or by a priest delegated by either the pastor or the Ordinary, or by two witnesses.

This is nothing else but an application of can. 1094, for the proxy takes the place of one party. Of course, if both would choose a proxy — which is not likely to happen — the same process would have to be applied to both proxies, and each must have a mandate signed by the principal, the respective pastor, etc.

2) If the person issuing the mandate (mandans) is unable to write, this fact is to be noted in the mandate and an additional witness must sign the document, else it is void.

3) If the principal has revoked his mandate or become

83 Sess. 24, c. 1, de ref. mat.
84 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 2, 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

insane before the proxy makes the contract, the marriage is invalid, even though both the proxy and the party with whom the contract was made would be unaware of the change.[85] For the consent is suspended by that incident, and does not last in the mind of the mandans.

4) The proxy must execute his mandate personally, not by a delegate, else the marriage will be invalid. The reason for this condition is that generally in such a matter personal qualities determine the choice. Of course, it is supposed that the proxy, when contracting marriage in the name of the mandans, is in a normal condition of mind and body, and especially that he is able to realize what is going on.[86]

CAN. 1090

Matrimonium per interpretem quoque contrahi potest.

Marriage can be contracted also through an interpreter.

In this case, which differs from proxy, because the parties are supposed to be present, the interpreter must faithfully translate the consent of both.

CAN. 1091

Matrimonio per procuratorem vel per interpretem contrahendo parochus ne assistat, nisi adsit iusta causa et de authenticitate mandati vel de interpretis fide du-

85 C. 9, 60, I, 19; S. C. C., July 5, 1727 (Richter, Trid., p. 238, n. 69). Insanity need not be perpetual, but may be temporary, no matter what Sanchez (l. II, disp. 11, n. 12) says against other authors. The case in Anal. Eccl., 1901, p. 430, offered a wrong solution.

86 The case mentioned in the preceding note depicted the proxy as acting under strong, though not overpowering, influence of alcohol; on that score he had contracted validly; but because the mandans had fallen into insanity at the time of the marriage contract, the latter was invalid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

bitari nullo modo liceat, habita, si tempus suppetat, Ordinarii licentia.

The pastor shall not assist at a marriage which is to be contracted by proxy or by interpreter, unless there be a just cause for it, and no doubt exists concerning the genuineness of the mandate or the trustworthiness of the interpreter; if time permits, the Ordinary's permission should be obtained.

There would be room for doubt if the mandate were not sealed with the parochial or diocesan seal. If properly signed and sealed the document cannot be rejected. A legitimate cause justifying the pastor in assisting at such a marriage would be absence from home, or perhaps unsafe conditions arising from feudal or family dissensions, etc.

CONDITIONAL MARRIAGE

CAN. 1092

Conditio semel apposita et non revocata:

1.° Si sit de futuro necessaria vel impossibilis vel turpis, sed non contra matrimonii substantiam, pro non adiecta habeatur;

2.° Si de futuro contra matrimonii substantiam, illud reddit invalidum;

3.° Si de futuro licita, valorem matrimonii suspendit;

4.° Si de praeterito vel de praesenti, matrimonium erit validum vel non, prout id quod conditioni subest, exsistit vel non.

There are certain rare historical documents [87] which could be alleged as proving the existence of this former 87 Freisen, l. c., p. 232 ff. Wernz, l. c., IV, p. 433 (ed. 1) endeavors vainly to show a historical coherence.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

impediment. With the exception of two "Paleae"[88] in the Decree, Master Gratian seems to ignore it. Bernardus Papiensis is the first writer who mentions it ex professo.[89] The Decretals[90] deal with conditional marriage under a special title, but the Code no longer treats condition as an impediment.

A condition or stipulation is a quality added to a contract which suspends its validity or effect until the time when the condition is fulfilled. From this definition it may be seen that a condition almost invariably concerns the future. A condition referring to the past is not a condition in the proper sense of the term.

Stipulations may regard the substance of marriage, especially its indissolubility, loyalty, and primary end. They may not be repugnant to the substance of marriage, and yet be sinful, because of the unlawfulness of the object aimed at. They may also be impossible of fulfillment. This impossibility may spring from human incapability of fulfilling the stipulation, because the object is beyond man's power. A necessary condition is one, of which the fulfillment depends on natural, not free, causes (eventus fortuitus). The text proceeds according to the various conditions.

1. When a condition has been placed to the consent and not withdrawn, if it concerns the future and is necessary or impossible or dishonest, but not contrary to the substance of marriage, it must be regarded as non-existing.

a) A necessary condition would be, for instance: "If the sun rises to-morrow," "If your mother dies," or "If I 88 Cfr. cc. 7, 8, C. 27, q. 2; which are spurious; cfr. Berardi, Canones Gratiani Genuini, I, 172.

89 Summa Decret., ed. Laspeyres, IV, 5, p. 146 f.

90 Cfr. X, IV, 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google get a good crop," for such conditions depend on circumstances over which man has no control.

b) An impossible condition would be: "If you will touch the sky with your fingers," [91] or "If you will not get sick," or "If you will live forever."

c) A sinful condition would be: "If you will embrace a non-Catholic creed," or "If you will kill your mother-in-law," or any other stipulation which involves a sin.

Now all such conditions are to be considered as non-existing, and therefore, as the canonists [92] say, they vitiate or kill themselves, not the matrimonial contract. A sensible and honest person is not supposed to contract marriage under frivolous conditions. The Church clearly wishes to safeguard the importance and seriousness of marriage by this law.

2. If the condition concerns the future and is against the substance of marriage, it renders the marriage invalid. The school [93] expressed this truth thus: A condition that is against the substance of marriage, vitiates the latter, but not the condition itself. For in every such case there are two positive acts of the will, one contrary to the other, inasmuch as the contracting party on the one side wills the marriage, because the will is bent on the marriage contract, while, on the other side, the will does not will, because it excludes or restricts the obligation and hence the right.[94] Note that we speak of a condition, which must proceed from a deliberate act of the will, and not from mere apprehension or interpretation, as when one would say: If I had known this, I should not have contracted marriage. This would be a case of error or 91 Bernard. Pap., l. c.; c. 7, X, IV, 5.

92 Fagnani, Comment., c. 1, X, 5, nn. 2 ff.

93 Fagnani, l. c., n. c. 7, nn. 2 f.

94 Gasparri, l. c., n. 919 (Vol. 2, p. 41).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

misunderstanding, but there would be no formal act of the will. Besides being a condition or stipulation, it must be mutually, externally, and lastingly agreed upon (in pactum deducta).[95] We say lastingly, because the stipulation must not be retracted before the marriage consent is given. But it is not necessary that this stipulation be repeated at the wedding, and hence the parties may give their consent absolutely like other contracting parties who marry unconditionally. This point was insisted on in a certain cause brought before the S. C. Concilii.[96] However, the document drawn up before the marriage and the fact that the pastor would not, at first, assist at the marriage for the very reason that a condition against the substance of matrimony had been attached, proved clearly the existence of a mutual stipulation. Therefore the marriage was declared invalid.

The substance of marriage is embraced in the threefold good thereof: the bonum sacramenti, fidelitatis et prolis.

a) Opposed to the sacrament is solubility by which a person could marry for a certain time only, or as long as it pleased his partner. Charles and Caroline were married April 12, 1887, but he soon grew tired of living with the same woman, and after fifteen days Caroline had to return to her home. The episcopal court returned a verdict in favor of nullity because "of the evidently implied condition of contracting a soluble marriage." But the S. C. Concilii upset this sentence and pronounced in favor of validity, because there were no proofs for the existence of any such stipulation.[97] If a Catholic would 95 Thus all the quotations alleged in Card. Gasparri's edition, especially S. O., Jan. 24, 1877 (Coll., n. 1465); cfr. Benedict XIV, De Syn Dioec., XIII, 22, 7.

96 Ulixbon., March 16, 1720; July 8, 1724 (Richter, Trid., p. 246 ff., n. 88).

97 S. C. C., Jan. 31, 1891 (A. S. S., t. 23, 711 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marry a Protestant or schismatic who was determined to make use of his sectarian conviction concerning the solubility of marriage, but would not stipulate this expressly with the Catholic party, the marriage would be valid.[98]

b) The second bonum is that of conjugal fidelity, which excludes polygamy and adultery. Hence if a man would marry a woman with the expressly stipulated condition: "I will marry you if you will deliver yourself up to adultery or prostitution for the sake of gain," [99] the marriage would be invalid. However, a mutual agreement would be required, otherwise the marriage would be valid, since no decent or honest person is supposed to ignore the unity of marriage, which excludes the sharing of one's body with another.

c) A condition against the bonum prolis would be, in the words of the decretal: "si prolem evitaveris," if you will have no offspring.[1] The primary end of marriage would thereby be frustrated. But this point is disputed, especially on account of the marriages called after St. Joseph, and marriages contracted with the vow of perpetual chastity. To us it seems more conformable to the law and in accord with the essence of marriage to hold that the right to the body of the other partner which is conferred by the matrimonial consent is intended precisely for the purpose of bringing forth children (ius ad copulam per se aptam ad generationem), that in other words, it is not an abstract, but a practical right, intended for the use of marriage. Now, if the vow of perpetual chastity had been made by one party, the other would be obliged in justice not to make use of the right essentially inherent in marriage,[2] and consequently there would be the

98 S. O., Dec. 2, 1680 (Coll., n. 221).

99 C. 7, X, IV, 5.

1 Ibid.

2 Thus Wernz IV, Vol. 2, p. 98, n. 302.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

same contradiction noted above: to will and not to will; I will marriage, but not its rights and duties. Now any contract would be invalid if the object of the contract would be absolutely, radically and permanently refused. Note well that a vow must necessarily exclude the right to use marriage, otherwise it is only an imperfect vow. Neither is it admissible to distinguish between a sinful and a lawful condition, for not only does the law [3] not distinguish between sinful and lawful conditions, but the very nature of marriage does not admit this distinction. For its primary end is offspring,[4] and if this end is in any way wilfully and efficaciously excluded, there can be no marriage. Lastly, this vow must be, and is supposed to be, a mutual agreement and not to rest only in the mind, or be a one-sided affair. For we are dealing with stipulations. The conclusion is: a marriage such as the one described is null and void.

But what about the so-called historical facts: the marriage of the Blessed Virgin with St. Joseph,[5] that of Pulcheria with the Emperor Marcian, that of St. Henry II with St. Cunegundis? Concerning the first example we may safely follow St. Thomas,[6] who says that the vow of Our Lady was conditional, not absolute, because otherwise there would have been no marriage. If it had been absolute — without reference to the will of God who wished that marriage — there would have been a condition against the good of marriage, and the latter would have been null and void. As to the marriage between Pulcheria and Marcian there are no documents

3 Neither the Decretals, c. 7, X, IV, 5, nor our Code.

4 And for that very purpose marriage was instituted by the Author of nature, whence it cannot be sinful.

5 Cfr. Zeitschrift für Kath. Theol., Innsbruck, 1888, p. 663 ff., where P. Flunk, S.J., discussed the matter very thoroughly.

6 Sent., IV, Dist. 30, q. 2, art. 1, qla. 2 ad 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

proving an absolute vow attached to the consent in the shape of a genuine stipulation. Concerning St. Henry's union it is now morally certain that there was the impediment of impotence.[7] A rather peculiar case has been alluded to above.[8] A Portugese lady married a senator under the avowed condition, set down in writing, that she would enter a convent fifteen days after the marriage, make profession after the novitiate, never make use of her marriage rights and immediately renounce the same. (Given at Lisbon, May 6, 1718.) The marriage was declared null and void. Besides others the authority of St. Thomas was alleged, who says: "If a woman would tell a man: 'I marry you, provided you have no intercourse with me,' this would be no matrimonial consent, because the condition is repugnant not only to the act itself, but to the very purpose of carnal intercourse."[9]

A very practical case was that solved by the S. Congregation, July 17, 1904. It concerns the onanistic use of marriage. A man and a woman had married with the formal and explicit condition that they would have no children. The episcopal court gave a verdict of nullity, which the defensor vinculi tried his best to get reversed. But as the stipulation was proved by letters, supported by an oath of the man and by witnesses, the S. Congregation[10] confirmed the sentence, thus declaring the marriage invalid. Of course, if the intention to have no children would have been only a desire or wish not expressly stipulated, the verdict would have been in favor of validity.

3. If a condition attached to the consent and not with-

7 Tübinger Quartalschrift, 1905, p. 325 ff.; 1907, p. 563 f.

8 Ulixbon. (Richter, p. 246 ff., n. 88).

9 Sent., IV, dist. 28, art. 3 ad 3; other authors quoted in that case are: S. Bonaventure, Sanchez, Layman, Barbosa, etc.

10 Cfr. Anal. Eccl., t. 12, 294 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

drawn concerns the future and is lawful, it suspends the validity of the marriage until the condition can be verified. If, for instance, one would set up the condition: "I marry you if I shall be elected to Congress," or "if you bring a dowry of $10,000," it would concern the future and be licit, but unless the stipulation were mutual, formal and lasting, the marriage would never be declared invalid, nor would it be conditional.[11] Suppose James married Gemma in 1919 under the condition above quoted: "If I am elected to Congress at the next election, in 1921." Provided they had observed the prescribed form, the marriage would become valid at the moment of James's election. But both would have to abstain from cohabitation or the use of marriage rights until the election was polled and ratified. After that no renewal of consent or anything else is required, because by the verification of the condition the marriage contract becomes complete.[12] Both parties may licitly and validly relinquish the condition and in that case the consent becomes absolute and no other formality is required,[13] but the pastor who assisted at the conditional marriage should be notified, in order to avoid misunderstanding.

Here it may be well to note that a conditional marriage, because not approved as a general rule by liturgical books and the practice of the Church, should never be contracted without first consulting the Ordinary.[14]

If the parties had carnal intercourse whilst the condition was still pending, they are by law supposed to have 11 S. C. C., Jan. 23, 1666 (Richter, Trid., p. 244, n. 85). A woman married on condition that the husband should bring 400 scudi (= $4000) as a dowry; he failed; yet the marriage was valid, because she consented libere; S. C. C., Nov. 17, 1708 (Richter, l. c., n. 86). A condition was made, but the parties contracted absolutely, and therefore the marriage was declared valid.

12 C. nn. § 1, 60, IV, 1.

13 C. 5, X, IV, 5.

14 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 88, n. 297.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

renounced the condition and thus made their conditional consent absolute. This is the doctrine of the Decretals [15] and it is not contradicted by the Code nor by the "Consensus mutuus" of Leo XIII, Feb. 15, 1892.[16]

The supposition that, pending the fulfilment of the condition, one can contract a valid marriage with a third person,[17] is fanciful, for now-a-days, when the form is so carefully prescribed, there is hardly a possibility of such an occurrence.

4. If the stipulated condition concerns the past or present, the marriage is either valid or invalid according to the verification or non-verification of the condition. Thus, if one would marry a woman under the condition: "If you are a virgin," the marriage would be objectively valid if the woman really were a virgin, but the marriage rights could not be made use of until the condition was verified.[18]

A case of a lawful condition not fulfilled was solved in 1918 by a commission of five Cardinals, all noted canonists. The lady had promised to marry a man if he was free from the taint of having had relations with another woman. This condition she mentioned on three different occasions to the would-be husband, and emphatically stated that her consent depended on and was subject to the quality alleged. Nor did she retract this condition before or at the marriage, though she did not formally renew it at the wedding, because, having stated it so absolutely, she could not add anything else. But the husband was found wanting in that very point, though he had asserted upon his word of honor that he had had no illicit relations with the other. After the marriage he

15 Cfr. cc. 3, 5, 6, X, IV, 5.
16 Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. 2, p. 90, n. 298.
17 Wernz, l. c.
18 Fagnani, in c. 7, X, IV, 5, nn. 13 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

frankly admitted that he had maintained such relations for twelve years with a woman who was even now nearer to his heart than the wife he had married. The five Eminences pronounced sentence of nullity because a real condition had been added to the contract which made the consent dependent on the existence or non-existence of the condition. This condition had never been revoked, nor was it verified, because the man had deceived the woman by his word of honor, and himself admitted after marriage that he had had illicit relations with another.[18a]

A similar case would be if a man would stipulate with his would-be wife: "I take thee if thou art not pregnant by another man." But it must be added that either written or oral testimonies would have to be brought to prove the existence of the condition; otherwise the ecclesiastical court neither would nor could pronounce sentence.

CONTINUANCE OF THE CONSENT

CAN. 1093

Etsi matrimonium invalide ratione impedimenti initum fuerit, consensus praestitus praesumitur perseverare, donec de eius revocatione constiterit.

Although marriage be invalid because of an impediment, the consent once given is presumed to continue until its revocation be proved.

The impediment must here be understood to be a diriment one. Therefore the question arises whether it was known to both or to one of the parties. If it was not known, this ignorance or good faith cannot render the marriage valid,[19] and the consent is presumed to continue.

18a See A. Ap. S., Vol. X, pp. 388 ff.

19 S. O., July 4, 1855, § Animadvertendum (Coll., n. 114).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

However when such a case occurs, it must be examined, and if the impediment really existed, the consent must be renewed after the necessary dispensation has been obtained.[20] If the existence of an impediment was known, the psychological query arises: Is it possible to contract marriage in spite of an obstacle that would not permit a real union? Our Code has already settled that question in can. 1085, where it says that knowledge of the nullity of the marriage does not necessarily exclude the matrimonial consent. For the parties may persuade themselves that they are really married, although perhaps unlawfully. Here is a case: In Siam it is customary to marry without the usual ceremonies. If the parties prosper, they stay together and after four years are considered to be husband and wife. From this time onward their marriage is valid, though at the beginning it was a concubinage. The consent was not renewed after the four years, hence the first one persevered and was regarded as sufficient for a valid marriage.[21] However, it must be added that this can only take place when the marriage has the "name and claim" and resemblance of a marriage.[22] And the reason why the law most reasonably supposes the perseverance of the consent and an apparent marriage, lies in the assumption that the natural law cannot be so obscured in every race and among all men that no trace of it is left.[23]

Hence revocation of the consent must be proved. How is that done? For lack of texts we are thrown upon conjectures. Evidently a merely habitual or interpretative attitude of mind, by which one would not again consent 20 S. O., March 11, 1868 (Coll., n. 1326). At the time of persecution in Japan many marriages were contracted with impediments.

21 S. O., Nov. 22, 1871 (Coll., n. 1377).

22 S. O., Dec. 18, 1872 (Coll., n. 1392).

23 S. O., Dec. 9, 1874, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1427).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if he would know of the nullity of the marriage, would not suffice for proof.[24] Since according to can. 1086, § 2, a positive act of the will is required in order to invalidate a marriage, it seems reasonable to assume that the act of revocation must be manifested outwardly and proved by two witnesses, or, in case of necessity, by one witness duly sworn. The assertion of the party alone would never be considered sufficient in court, since it might be that the party would have his or her own interests too much at heart. Therefore in causa Ulixbonensi the point of defence turned about the question whether the condition had been revoked at the moment of the wedding. And the proof that it had not been revoked was furnished by the pastor and witnesses. The similarity between that case and ours is palpable. For the rest, since the plaintiff cannot be a witness at the same time in the same case, it is but natural that a third person must testify to the fact of revocation. Of course, the other party may also testify to the revocation. This would be brought about by proving the refusal of cohabitation, or desertion, accompanied by utterances like these: "I never intended to marry you," "I was deceived when I gave my consent and I am sorry I have ever seen you," "I have learned that our marriage is invalid and therefore I will have nothing to do with you any longer," etc. This proof, if given under oath, would doubtless establish the fact of revocation.

24 Feije, l. c., n. 760, p. 780 (ed. 3).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER VI

FORM OF CELEBRATING MARRIAGE

HISTORICAL NOTE

It is certain that Christians from the earliest times clothed the marriage union with a certain ceremony, which differed from that prescribed by the Roman law, though no doubt they also obeyed the civil laws. The letter to Diognetus[1] plainly says that Christians marry like all others. This supposes that the Roman civil practice was observed as far as it did not clash with their religious views. Thus marriage by confarreatio,[2] even

1 Cap. 5; Roberts and Donaldson, The Antenicene Fathers, New York, 1899, I, p. 26.

2 Confarreatio, coemptio, usus, were forms of a marriage cum conventione in manu, and confarreatio — from farreus, made of spelt, viz., the cake — was a strictly religious ceremony performed in the house of the bridegroom, to which the bride had been conveyed in state, and in the presence of at least ten witnesses and the Pontifex Maximus, or one of the higher Flamens. A set form of words (carmen, verba concepta) was employed, and a sacred cake made of far (spelt) (farreus panis) — whence the term confarreatio — was either tasted or broken over the parties, who during the performance of the various rites sat side by side on a wooden seat made of an ox-yoke covered with the skin of sheep which had been previously offered in sacrifice. Coemptio was purely a legal ceremony, and consisted in the formal conveyance of the wife to the husband, according to the technical procedure in the sale of res mancipii. An imaginary sale took place on the part of the parent or guardian in the presence of five Roman citizens of mature age and a balance-holder (libripens), the husband or fictitious purchaser being termed coemptionator. A woman who remained with her husband for one whole year without absenting herself for three consecutive nights, passed in manum mariti by prescription (usu) as effectually for all legal purposes as if the ceremonies of confarreatio or coemptio had been performed. See Ramsay-Lanciani, Manual of Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 295 f.; also Becker-Metcalfe, Gallus or

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

had it not fallen into disuse at the end of the Republic, would not have been compatible with Christian sentiment. Less closely connected with pagan practices were the marriages called coëmptio and usus. However, all these were but rarely employed at the beginning of Christianity. More common was marriage without the conventio in manu. In that case the woman remained under the legal control of her father or guardian, or was sui iuris, as the case might be; and when sui iuris, all the property which she possessed or inherited was at her own disposal with the exception that the Roman law made for the dowry. The ceremonies that surrounded such a marriage were of a domestic or private character. Betrothment preceded the regular marriage contract or wedding. However, festive solemnities accompanied the marriage even though it was a marriage sine manu. Whether the early Christians followed this custom is difficult to say. But one thing is certain, the ecclesiastical authorities were not neglected when Christians entered upon that union, although the legal formalities of nuptiae iustae may have been set aside. Thus St. Ignatius says: "It becomes both men and women who marry to be united with the consent (μετὰ γνώμης) of the bishop, that the marriage be according to the Lord and not according to lust."[3] And Tertullian exclaims: "How could I sufficiently praise that marriage which the Church accepts, the oblation ratifies, the blessing seals."[4] On a sarcophagus in the Villa Torlonia in Rome there is a sculptured representation of a marriage. The two figures join hands upon a reader's desk (lectorium), or, more correctly, upon the book of the gospels lying on Roman Scenes of the Time of Augustus, 1898, p. 153 ff.

[3] Ep. ad Polycarp., c. 5 (Antenicene Fathers, I, p. 95).

[4] Ad Uxorem, II, 19.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the desk. Between and above the two persons, one of whom is veiled, appears the figure of the Saviour, young and beardless. Here we no doubt have a representation of a Christian marriage celebrated before the fourth century.[5] We may also refer to some epitaphs which illustrate the Christian idea of an indissoluble union blessed by the Church.[6]

Tertullian calls a marriage not previously professed or celebrated in the Church mere concubinage.[7] We are told of the sacerdotal blessing by the IVth Council of Carthage, A. D. 398 (c. 13). This text seems to have entered a Capitulary of the Kings of France, which says that it is a sacred duty to celebrate marriages publicly, because from clandestine unions many sins arise, and therefore the parish priest must first be approached, and marriage contracted publicly before the whole congregation.[8] That Pseudo-Isidore should insist upon public weddings is but natural.[9] Jonas of Orleans mentions the necessity of sacerdotal intervention.[10] Gratian, Alexander III, and the IVth Lateran Council insist upon public marriages and the latter forbids clandestine unions most severely.[11] Yet none of them asserts that a marriage not contracted before the Church — in facie Ecclesiae — would be invalid, unless there was some other impediment.

TRIDENTINE DISCIPLINE

The Council of Trent (1545–1563) in its twenty-fourth session, after long discussion and thorough deliberation,

5 Armellini, Lezioni di Archeologia Cristiana, 1898, p. 369.
6 Ibid.
7 De Pudicitia, c. 4.
8 Mansi, Coll. Conc., XVII bis, col. 1062 f.
9 Hinschius, Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, 1863, p. 87.
10 De Instit. Laicali, II, 2 (Migne, 106, col. 170 f.).
11 Ad c. 9, C. 30, q. 5; c. 4, Comp. V, IV, 4; c. 1, Comp. II, IV, 3; c. 3, X, IV, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

enacted the well-known decree "Tametsi" (c. 1), which governed the practice of the Church for more than 350 years. The formality required was laid down as follows: "Those who shall attempt to contract marriage otherwise than in the presence of the pastor (parochus), or of some other priest by permission of said parish priest or of the Ordinary, and in the presence of two or three witnesses, the Holy Synod renders wholly incapable of thus contracting and declares null and void, as it also invalidates and annulls such contracts by the present decree." The Ordinaries were enjoined to see to it that the decree was published in every parish church, and it went into effect in each parish thirty days from the date of its publication.

The practice generally followed up to 1908, as embodied in this decree, is the following:

1. The parochus is the pastor of one or both of the contracting parties (parochus proprius contrahentium). This has always been held in practice and by the School.[12]

2. Pastor and witnesses must be present, not only bodily, but also mentally, or cum animo, i.e., they must realize what is going on.[13]

3. The requisite of promulgation in each and every parish caused a great deal of confusion, not only in Catholic parishes, but also in mixed communities.

a) In Catholic countries, these rules prevailed:

a) If proof was furnished from the statutes or archives, or other authentic documents, that the "Tametsi" was promulgated in a certain parish, all Catholics were bound to abide by it, under penalty of invalidity.

12 Cronin, New Matrimonial Legislation, 1910, may claim credit for having discovered that all canonists were mistaken in assuming the parochus proprius.

13 Pirhing, IV, 3, § 2, q. 6; a case in point is solved by the S. Rota, May 28, 1909, in A. Ap. S., I, 524 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

β) Presumption was admitted in as far as custom in favor of the observance of the Tridentine form was considered proof that promulgation had been made; promulgation was presumed to have been made in a parish if it was made in the whole diocese.[14]

b) Concerning mixed territories a distinction was made, based on the supposition that the Tridentine law had a double character, personal and local, because it effected the contracting parties by reason of local promulgation. Three kinds of regions were distinguished in which promulgation was said to have been made:

α) In overwhelmingly Catholic countries or territories, where there were but few non-Catholics, who had no church or minister, and where the decree was certainly promulgated, not only Catholics but non-Catholics also were bound to observe it. Such countries were: Italy (with the exception of the island of Malta); France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Luxemburg, the Catholic Cantons of Switzerland, Austria, Bavaria, and the Spanish and Portugese colonies.

β) Mixed countries were those in which Catholics and non-Catholics lived promiscuously at the time of promulgation and had their ministers and temples. For the Netherlands, e. g., Benedict XIV, on Nov. 4, 1741, issued his famous Declaratio. In all the countries to which this "Declaratio" was subsequently extended, mixed marriages and marriages between baptized non-Catholics were valid, even if the Tridentine form had been disregarded. In the United States the Tametsi was supposed to have been published, but to bind only strictly Catholic marriages, in the province of New Orleans, in the province of San Francisco together with the territory of 14 Benedict XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XII, 5, 6; Leitner, l. c., p. 300; Wernz, Ius. Dec., IV, Vol. I, p. 216, n. 160.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Utah, save that part which lies east of the Colorado River, in the province of Santa Fe, except the northern part of Colorado, in the diocese of Vincennes, in the City of St. Louis and the parishes St. Geneviève, Florissant, and St. Charles of the same archdiocese, in Kaskaskia, Cahokia, French Village, and Prairie du Rocher, all situated in the diocese of Belleville.[15]

c) Finally, there were countries of a preponderantly non-Catholic type, where Catholics formed a small minority at the time the promulgation of the Tametsi was to be made. Here, unless promulgation could be clearly proved, the decree bound neither Catholics nor non-Catholics. Thus in the United States the following ecclesiastical provinces were exempt: Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Oregon, Milwaukee, Cincinnati (except the diocese of Vincennes), St. Louis (except the City itself and the places mentioned above), and Chicago (with the exception of the places mentioned in the Belleville diocese).[16] To this class also belonged England, Scotland, Denmark, Norway, several German provinces, Greece, Russia, Turkey, Japan, and China.[17] This summary of divergent practice proves emphatically how opportune was the change introduced by the pontifical decree "Ne temere," of Aug. 2, 1907, which has now entered the Code.

Present Legislation Concerning the Valid Form of Marriage

The Code embodies the "Ne temere" with some modifications, and the whole of chapter VI may be divided into the following topics: Requisites of formal valid-

15 Acta et Decreta Conc. Balt., III, 1886, p. CVIII.

16 Smith, Elements, I, n. 659, p. 432.

17 Cfr. Zitelli, Apparatus Iuris Eccl., 1886, pp. 394 ff. Wernz, l. c., IV, Vol. I, p. 223, n. 163.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

